SARGENT v. NORTH END WATER CO.

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 19, 1923.)

Damages 🔑62(1)—Measure of, is amount which, if expended by plaintiff, would have prevented the injury.

The refusal to charge, that if the jury found plaintiff could have prevented the damage complained of by the expenditure of a comparatively small amount of money, his measure of damages would be the expenditure which would reasonably have prevented the injury, held reversible error.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Ray L. Sargent against the North End Water Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Nathan Newby, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Conkling & Brown, of El Centra, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The following opinion was rendered by the court from the bench on February 19, 1923:

The judgment is reversed because of the error of the trial court in modifying instruction No. 3 by striking out the portion thereof in italics. The instruction is as follows:

"You are further instructed that if you find from the evidence that the plaintiff, Ray L. Sargent, could by the exercise of reasonable diligence have prevented the injury complained of, but failed to do so, then your verdict must be for the defendant, and if you find that the plaintiff could have prevented the injury complained of by the expenditure of a comparatively small sum of money, and find otherwise according to these instructions that the plaintiff is entitled to recover anything at all from the defendant, then the measure of damage would be the amount of money which could have reasonably prevented the injury complained of had the plaintiff expended said money."

The judgment is reversed.

SCHIMMEL v. MARTIN.

ANDERSON v. SAME.

1. Contracts 🔑10(4)—Sales contract containing no agreement to buy lacking in mutuality.

A contract of M. to let U. have continuously at a certain price water to capacity of M.'s pump, but with no agreement of U. to buy, treated as a contract for sale of personalty, is lacking in mutuality.

2. Property 🔑4—Right to water for irrigation real property.

The right to water to be used for irrigation is a right in real property.

3. Waters and water courses 🔑158(1)—Contract for water for irrigation uncertain as to price.

Contract of M. to let U. have, for irrigation continuously at 1½ cents per inch, the 150 inches of water, the capacity of M.'s pumping plant, is void for uncertainty as to price; the period to be covered by the price named not being stated, and it being unreasonable to construe it as providing for only one payment.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Two actions, one by James Schimmel, the other by H. O. Anderson, both against A. J. Martin. From adverse judgments, defendant appeals. Reversed.

R. B. Bidwell, of Glendora, for appellant.

Walters & Mauk, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LENNON, J. The above-entitled actions were separately instituted in the court below to recover from defendant damages for an alleged breach of a contract to furnish water to the respective lands of the plaintiffs. The cases come here on appeal upon separate records, but the appeals have been submitted upon a single set of briefs and will therefore be considered and decided as one.

The undisputed facts are these: On the 14th day of February, 1918, a written contract was entered into between one O. K. Uzzell and A. J. Martin, defendant herein, which contract was in the words and figures as follows:

"This agreement, entered into between A. J. Martin, of Baldwin Park, Los Angeles county, California, the party of the first part, and O. K. Uzzell, of Meriden avenue, South Pasadena, California, the party of the second part, witnesseth:

"That A. J. Martin is the owner of 150 inches of water, the capacity of his pumping plant, in Baldwin Park, California, and he agrees to let O. K. Uzzell have this water continuously at 1½ cents per inch, to be applied on the 20 acres of land owned by O. K. Uzzell, and which adjoins the ranch of A. J. Martin; and O. K. Uzzell is to pay monthly for the water he uses. In case O. K. Uzzell fails to pay for the use of water, the party of the first part has the privilege of cutting off the supply, but in case party of the second part fails to pay but does pay later, he shall then have the water supplied to him as in the beginning on the same terms, by paying up all bills for the use of water; and further, to secure party of the first part, the party of the second part agrees that

A. J. Martin shall have a lien on the crops grown on the said 20 acres until he pays said bills as security for water furnished. The contract agreement shall be continuous under said terms. Said water is to be furnished to O. K. Uzzell whenever notice is given to A. J. Martin by party in charge of O. K. Uzzell's ranch.

"Party of the second part to give 5 days' notice when water is wanted.

"[Signed] A. J. Martin.
"O. K. Uzzell."

On January 14, 1920, Uzzell transferred his interest in said contract to James Schimmel and Eva Anderson jointly, and on June 3, 1920, Eva Anderson assigned her interest in said contract to H. O. Anderson. In the meantime the title to the lands mentioned in said contract became vested in said James Schimmel and H. O. Anderson, plaintiffs herein, each becoming owner of 10 acres thereof. Prior to April 30, 1921, plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest received water from defendant's pumping plant for irrigating said property, and paid defendant in full therefor.

On January 6, 1921, the defendant gave notice to plaintiffs that he would furnish no water after April 30, 1921, and after that date did refuse to furnish water to either plaintiff. Upon the trial of the separate actions for the recovery of damages alleged to have been caused by the failure and refusal of defendant to furnish water, judgment in the sum of $368 was rendered in favor of plaintiff Anderson, and judgment in the sum of $300 in favor of plaintiff Schimmel. From these judgments, defendant appeals.

[1] The contract is lacking in mutuality. Considered as a contract for the sale of personal property, as the parties to the action treated and considered it, and as the trial court in effect found it to be, there is clearly no mutuality in the absence of an agreement by the plaintiffs to buy the water offered for sale by the contract.

The cases cited in the brief by counsel for respondents in support of the contention that the contract is mutual were all cases wherein the purchaser agreed in effect to purchase so much of the commodity as he should need in his business during the time specified in the contract. As a matter of course, under the circumstances narrated in those cases, the purchaser was legally bound to accept and pay for so much of the commodity as he should need. But in the instant case we are unable to find in the contract any obligation or promise on the part of the plaintiffs or their predecessors in interest to take or purchase any water at all.

[2, 3] The lack of mutuality in the contract is the principal point made in support of the appeal. Incidentally, however, it is contended that the contract was void for uncertainty. This point, even though it be indifferently made, is well taken. The right to water to be used for irrigation is a right in real property. Fawkes v. Reynolds (Cal. Sup.) 211 Pac. 449; Stanislaus Water Co. v. Bachman, 152 Cal. 716, 723, 725, 726, 93 Pac. 858, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 359; Copeland v. Fairview Land, etc., Co., 165 Cal. 148, 153, 131 Pac. 119. Considered as a contract for the sale of a right to the use of water for the purpose stated in the complaint, all of the elements essential to the creation of such a contract may be said to be clearly expressed, save and except the price to be paid for the water. The contract contemplates payments from time to time at the specified rate of 1½ cents per inch; but whether that is the rate to be paid per hour, per day, per month, per year, or for any other period is uncertain and incapable of ascertainment from the terms of the contract.

That the pumping of water is expensive is a matter of common knowledge and with that knowledge in mind the parties to the contract must have intended that the price should bear some relation to the period of time during which the water was being delivered and used. Such period of time, however, is not expressed in the contract. It would be utterly unreasonable to construe the contract to be a sale of a permanent water right, granting and assuring the continuous flow of a sufficient amount of water to irrigate 20 acres of land, to be paid for at the rate of 1½ cents per inch.

No point is made as to the right of plaintiffs to succeed to and take by assignment any interest in the contract. It, of course, goes without further saying that the quesion of the right of plaintiffs to so take, although it may be involved in the case, is not decided here.

Judgment reversed.

WARDLOW v. SANDERSON et al.

1. Sales 🔑396—Complaint for purchase money.

A complaint alleging purchase and delivery of a defective tractor, a subsequent agreement to purchase another tractor in consideration of the exchange of the defective tractor and a stipulated sum of money, and failure of seller to perform, states no cause of action, where a subsequent written rescission of the second contract is alleged.

2. Sales 🔑391(7)—No recovery for purchase price of goods as for money had and received, where no rescission and no implied warranty by vendor.

In an action by the buyer for the purchase price of a defective tractor, as for money had and received by defendants for the use of plaintiff, where there was no rescission of the sale and no implied warranty on the part of the vendor, under Civ. Code, § 1764, held that plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

3. Sales 🔑397—Evidence of condition of tractor in action for purchase price as money had and received held inadmissible.

In an action to recover back the purchase price of a tractor as money had and received by the seller for the use of the buyer, evidence as to the condition of the tractor was irrelevant and inadmissible.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Anna Wardlow against F. H. Sanderson, Sr., and another, doing business under the firm name and style of F. H. Sanderson & Son. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Max B. Jamison, of Parterville, for appellants.

Waldo E. Burford and Guy Knupp, both of Parterville, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This case is here on rehearing after judgment of the District Court of Appeal of the Second District, Division 1, reversing a judgment made and entered by the trial court in favor of the plaintiff. The Court of Appeal concluded, and accordingly adjudged, that the judgment against the defendants could not be sustained, upon the theory that there had been a rescission of the first contract entered into between the plaintiff and the defendants, and which was the basis of the plaintiff's cause of action. The conclusion of the Court of Appeal in this behalf was made and based upon the theory that the evidence adduced upon the entire case in the court below did not warrant nor support a finding that there had been a rescission of the contract referred to. At first blush it did not appear to us why said contract, even under the facts narrated in the opinion of the Court of Appeal, was not rescinded. A rehearing was granted primarily for the purpose of ascertaining the state of the evidence upon the subject of the rescission of the first contract, and now, after a careful consideration of the record, we are constrained to the conclusion that the Court of Appeal was correct in its statement of the facts and its application of the law, and, accordingly, the opinion of Mr. Presiding Justice Conrey is hereby adopted and made the opinion of this court, as follows:

"On or about April 1, 1919, appellants, in consideration of the sum of $1,545 paid by respondent to appellants, sold and delivered to respondent one certain model S–25 Samson tractor. This tractor was equipped with a defective motor, and by reason thereof would not perform the work for which it was sold; that is to say, respondent purchased the tractor for use in her orange grove, and the fact that it was purchased for this purpose was known to appellants at the time of the sale. Respondent kept the tractor and endeavored to use it until the following November. From time to time appellants attempted to remedy the defects, but without success. Appellants were not the manufacturers of the tractor, but were engaged in the business of selling such tractors. Respondent did not attempt to rescind the sale, and did not bring any action for damages for any alleged breach of the contract of sale. On the 7th day of November, 1919, respondent and appellants entered into a contract, the material part of which is as follows: 'We agree to sell Mr. Wardlow one 30-X Samson tractor to be delivered as soon as possible for his S–25 and $400.' The Mr. Wardlow mentioned in this contract is the son of respondent, and it is admitted that he represented her in the transaction. At the same time, and in part performance of this agreement, the S–25 was delivered by respondent to appellants. About 30 days later, with the consent of appellants, respondent, by her said agent, rescinded the contract of November 7th by writing thereon the following: 'Having changed our mind we have decided not to take the 30–X and agree to let Sanderson sell the S–25 for $1,470. Sanderson agrees to sell this tractor within 60 days. Mrs. Jas. Wardlow. Per Ralph Wardlow.' The S–25 was not sold. At the time of the trial of this action it remained on the premises of appellants without any further agreement concerning same.

"The amended complaint in this action is in two counts. The first count alleges the making of the original sale; the defects and failure of the S–25; the agreement of November 7th; the delivery of the S–25 to appellants; 'that thereafter and after a reasonable time had elapsed the said plaintiff demanded of and from the said defendants that said defendants perform their agreement and deliver to the said plaintiff the aforesaid model 30–X Samson tractor but to perform the agreement on the part and behalf of the said defendants to do and perform and to deliver said model 30-X Samson tractor to the said plaintiff, the defendants have and do now neglect, fail and refuse'; alleges that the plaintiff at all times has been ready, able, and willing to perform her part of said contract, and that she has failed to pay said sum of $400 solely for the reason that appellants have refused to deliver the 30–X tractor; that after such refusal, the plaintiff demanded the return of said sum of $1,545, but that defendants have failed, neglected, and refused to repay the same. The second count of the complaint is in the ordinary form of a complaint in an action for money had and received by the defendants, to and for the use of plaintiff.

"The answer of the defendants denied the principal allegations of the complaint other than those alleging the original sale and the making of the contract of November 7th. The answer also alleged the fact of rescission by mutual consent of the contract of November 7th. The court made findings and entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff. Without reviewing the evidence, we shall assume that it is sufficient in fact to support all of the findings except the finding that it is not true that the contract of November 7th was rescinded. The evidence, without any conflict therein, shows that the rescission was made as hereinabove stated.

"The evidence concerning the defective condition of the S–25 tractor was received over the objection of appellants that the same was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The defects shown by the evidence thus received are indefinite concerning the particular faults of the tractor, other than that when put to use in respondent's orchard, it would run for a short time and would then cease to operate satisfactorily and would not produce the power necessary for the work required. For some reason not explained, the motor failed to develop power sufficient for satisfactory use of the machine in the plaintiff's orchard. It remained in the possession of the plaintiff for more than six months, except during such time as it was in the place of business of appellants, or elsewhere, for purposes of repair. It appears to have been in the possession of respondent immediately prior to the time when she delivered it to appellants under the contract of November 7th.

[1] "The first count of the complaint attempts to state a cause of action for breach of the contract of November 7th. It is clear that respondent's right to recover on that count must be defeated by reason of her voluntary rescission of the agreement on which that cause of action is based.

[2, 3] "It only remains to determine whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover under the second count, which seeks recovery of the original purchase price of the S–25 as for money had and received by defendants for the use of plaintiff. This cause of action cannot be sustained unless the plaintiff was entitled to and did rescind the original sale of the S–25 tractor. The transaction of November 7th was not a rescission, and the delivery of the tractor by respondent to appellants at that time was not pursuant to any rescission or notice of rescission. No agreement was made that the transaction of November 7th was or should be considered to be in the nature of a rescission, and it is clear that, without the consent of appellants, respondent did not at that time have any right to rescind. There had been no breach of any warranty of sale on the part of the vendor. In the article of the Civil Code relating to warranties of sales, it is declared that 'Except as prescribed by this article, a mere contract of sale or agreement to sell does not imply a warranty.' Civ. Code, § 1764. That article does not provide for any warranty applicable to the facts of this case. Remsberg v. Hackney Mfg. Co., 174 Cal. 799, 803, 164 Pac. 792; Brackett v. Martens, 4 Cal. App. 249, 255, 256, 87 Pac. 410. There is no evidence of any express warranty. In stating one of his questions to the witness Ralph Wardlow, the attorney for the plaintiff referred to the original contract for the S–25 as being a document then in his hands; but it is not in the record, and nothing has been said concerning its contents. The court should have sustained the objections of appellants to the questions concerning the condition of the S–25 tractor, or should have granted their motion to strike out that evidence, because it was not relevant to the issues of the case."

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed.

1. Insane persons 🔑66—Suit unnecessary to set contract aside.

The interposition of a court of equity is not necessary to the rescission of a contract entered into by an insane person, as it may be rescinded by the act of the party entitled and desiring to rescind, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 1688, 1689, 1691.

2. Insane persons 🔑66—Offer to restore unnecessary where nothing received.

Where nothing is received by an insane person to be restored, an offer to restore is impossible and unnecessary as a condition of rescission, under Civ. Code, § 1691.

3. Insane persons 🔑66—Formal notice of rescission of conveyance unnecessary.

It is not necessary that a notice of an insane person to rescind a conveyance of an automobile shall be formal and explicit, it being sufficient that the notice shall be given to the other party which clearly shows the intention to consider the contract at an end, and a demand for the automobile made by the guardian of the insane person preliminarily to the institution of an action is sufficient notice of desire and determination to rescind.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Samuel J. McNeese, by H. Parker Wood, guardian of his estate, against Samuel S. McNeese. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Waldo M. York, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Nathan Newby, William J. Palmer, and Raymond W. Stewart, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. Plaintiff in this action was on the 26th day of January, 1920, duly adjudged an incompetent person, and H. Parker Wood was appointed guardian of his estate. Thereafter, on the 25th day of May, 1920, an action in claim and delivery was instituted by said guardian in behalf of said incompetent for the recovery from the possession of the defendant of a certain Buick automobile formerly owned by said incompetent. Plaintiff and defendant are respectively father and son.

The allegations of the complaint were the usual allegations in actions of claim and delivery. In addition thereto it was alleged:

> "That while the said Samuel J. McNeese was the owner of said automobile as aforesaid, and while he was in possession thereof and entitled to the possession thereof, and while he was so as aforesaid incapable of taking care of himself and managing his property and incapable of consenting thereto, the said defendant, without right, took said automobile from the possession of said Samuel J. McNeese."

The defendant in his answer denied that plaintiff was the owner of and entitled to the possession of said automobile, and alleged affirmatively that on the 21st day of October, 1919, he, the defendant, became the owner of the automobile and entitled to the possession thereof. At the trial a bill of sale from plaintiff to defendant was offered and received in evidence, and defendant testified that said bill of sale had been given to him by his father. On behalf of the plaintiff evidence was introduced to show that said plaintiff had no recollection of having made the bill of sale. There was also the testimony of two doctors to the effect that the plaintiff at the time of the execution of the bill of sale was incompetent to transact business. This testimony was based upon a hypothetical question and was admitted out of order and without a foundation having been laid. But later in the trial of the case the plaintiff offered to prove as a foundation for said testimony all of the facts narrated therein. The court refused to hear evidence tending to establish the facts relied upon as a basis for the hypothetical question upon the ground that, even though all of the facts therein narrated were shown to be true, nevertheless the necessary conclusion of the court would have to be that the contract was not void. This was so, the trial court stated, for the reason that such facts would not establish the fact that plaintiff was "entirely without understanding," and, unless plaintiff were entirely without understanding, he would not come within the Code provision which provides that contracts by such a person are invalid and utterly void. Civ. Code, § 38.

Judgment was made and entered in favor of the defendant, and findings were made to the effect that a bill of sale was executed by plaintiff and delivered to defendant, and that at the time of the conveyance of said automobile the plaintiff was not entirely without understanding. It was evidently the theory of the trial court that, if the plaintiff was entirely without understanding, no contract had come into existence, for the reason that plaintiff would have been incapable of making a contract, and an action for claim and delivery would lie; but, upon the other hand, if plaintiff were not "entirely without understanding," then his contract was merely voidable, and his remedy was not an action for claim and delivery, but rather for rescission of the contract.

From this judgment plaintiff appeals, basing his appeal primarily upon the contention that the contract had actually been rescinded by and for the plaintiff prior to the commencement of the action in claim and delivery. Section 39 of the Civil Code, upon which the plaintiff bases his right of rescission, reads as follows:

> "A conveyance or other contract of a person of unsound mind but not entirely without understanding, made before his incapacity has been judicially determined, is subject to rescission, as provided in the chapter on rescission of this Code."

[1] The interposition of a court of equity to set the contract aside was not necessary to rescission. A contract may be rescinded by the act of the party entitled and desiring to rescind. It is well recognized that sections 1688, 1689, and 1691 of the Civil Code provide for rescission effected by the act of the parties. Loaiza v. Superior Court, 85 Cal. 11, 24 Pac. 707, 9 L. R. A. 376, 20 Am. St. Rep. 197; Kelley v. Owens, 120 Cal. 502, 47 Pac. 369, 52 Pac. 797; More v. More, 133 Cal. 489, 65 Pac. 1044, 66 Pac. 76; McDonald v. Pacific Debenture Co., 146 Cal. 667, 80 Pac. 1090; McGue v. Rommel, 148 Cal. 539, 83 Pac. 1000; California, etc., Co. v. Schiappa-Pietra et al., 151 Cal. 732, 91 Pac. 593; Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 92 Pac. 1011; Bray v. Lowery, 163 Cal. 256, 124 Pac. 1004; Brown v. Domestic Utilities Mfg., 172 Cal. 733, 159 Pac. 163.

Under section 1691 of the Civil Code two requirements are set forth as necessary to effect a rescission by the act of the party.

> "1. He must rescind promptly, upon discovering the facts which entitle him to rescind, if he is free from duress, menace, undue influence, or disability, and is aware of his right to rescind; and,

"2. He must restore to the other party everything of value which he has received from him under the contract; or must offer to restore the same, upon condition that such party shall do likewise, unless the latter is unable or positively refuses to do so."

[2, 3] It is conceded by defendant that, where nothing is received to be restored, an offer to restore is impossible, and in the case at bar, the property having been transferred by gift, there can be no question that an offer to restore is not necessary. McGue v. Rommel, 148 Cal. 539, 83 Pac. 1000; California, etc., Co. v. Schiappa-Pietra et al., 151 Cal. 732, 91 Pac. 593. It is insisted, however, that a notice to rescind was necessary, and that such notice was not given by plaintiff to defendant in the instant case. It is not necessary that the notice to rescind shall be formal and explicit; it is sufficient that notice shall be given to the other party which clearly shows the intention of the person rescinding to consider the contract at an end. It has been held in other states that the mere bringing of an action is a sufficient disaffirmance of a sale. Mahoney v. Gano, 2 Ind. App. 107, 27 N. E. 315. This has been held true not only in executory contracts of sale, but in cases where the action was ejectment, and the courts conceded that the transfer was not void, but merely voidable. Smith v. Ryan, 191 N. Y. 452, 84 N. E. 402, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 461, 123 Am. St. Rep. 609, 14 Ann. Cas. 505.

But, aside from the foregoing considerations, we think the demand for the automobile made by the guardian of the plaintiff preliminarily to the institution of this action was sufficient notice to defendant of plaintiff's desire and determination to rescind and adequately inform defendant that plaintiff did not intend to be longer bound by the transfer.

The question of whether or not at the time of the alleged rescission he was entitled, because of incompetency, to rescind, was embraced within the issues, and evidence upon that phase of the case was admissible. The trial court having erroneously refused the offer of plaintiff to prove all the facts set forth in the hypothetical question, which proof would have tended to sustain his contention that he was at the time of the execution of the bill of sale incompetent, the case must be sent back for a new trial.

Carriers ⚷333(10)—One stepping in front of car without looking in direction from which it approached held contributorily negligent.

One passing around the end of a north-bound street car, from which she had alighted, held contributorily negligent as a matter of law in stepping in front of a north-bound car on a parallel track without looking to the south, whether or not she knew cars were operated in both directions on such track.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Katherine O. Klusman and another against the Pacific Electric Railway Company and others. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Frank A. McDonald and Gesner Williams, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frank Carr, of Oakland, and R. C. Gortner and W. R. Millar, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WILBUR, C. J. The plaintiff Katherine O. Klusman stepped upon the track of the defendant railway company in front of a north-bound interurban train going from Los Angeles towards Glendale. The accident occurred at the intersection of Berkeley, Alvarado, and Glendale boulevard in Los Angeles. This action was brought to recover the damages sustained by the plaintiffs as a result of the collision. Defendants' motion for nonsuit was granted and a judgment in their favor entered and plaintiffs appeal. The defendant railway company owns a three-track system of railway at the scene of the accident. The middle track is used by the outgoing and incoming interurban cars, the easterly track by north-bound and the westerly track by south-bound local cars traveling from Los Angeles to Edendale, terminating at the street intersection where the accident occurred. According to the testimony of the plaintiff she alighted from the north-bound Edendale car after it had stopped at its terminus, walked south along the side of the car, passed around the end of the car in which she had been riding, stepped upon the middle track, and was almost instantly struck by a car proceeding in the same direction as the car in which she had just arrived. She testified that a second car upon the local line had arrived and was standing about 60 feet in the rear of the car from which she alighted, and that the headlight thereon was burning brightly, illuminating the scene of the accident. The plaintiff testified that after arriving at the rear of the car in which she had been riding she turned to the west, and proceeded without looking toward the south at all, and was not aware of the approach of the car from the south until she was struck by it. She testified that it was a drizzly, damp night, and that it seemed very dark; that she had visited the place where the accident occurred a number of times, and admitted that she knew there were three tracks there, but stated she was not very familiar with that fact; that she had gone there in the evening, and had paid very little attention to the tracks.

If the plaintiff knew that cars were operated on the middle track in both directions, she was bound in the exercise of ordinary care to look in both directions before stepping upon the track. If she did not know that cars were operated in both directions upon the middle track, she was negligent in assuming that cars were only operated in one direction, without taking the precaution to look in the other direction as well. From either point of view the conclusion of the trial court that she was guilty of negligence as a matter of law was correct.

Judgment affirmed.

MASON v. MASON. (L. A. 7341.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1009(3)—Finding on conflicting evidence conclusive.

In an action to set aside a deed, the finding of the court on conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal.

2. Costs 🔑260(4)—On frivolous appeal appellee allowed damages.

Where judgment in action to set aside a deed was rendered on conflicting evidence, and it is apparent from the brief that an appeal therefrom was not taken in good faith and was for delay only, appellee should be allowed damages for frivolous appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Louisa C. Mason against Robert E. Mason. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Willedd Andrews, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. C. Routhe, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. [1, 2] Plaintiff and defendant were husband and wife at the time the plaintiff executed a deed to the defendant on May 22, 1920. They were divorced June 30, 1920. Plaintiff brings this action to set aside the deed on the ground that it was procured by duress. Judgment having been rendered in favor of the defendant, plaintiff appealed, claiming that the evidence is insufficient to justify the judgment. The evidence is conflicting, and for that reason the appeal is without merit. It is apparent from an inspection of the plaintiff's brief that the appeal was not taken in good faith and was taken for delay only. The defendant should be allowed damages for frivolous appeal.

Judgment affirmed with $250 damages to be entered as costs in the trial court.

Fines 🔑11—Judgment to pay fine or be confined in jail held not to impose sentence of imprisonment for nonpayment.

Judgment that defendant, found guilty of selling liquor in violation of the Wright Act, "was to pay a fine of $500, or be confined in the city jail for the period of six months upon his failure to pay said fine," does not provide for imprisonment for nonpayment of the fine, as the judgment, when properly construed, is one imposing a sentence of imprisonment, but gives defendant opportunity to escape punishment by paying the fine.

In Bank.

Original application of John Frankovitch for a writ of habeas corpus, against the Chief of Police of the City of Los Angeles. Writ denied.

J. Morgan Marmaduke, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. Petitioner seeks the release of John Frankovitch on habeas corpus. Frankovitch was convicted of selling liquor in violation of the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79) "and judgment was passed upon him to this effect, that he, the said John Frankovitch, was to pay a fine of $500 or be confined in the city jail for the period of six months upon his failure to pay said fine." On February 13, 1923, Frankovitch notified the trial court that he was unable to pay the fine, or any part thereof, whereupon he was committed to the county jail for the period of six months. The Volstead Act (41 Stat. 305) provides that for the first offense the person who sells liquor shall be fined not more than $1,000, or suffer imprisonment not exceeding six months. It is claimed that this provision, adopted by our Wright Act does not justify the alternative judgment imposed upon Frankovitch, because such judgment, in effect, provides for imprisonment for the nonpayment of the fine. On the other hand, we think the judgment, properly construed, is one imposing a sentence of imprisonment for six months, but gives the party convicted the opportunity of escaping such punishment by the payment of a fine. Having failed to pay the fine, he is in no position to complain of the imprisonment.

In re PARSELL'S ESTATE. (L. A. 7315.)

1. Executors and administrators 🔑315(1)—Decree distributing portion of estate to deceased person void.

A decree, distributing a portion of an estate to a person afterwards discovered to have been deceased, is absolutely void, and, rather than an inadvertent distribution, a total failure to distribute exists.

2. Judgment 🔑12—For or against dead person void with exceptions.

Judgment for or against a dead person is void with certain exceptions.

3. Executors and administrators 🔑315(3)—Executor's proceeding to have decree of distribution corrected held improper and insufficient to give court jurisdiction.

Where a portion of an estate is distributed to a deceased person, that portion of the decree is absolutely void and an executor cannot get the decree of distribution corrected by proceeding under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, relating to amendments by the court, but should proceed by proper petition and notice to all claimants for a new order of distribution as to the portion of the estate covered by the previous void decree.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Julius M. Parsell, deceased. Appeal by Hester and Bessie L. Marsh, residuary legatees under the will of Josephine Sleight Marsh, deceased residuary legatee under the will of Julius M. Parsell, deceased, from an order modifying a decree of distribution. Order reversed.

Clock, McWhinney & Clock, of Long Beach, for appellants.

Daly, Daly & Todd, of Long Beach, for Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank.

WILBUR, C. J. This is an appeal from an order modifying a decree of distribution. The application for the modification of the decree was made by the executor of the estate upon the ground of its mistake and inadvertence. By the decree of distribution a small portion of the state, the sum of $1,389.35, was distributed to Josephine Sleight Marsh. The decree was dated February 23, 1921, and entered March 1, 1921. In April, 1921, it was discovered that Josephine Sleight Marsh had died on the 1st day of June, 1920. An affidavit was made by the attorney for the executor, sworn to August 19, 1921, stating that the executor was ignorant of the fact of death of Josephine Sleight Marsh at the time of the application for distribution, and did not become aware thereof until April, 1921. This affidavit and a motion of the same date to amend the decree were filed with the county clerk August 23, 1921. The motion was brought on for hearing October 4, 1921, and an order was made and filed November 23. 1921, amending the decree of distribution by ordering the distribution of the amount theretofore distributed to Josephine Sleight Marsh to be distributed to the numerous residuary legatees under the will of the decedent, Julius M. Parsell. This order recites that the matter came on regularly for hearing on the 4th day of October, 1921, and that at that time Messrs. Daly & Daly appeared as attorneys for the executor of the estate of Julius M. Parsell, and that Messrs. Clock, McWhinney & Clock appeared on behalf of Hester and Bessie L. Marsh, residuary legatees under the last will and testament of Josephine Sleight Marsh, deceased. The notice of appeal from this order was signed by Messrs. Clock, McWhinney & Clock, as attorneys for Hester and Bessie L. Marsh, "residuary legatees and executrices under the last will and testament of Josephine Sleight Marsh, deceased." A transcript of the record prepared under the provisions of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, has been filed in this court and a brief of the appellants, but no reply brief has been filed. The substantial question presented by the record and the one passed upon by the trial court is the question of whether or not the residuary legatees of Josephine Sleight Marsh succeeded to her rights, or whether, as the trial court concluded, the property under the terms of the will of the decedent passed to his residuary legatees.

[1] At the threshold of this inquiry we are met by the appellants' contention that the court was without jurisdiction to amend or modify the decree for the reason that the application was not made to the court within six months of the date of the entry of the decree of distribution. But even if we assume that the application was made within six months the record presents a more serious question, which we are reluctant to discuss in the absence of any one representing the respondents or any argument on behalf of the appellants thereon. The question is this: What was the effect of that portion of the decree distributing $1,389.35 to a deceased person? If that portion of the decree of distribution is absolutely void, then, instead of an inadvertent distribution, we have a total failure to distribute that portion of the estate. It seems clear that the decree distributing a portion of the estate to a deceased person is absolutely void. The decree of distribution is in the nature of a judgment. Benning v. Superior Court, 34 Cal. App. 296, 167 Pac. 291; Nason v. Superior Court, 39 Cal. App. 448, 179 Pac. 454; Crane v. Superior Court, 42 Cal. App. 285, 183 Pac. 606; Code Civ. Proc. § 1666; Wm. Hill Co. v. Lawler, 116 Cal. 359, 362, 48 Pac. 323; Crew v. Pratt, 119 Cal. 139, 51 Pac. 38; Goad v. Montgomery, 119 Cal. 552, 558, 51 Pac. 681, 63 Am. St. Rep. 145; Cunha v. Hughes, 122 Cal. 111, 113, 54 Pac. 535, 68 Am. St. Rep. 27; McKenzie v. Budd, 125 Cal. 600, 58 Pac. 199; Mulcahey v. Dow, 131 Cal. 73, 63 Pac. 158; More v. More, 133 Cal. 489, 495, 65 Pac. 1044, 66 Pac. 76; Estate of Schmierer, 168 Cal. 747, 145 Pac. 99.

[2, 3] A judgment rendered for or against a dead person is void (De Leonis v. Walsh, 140 Cal. 175, 178, 73 Pac. 813, with certain exceptions (section 669, Code Civ. Proc.; Fox v. Hale & Norcross S. M. Co., 108 Cal. 478, 41 Pac. 328; Estate of Page, 50 Cal. 40) not applicable to the facts of this case. If that portion of the decree in favor of the deceased legatee was absolutely void because the legatee was dead at the time of the proceedings for distribution, it could not be corrected after the notice here given, under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, as is well illustrated in the case at bar. Here the executor, who has no interest in the manner in which the estate is distributed and no right to participate in controversies between the heirs as to distribution (Estate of Parsons, 65 Cal. 240, 3 Pac. 817; Estate of Jessup, 80 Cal. 625, 22 Pac. 260; Estate of Healy, 137 Cal. 474, 477, 70 Pac. 455; McCabe v. Healy, 138 Cal. 81, 89, 70 Pac. 1008; Estate of Hite, 155 Cal. 448, 456, 101 Pac. 448; Estate of Friedman, 176 Cal. 226, 228, 168 Pac. 21; Id., 178 Cal. 27, 172 Pac. 140), applied to the court, not for distribution of this portion of the estate and upon proper petition and notice, but for correction of the order of distribution based upon its own mistake in assuming that the legatee was living when application was made by it for the original decree of distribution. The record does not show upon whom notice of the application to amend the decree was served, nor is a copy of the notice contained in the record, and aside from the recitals in the order amending the decree there is no evidence that any notice whatever was given. The conflicting rights resulting from the death of the distributee, Josephine Sleight Marsh, were those of her heirs, legatees, administrators, or executors, as the case might be, on the one hand, and on the other hand the numerous residuary legatees who would participate in the fund if, under the terms of the will, the property distributed to Josephine Sleight Marsh should be distributed to them in the event of her death, instead of to the latter's representatives or successors. The order made by the court shows that the only persons represented at the hearing were the residuary legatees of Josephine Sleight Marsh, who, in the notice of appeal, were also assumed to be executrices of her last will and testament, and the executor of the estate of the decedent, Julius M. Parsell. As the latter had no interest in the controversy and no right to represent either set of claimants, in that court or in this (Estate of Marrey, 65 Cal. 287, 3 Pac. 896; Estate of Friedman, supra), it is therefore obvious that the real parties in interest were not represented at the hearing of the motion. The law provides the method of acquiring jurisdiction of all claimants of an estate upon distribution, and in the absence of such notice distribution cannot be made. We conclude, then, that the court was without jurisdiction to make the order from which the appeal is taken, not because the application was made more than six months after the decree, but because the court had jurisdiction to make this new distribution only after proper petition for distribution and notice.

In view of this conclusion, we feel that it would be improper to discuss or attempt to determine the rights of the parties under the will, for the reason that these parties are not before us.

Judgment reversed.

MAH SEE v. NORTH AMERICAN ACC. INS. CO. OF CHICAGO, ILL. (S. F. 9777.)

1. Insurance 🔑464—Insurer held liable for death inflicted by person shooting at another.

Under proviso in an accident policy that the insurer assumed no liability for death arising from injury "intentionally inflicted on the insured by any person," three elements were requisite to render the proviso operative, namely, an intention to injure, directed at the insured, and the infliction of injury upon him; under such policy the insurer was not exempt from liability if the person who shot and killed insured intended thereby to shoot some other person, in view of Civ. Code, § 1641.

2. Insurance 🔑146(3)—Policy susceptible of two constructions must be construed in favor of insured and against insurer.

Where an accident insurance policy is susceptible of two constructions, one of which is unfavorable to insured, the ambiguity will be construed liberally, and in favor of insured, and strictly against the insurer, under Civ. Code, § 1654.

3. Insurance 🔑646(6)—Burden of proving death arose within exceptions in policy on insurer.

Where an accident insurance policy provided that the insurance company would not be liable for death arising from "injury intentionally inflicted on the insured by any person," the burden rested upon insurer to prove by a preponderance of the evidence the facts necessary to bring the case within the purview of the exceptions of the policy.

4. Insurance 🔑646(6)—Burden of proving insured's death not result of own acts on beneficiary.

Though the burden of proof in an action on an accident insurance policy was upon the beneficiary to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that death resulted "through accidental means," as provided in the policy, such burden was fully met when it was shown without contradiction that the shooting of insured did not follow as a natural or probable result from anything done by him.

5. Appeal and error 🔑996—Where two inferences deducible from facts, verdict of jury or finding of court will not be set aside.

Where it appears that either one of two inferences may fairly be deduced from facts, the question of fact is to be determined by the jury or the court without a jury, and their verdict or finding will not be set aside on the ground that it is not sustained by the evidence.

6. Appeal and error 🔑931(1)—Evidence subject to opposing inferences to be regarded in light most favorable to support judgment.

In so far as the evidence is subject to opposing inferences, it must upon a review thereof be regarded in a light most favorable to the support of the judgment.

7. Insurance 🔑665(5)—Coroner's jury finding insured was murdered does not compel conclusion murderer intended to injure insured.

In an action on an accident insurance policy exempting the insurer from liability for death arising from injury intentionally inflicted on insured, held, even though plaintiff beneficiary was bound by the finding of the coroner's jury that insured was murdered, such finding does not compel the conclusion that the person who murdered insured intended to injure him.

8. Evidence 🔑366(2)—Certificate of death held properly excluded in action on insurance policy because not properly authenticated.

It was not error, in an action on an accident insurance policy, to exclude a certified copy of a certificate stating the cause of death of insured, where it was not shown that such certificate was made and signed by the physician last in attendance, as required by St. 1917, pp. 717–728, and St. 1905, pp. 115–122, as amended by St. 1907, pp. 296–300, or that the certificate was made by a public officer or by any other person in the performance of a duty specially enjoined by law, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1920.

9. Evidence 🔑471(11)—Objection to question held proper where answer would have necessitated conclusions of witness.

In an action on an accident insurance policy for the death of insured resulting from homicide, objection to defendant's question, "Did you know that insured prior to his being injured or killed had been threatened on the part of certain tong leaders in Chinatown?" held properly sustained, since the answer would have involved at least three separate conclusions in the mind of the witness as to what constituted "threat," as to who were the "tong leaders," and as to whether or not a threat had been made "on the part of" such leaders.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1058(2)—Where objection to exclusion of testimony is cured by subsequent answer, objection not considered.

The appellate court will not consider an objection to a ruling excluding testimony where the questions were subsequently answered and the error thus cured.

11. Evidence 🔑314(1)—Question as to receipt of letter properly excluded where letter itself, if produced, would be hearsay.

In an action on an accident insurance policy, to which defendant insurer interposed the defense that insured was shot and killed by one who intended to kill him, held not error to exclude defendant's question to plaintiff, "Did you receive another anonymous letter on the day following the shooting of insured?" where, if such letter had been actually produced and identified as being signed by the man who admitted the shooting, it would have been hearsay.

12. Insurance 🔑659(1)—Evidence of threats received by insured and his request for police protection held not competent against beneficiary.

Evidence by defendant insurer "that six months prior to shooting of insured the latter with others complained to the chief of police concerning threats, and asked for police protection," held incompetent against beneficiary in an action on an accident policy in which insurer sought to evade liability by showing that person who shot and killed insured intended to kill him.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Mah See (Mar Shee) against the North American Accident Insurance Company of Chicago, Ill. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied; LENNON, J., dissenting.

John Ralph Wilson, C. B. Morris, and Fred L. Berry, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harding & Monroe and Robert H. Borland, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

MYERS, J. [1] The plaintiff, who was the wife of one Fong Wing, and the beneficiary named in an accident insurance policy issued to him by the defendant, sues herein to recover for his death by shooting. This is a companion case to Mar Shee v. Maryland Assurance Corporation (Cal. Sup.) 210 Pac. 269, ad the facts in the two cases are the same, except that the language of the proviso or exception attached to the policy and relied upon by the defendant herein is materially different. The policy herein contained the following proviso:

> "This policy is issued upon condition that the company assumes no liability hereunder should the accident, injury, disability, death, loss of limb or sight, result wholly or in part directly or indirectly, from injury intentionally inflicted on the insured by any person." (Italics ours.)

The principal contention of the defendant is that the evidence does not support the finding of the court that, "It is not true that the death of said Fong Wing was caused wholly or directly by personal injury intentionally inflicted upon him." It is apparent from the evidence that the person who did the shooting was at the time aiming at Fong Wing, and that the shots killed him. He was killed by some one who either intended to kill the said Fong Wing, or who intended to kill some other person and shot at Fong Wing, believing at the time that he was such other person. In the former event the company clearly would not be liable, and its counsel contend that the same result would follow the latter event. They argue that the person killed was the one at whom the shots were aimed, and that, when it transpires that he was in fact the insured, it follows that the injury was "intentionally inflicted on the insured." We cannot adopt this view. To do so is to strike out from the proviso the words "on the insured," and make it read so as to exempt the company from liability for "injury intentionally inflicted by any person." But the rule of interpretation is that—

> "The whole of a contract is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable, each clause helping to interpret the other." Civ. Code, sec. 1641.

The words "on the insured" cannot be deemed to have been inserted in the proviso for the purpose of qualifying the verb "inflicted," because they are unnecessary for that purpose, and, so regarded, they are wholly superfluous. The entire contract of insurance concerns itself only with injuries to the insured. Injuries to any other person would be wholly irrelevant thereto. If, then, we are to give any effect to those words, which we must do, "if reasonably practical," they must be regarded as qualifying the adverb "intentionally," and as defining the intention of the person inflicting the injury. We conclude, therefore, that the concurrence of three elements is requisite to render the proviso operative: (1) An intention to injure, (2) directed at the insured, Fong Wing, and (3) the infliction of injury upon him. From this it follows that the company is not exempted from liability if the person who shot Fong Wing intended thereby to shoot some other person. This conclusion finds support in the cases of Utter v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 65 Mich. 545, 32 N. W. 812, 8 Am. St. Rep. 913, and Butero v. Travelers' Acc. Ins. Co., 96 Wis. 536, 71 N. W. 811, 65 Am. St. Rep. 61.

[2] But, if it be conceded that the language of the proviso is susceptible to the construction contended for by defendant, it must also be conceded that it is likewise susceptible to the construction here adopted, and we are thus confronted by an uncertainty or ambiguity which it is our duty to construe liberally in favor of the insured and strictly as against the insurer. This for two reasons: (1) Because it is found in a policy of insurance (Civ. Code, § 1654; Maryland Casualty Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 178 Cal. 491, 494, 173 Pac. 993; Wells Fargo & Co. v. Pac. Ins. Co., 44 Cal. 397); and (2) because the language in question is found in an exception attached to the policy which purports to limit the risk assumed by the insurer in the general provisions thereof. (Berliner v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 121 Cal. 458, 53 Pac. 918, 41 L. R. A. 467, 66 Am. St. Rep. 49).

[3, 4] It remains, then, to consider the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding of the court construed as a finding that the person who shot the insured did not intend thereby to injure Fong Wing. In considering the claimed insufficiency of the evidence to sustain this finding, it is to be remembered that the burden rested upon the defendant to prove by a preponderance of the evidence the facts necessary to bring the case within the purview of the exception to the policy. Of course, the burden was upon the plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the death resulted "through accidental means," as provided in the body of the policy. But this burden was fully met when it was shown, without contradiction, that the shooting did not follow as a natural or probable result from anything done by the insured. Richards v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 89 Cal. 170, 175, 26 Pac. 762, 23 Am. St. Rep. 455; Jenkin v. Pacific, etc., Ins. Co., 131 Cal. 121, 63 Pac. 180; Price v. Occidental Life Ins. Co., 169 Cal. 800, 802, 147 Pac. 1175. But, on the issue raised by the claim of the defendant that the insured died as the result of "injuries intentionally inflicted" on him, the burden of proof rested upon the defendant. Postler v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 173 Cal. 1, 3, 158 Pac. 1022.

[5, 6] It is apparent from the evidence that the person who did the shooting was at the time aiming at Fong Wing. From this either one of two conclusions could be drawn: Either that the shooter knew and recognized Fong Wing and intended to shoot him, or that the shooter intended to shoot some one else and mistook Fong Wing for that other person. The evidence discloses nothing to indicate whether the shooting was done from close at hand or from a great distance. It does show without contradiction that it occurred after dark; that the street lamps were burning, but that "it was not very light" at the point where Fong Wing fell. Cases of mistaken identity are of the commonest occurrence in everyday human experience, even under the most favorable circumstances of light, proximity, and unobstructed vision. Even though it may appear to our minds more probable that the one who did the shooting intended to shoot Fong Wing, and that therefore the trial court should have found in favor of the defendant upon this issue, it was not compelled to so find under the evidence. This court has frequently held that, even though all the facts are admitted or uncontradicted, nevertheless, if it appears that either one of two inferences may fairly and reasonably be deduced from those facts there still remains in the case a question of fact to be determined by the jury (or by the trial judge where the case is tried without a jury), and that the verdict of the jury or the finding of the trial judge thereon cannot be set aside by this court on the ground that it is not sustained by the evidence. Anderson v. L. A. Transfer Co., 170 Cal. 66, 148 Pac. 212. In so far as the evidence is subject to opposing inferences, it must upon a review thereof be regarded in the light most favorable to the support of the judgment. Woodard v. Glenwood Lumber Co., 171 Cal. 513, 519, 520, 153 Pac. 951; Hassell v. Bunge, 167 Cal. 365, 367, 139 Pac. 800.

> "In reviewing a question of this kind, all the inferences reasonably possible from the evidence favorable to the plaintiff [the prevailing party] must be indulged by this court." Bandle v. Commercial Bk. of Los Angeles, 178 Cal. 546, 547, 174 Pac. 44, 45.

[7] In this connection it may be pointed out that, even if it should be assumed that the plaintiff is bound by the verdict of the coroner's jury finding that the insured was murdered, that in no way compels the conclusion that the person who murdered him intended to injure the insured.

[8] The claimed errors of law all relate to rulings of the trial court in the admission and rejection of evidence. Defendant offered and the court received in evidence a certified copy of the certificate of death, which stated the cause of death of the insured as "homicide." Thereafter, when it appeared in evidence that there had been a physician in attendance upon the insured up to the time of his death, and that the certificate was not signed by this physician, but by another who was not shown to have ever been in attendance upon the insured, the certificate was stricken out on plaintiff's motion, and of this the defendant complains. Defendant relied in its brief on appeal upon the act of 1905 (pages 115–122), as amended by the act of 1907 (pages 296–300), and in its petition for hearing by this court, on the act of 1917 (pages 717–728). Each of said acts contains a provision that a certified copy of a certificate of death made in accordance therewith "shall be prima facie evidence in all courts and places of the facts therein stated." The certificate was, nevertheless, properly stricken out for the reason that each of the acts relied on provides that "the medical certificate [which states the cause of death] shall be made and signed by the physician, if any, last in attendance on the deceased," and the certificate herein was not so made or signed. Nor is the defendant aided herein by the provisions of section 1920, Code of Civil Procedure, because the certificate was not made by a public officer or by any other "person in the performance of a duty specially enjoined by law." It is further apparent that, if the certificate had remained in evidence, it could not have affected the result.

[9] Complaint is made that the trial court sustained plaintiff's objection to the following question:

> "As a matter of fact do you know that Fong Wing, prior to his being injured or killed, had been threatened on the part of certain tong leaders in Chinatown?"

The objection was sustained on the ground that it was not cross-examination, but it was also objected to on the ground that it was incompetent. The answer to the question would involve at least three separate conclusions in the mind of the witness; as to what constitutes a "threat," as to who were "tong leaders," and as to whether or not a purported threat had been made "on the part of" such leaders. The ruling was correct, regardless of the considerations which prompted it.

[10] Appellant complains of rulings excluding testimony as to the amount of money which had been demanded of the steamship company on one occasion, and the amount paid it on another occasion. Both questions were afterward answered, so that if there was any error it was cured.

[11] Appellant earnestly complains of a ruling sustaining plaintiff's objection to the following question: "Did you receive another anonymous letter on the day following the shooting of Fong Wing?" As suggested by plaintiff's counsel, if such a letter had been actually produced and identified, stating, "I am the man who murdered Fong Wing," and if it had been proven to be signed by a man then living in San Francisco, it still would have been pure hearsay.

[12] Enough has been shown to illustrate the character of the claimed errors. Suffice it to say that we have considered all of the rulings claimed as erroneous which are not here specifically discussed, and, in our opinion, they were correct. The trial court was extremely liberal in affording the defendant every opportunity to prove its claimed blackmailing conspiracy. It even went to the extent of permitting the defendant to introduce evidence to the effect that, six months prior to the shooting, the insured, with others, had complained to the chief of police concerning certain threats, and had asked for police protection. As against the beneficiary who is here suing, this evidence was wholly incompetent, and might properly have been excluded. Jenkin v. Pacific, etc., Ins. Co., 131 Cal. 121, 123, 63 Pac. 180.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: WASTE, J.; KERRIGAN, J.; SEAWELL, J.

LAWLOR, J. I concur in the judgment and in the opinion of Mr. Justice MYERS except that, for the reasons given in my dissent in the companion case (Mar Shee v. Maryland Assurance Corporation [Cal Sup.] 210 Pac. 269), I am of the view there is ample support in the evidence for the finding herein that "Fong Wing received a bodily injury through external, violent and accidental means." In the face of this finding I do not think it can be said as a matter of law "that the person who did the shooting was at the time aiming at Fong Wing."

LENNON, J. I dissent. The evidence is not, in my opinion, sufficient to support the finding of the trial court that "It is not true that the death of said Fong Wing was caused wholly or directly by personal injury intentionally inflicted upon him." There is no doubt, from the evidence adduced, that the shot which killed Fong Wing was deliberately aimed at him. Whether the person who did the shooting intended to kill Fong Wing, or intended to kill some other person, and, under the mistaken belief that Fong Wing was such other person, shot and killed Fong Wing, it cannot be denied that he did intend to kill the body at whom he aimed. If it be true that the assailant was mistaken, and the deceased was not the man he intended to kill, that he was not the man for whom he intended the bullet, this fact does not alter the result. His intent at the time was to shoot the man at whom he aimed, namely, Fong Wing. Any mistaken conception that Fong Wing was another person was formed before he fired at him. The intent of the assailant when he took aim and fired was to hit the man before him. Obviously, therefore, it was an injury intentionally inflicted upon the deceased, identified though he may have been in the mind of his assailant as the man whom his assailant believed him to be, and comes, therefore, in my judgment, within the exception in the policy. If this be so, then it follows that the finding is not supported by the evidence, and the defendant is not liable.

I concur: WILBUR, C. J.

1. Accord and satisfaction 🔑11(3)—Check tendered in full satisfaction of claim and so accepted by debtor constitutes accord and satisfaction, if accepted by creditor.

Where the amount due is in dispute, and a check less than that claimed is sent to the creditor with a statement that it is sent in full satisfaction of the claim, and the tender is accompanied by such acts or declarations as amount to a condition that, if the check is accepted at all, it is accepted in full settlement of the disputed claim, and the creditor so understands, its acceptance by the creditor constitutes an accord and satisfaction, even though the creditor states at the time that the amount tendered is not accepted in full satisfaction. Civ. Code, §§ 1521, 1523.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Accord and Satisfaction.]

2. Accord and satisfaction 🔑25(4)—One relying upon accord and satisfaction must plead and prove both.

He who relies upon an accord and satisfaction must plead and prove both.

3. Accord and satisfaction 🔑8(1)—Dispute as to amount due must be founded in good faith.

While it is not necessary that the dispute or controversy should be well founded, for the payment to constitute an accord and satisfaction it is necessary that it be founded in good faith.

4. Accord and satisfaction 🔑8(1)—Agreement to tender lesser amount for liquidated claim void, in absence of honest dispute.

Without an honest dispute, an agreement to tender a lesser amount in payment of a liquidated claim is without consideration and void.

5. Accord and satisfaction 🔑8(1)—Arbitrary refusal to pay on pretense of exacting inequitable terms not such honest dispute as to afford consideration for tender of lesser amount to pay debt.

An arbitrary refusal to pay a debt, based on a mere pretense of the debtor, whether for the obvious purpose of exacting terms which are inequitable and oppressive, is not such an honest dispute as will satisfy the rule that, where there is not an honest dispute, an agreement to take a lesser amount in payment for the liquidated claim is without consideration and void.

6. Accord and satisfaction 🔑27—Whether dispute in amount due and whether tender made on condition that acceptance be in full satisfaction of debt, held for court.

Whether there was a dispute concerning the amount due, and whether a tender was made on condition that acceptance would be in full satisfaction of a debt, are primarily questions of fact for the trial court.

7. Appeal and error 🔑927(3)—On review of nonsuit, favorable inferences and presumptions considered as facts proved by plaintiff.

On review of judgment of nonsuit, every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence adduced must be considered as facts proved in favor of plaintiff.

8. Appeal and error 🔑927(3)—On review of nonsuit view most favorable to plaintiff taken, where evidence fairly susceptible of two constructions.

Where evidence is fairly susceptible of two constructions, or if one of several inferences may reasonably be made, the appellate court on review of nonsuit must take the view most favorable to the plaintiff, and, if contradictory evidence has been given, it must be disregarded.

9. Appeal and error 🔑927(3)—On review of nonsuit, evidence must be weighed in light most favorable to plaintiff.

On review of nonsuit, the plaintiff must be given the benefit of every piece of evidence which tends to sustain his averments, and such evidence must be weighed in the light most favorable to plaintiff's claim.

10. Appeal and error 🔑927(3)—On review of nonsuit, relevant evidence must be given full probative strength.

On review of nonsuit, evidence, whether erroneously admitted or not, if relevant to the issues joined, must be given the credit and benefit of its full probative strength, and any question arising from the fact of variation between the evidence of the witnesses cannot be raised or considered.

11. Trial 🔑139(1)—Motion for nonsuit denied, where plaintiff establishes prima facie case.

If plaintiff has introduced proof sufficient to make out a prima facie case under the allegations of the complaint, a motion for nonsuit, if made at the close of the case, should be denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by C. C. Berger and others against R. B. Lane. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

R. L. Horton and C. S. Anderson, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Fred N. Arnoldy, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. This case came here on rehearing after decision by the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division Two. Our consideration of the case has satisfied us of the correctness of the conclusion reached in the second opinion of that court, written by Mr. Justice Craig, and for practically the same reasons, but more elaborately stated, we have concluded that the judgment must be reversed.

The appeal is from a judgment of nonsuit. At the close of plaintiffs' case the court was of the opinion that the case made by them established an accord and satisfaction of a pre-existing claim, and accordingly gave judgment against them. The vital questions about which the controversy centers and which must be found to be satisfactorily sustained by the evidence produced, if the judgment of nonsuit is to stand, are whether a bona fide dispute, or, indeed, any real dispute is shown to have existed between the parties as to the amount due under an original contract, and, if so, was the acceptance of a check for a lesser amount, under the circumstances of the transaction between the parties, such an act as amounted to a condition that it was tendered and accepted in full satisfaction of a disputed pre-existing claim, and did the plaintiffs so understand it? These questions can only be answered by an examination of the evidence in the case.

Respective counsel seem to have fallen into the error of treating as evidence in the case testimony given by defendant, Lane, which had been stricken from the record by the trial court of its own motion.

The facts need only to be briefly stated. The defendant, as owner of a tract of land containing 40 acres, situated in the county of Los Angeles, and plaintiffs, real estate agents, entered into a written contract whereby the latter was authorized, by the terms of said contract, to sell said 40 acres "at and for the sum of $700 per acre, payable as follows—said Sexsmith, Jenal, and Berger to receive their commissions of 5 per cent." Said contract of agency, or listing order, as it is sometimes referred to, bore date October 6, 1919. A printed form was used, the open spaces being supplied by data wholly furnished by defendant, Lane, and the insertions in writing were made by him. The parties had no previous acquaintance, and defendant's visit at the office of the plaintiffs was unsolicited.

Eight days thereafter, to wit, October 14, J. F. Jenal, a member of said realty firm, procured a purchaser, Ralph H. Petz, and an agreement to purchase was on that day formally executed. The other persons present and witnessing said transaction were Jenal and a brother of Petz. Subsequently, a deed passed from Lane to Petz, pursuant to their agreements, thereby completing the transaction. The purchase price agreed upon and inserted in each of said instruments was placed at $28,000. At the close of the transaction of October 14, defendant, Lane, addressing himself to Petz, remarked: "Who is going to take care of Mr. Jenal?" The latter, as the record indicates, was surprised at the inquiry and replied that he did not know there was any doubt as to who was to take care of him. Mr. Lane then said: "Oh, yes, this has got to net me $28,000." Jenal continued: "'Well,' I said, 'I did not think there was any question as to who was to take care of me.' 'Well,' Mr. Lane says, 'I want this to net me $28,000,' and I said, 'Well, this is not what my partner Sexsmith told me.' 'Well,' he said, 'I can't help it; I want this to net me $28,000.'" And "there was talk pro and con," and Mr. Lane suggested, "I am willing to 'donate' Mr. Jenal $500 and I think the Petz boys ought to make up the rest, or some." The effort of the defendant to persuade or induce the Petz brothers to pay a commission of $250 seems not to have been unacceptable to Jenal, but, as the Petz brothers were in no way obligated to pay any part of a commission, they declined to commit themselves further.

Jenal, prior to this time, had not seen the contract of agency or listing order, and, as a matter of fact, did not know positively that an agreement had been reduced to writing. On the day following he sought out his partner Berger, and told him of his experience of the previous day. He was somewhat disturbed by the attitude of Lane. Then, for the first time, he examined the contract. On the following day, to wit, October 16, Berger called on Lane and addressed him in this manner: "Mr. Jenal informed me that you would only pay $500 commission. * * * I have a contract in the office where you agreed to pay us 5 per cent." Lane responded by asking him if he had the contract with him, and was told that he did not have it with him, but that it was at his office, and Lane could inspect it by calling there. Berger had no further conversation with Lane, but was told by his partner Sexsmith that the latter called at the office and after examining the contract said: "Well, I will not pay it unless you sue me." No other word or communication is shown to have passed between any of the parties until November 3, 1919, on which date defendant, Lane, sent to Jenal a letter inclosing a check for the sum of $500. Omitting formal parts, the check was in the following words: "Pay to the order of J. F. Jenal five hundred ($500) dollars." The letter was as follows: "Hollywood, Nov. 3, 1919. Mr. Jenal. Dear Sir: I inclose my check for $500 as your commission for sale of lot 755 BL 1000 to Petz Bros. as agreed upon at time of sale & as part of terms of said sale. Very truly. R. B. Lane." Jenal retained the check. The bank's indorsement shows it to have been cashed November 5, 1919. On the day following, November 6, Jenal addressed the following letter to Lane: "Your check for $500 to apply on commission to Messrs. Jenal, Berger, and Sexsmith received. The balance of the commission as per your written agreement is the sum of $900. This is now due so please send check for same at once." Lane made no reply to this letter.

On December 6, 1919, plaintiffs brought their action to recover the balance of said commission, to wit, $900, having given credit on account for the $500 paid by check of November 5. Defendant answered by setting up accord and full satisfaction of plaintiffs' demand as a defense to the action.

[1] The general rule, which is but an amplification of our Code sections (Civ. Code, §§ 1521, 1523) defining satisfaction and accord, is—

> "That where the amount due is in dispute, and a check less than that claimed is sent to the creditor with a statement that it is sent in full satisfaction of the claim, and the tender is accompanied by such acts or declarations as amount to a condition that if the check is accepted at all it is accepted in full satisfaction of the disputed claim, and the creditor so understands, its acceptance by the creditor constitutes an accord and satisfaction even though the creditor states at the time that the amount tendered is not accepted in full satisfaction." Lapp-Gifford Co. v. Muscoy Water Co., 166 Cal. 25, 134 Pac. 989; B. & W. Engineering Co. v. Beam, 23 Cal. App. 164, 137 Pac. 624.

[2-5] The general rule is that he who relies upon an accord and satisfaction must plead and prove both. Simmons v. Oullahan, 75 Cal. 508, 17 Pac. 543. While it is not necessary that the dispute or controversy should be well founded, it is necessary that it should be founded in good faith. Without an honest dispute, an agreement to take a lesser amount in payment for the liquidated claim is without consideration and void. An arbitrary refusal to pay, based on the mere pretense of the debtor, whether for the obvious purpose of exacting terms which are inequitable and oppressive, is not such a dispute as will satisfy the requirements of the rule. Corpus Juris, vol. 1, § 75, pp. 554, 555 and notes.

It is clear that the agreement of the defendant to pay a commission of 5 per cent. on $28,000 is an agreement to pay a fixed and definite sum. It will be kept in mind that the contract has not been assailed on any ground of invalidity or unfairness. No suggestion of repudiation on any equitable or legal grounds is to be found in the record. So far as evidentiary disclosures are concerned, its validity is not open to dispute even on trivial grounds. It was a contract wholly prepared by defendant, and, standing alone, it is unassailable. The only means by which it could have been destroyed was to show that a subsequent dispute arose as to the amount due thereunder, and that a lesser sum was consented to and accepted in full satisfaction of the greater sum agreed upon by the contracting parties.

The conversation on which defendant must rely as furnishing a basis for accord as a defense occurred immediately after Petz had signed an agreement binding himself to purchase the property October 14. Lane, who should have entertained no doubt as to who was to pay Agent Jenal, in the face of his contract to do so himself, asked who "was to take care of Jenal?" Why he should have asked such a question or felt at all uneasy or interested in the matter, unless he was conscious of a legal liability, is a circumstance not to be left out of the case. In this conversation his obligation to pay the commission was brought specifically and pointedly to his attention, and he did not at any time dispute or deny it. The most he said, with circumstances calling upon him to speak in unequivocal and emphatic terms, was: "This (sale) has got to net me $28,000." Upon being reminded by Jenal that such was not the contract according to the information furnished him by Sexsmith, and by the further observation made by Jenal "that there was no doubt existing as to who was to pay him," defendant spoke evasively and stated that he was willing to "donate" Jenal $500 and that "the Petz boys ought to come through, too; the Petz boys ought to make up the rest, or some." And so, too, when Jenal said: "I did not think there was any question as to who was to take care of me," Lane replied, "I want this to net me $28,000." Lane made no claim that the understanding of the parties was different from what was contended for by Jenal, and contented himself with unsatisfactory replies.

One more incident may be added to the above. Berger testified that a short time after October 14 he was told by Sexsmith that Lane had called upon him and, after inspecting the contract of agency, said, "Well, I will not pay it unless you sue me." If anything further was said it does not appear in the record, and no unfavorable inference may be indulged against plaintiffs as to what may have been said.

The foregoing excerpts present, in substance, all the oral evidence found in the case which in any way throws light upon the question of a dispute or to an acceptance of the $500 in full satisfaction of plaintiffs' claim. The execution or validity of the contract was not disputed. The amount fixed as commissions or compensation agreed upon was not denied. That plaintiffs were the procuring cause of sale was admitted. No other or different agreement, written or parol, or understanding, express or implied, modifying the contract of agency was set up or asserted or claimed. No complaint was made as to the time, place, or condition of performance. Nothing was said upon which a dispute might be predicated. Clearly, the attitude of defendant appears to be that of a person endeavoring to release himself from the full consequences of a binding contract. This view is strengthened by the offer to "donate" $500. Rather a quick and firm denial of any liability whatsoever would have been the expected retort of a person who felt that an effort was being made to extort money from him. The attempt to induce the Petz brothers, who in nowise were bound to pay any part of the commission, to bear a portion thereof is another circumstance pointing in the same direction. The remark that he (Lane) could not help what Jenal's partners had informed him in respect to the terms of the contract (which was a true statement of fact) was an expression of apparent indifference, rather than a positive denial of indebtedness. The further remark that "I will not pay it unless you sue me" belongs to a class of loose expressions made use of under varying circumstances, and should be considered in the light of the situation in which they are spoken. Sometimes they are used coercively and are intended to have a deterrent effect, and again they may be spoken to express a determination to stand on one's rights. In any event, the purpose of such an expression under the circumstances of this case could do no more than present an issue of fact to be determined by the court or a jury as any other fact in the case.

We are next brought to a discussion of the defendant's letter inclosing a check for $500, written some two or three weeks after the last conversation above reviewed, as bearing upon the issue of a dispute. The letter reads as follows: "I inclose my check for $500 as your commission for sale of lot 755 * * * to Petz Bros. as agreed upon at time of sale and as part of terms of sale." (Italics ours). The contract referred to is absolutely silent on the subject of commissions. The subject is not mentioned. That there was no parol agreement made at the time has already been fully shown, so this statement is at best erroneous and has no foundation in fact to support it.

The rule that a mere refusal to pay cannot be made the basis of a consideration for a compromise, in the absence of a bona fide dispute, is treated in Demars v. Musser-Sauntry, etc., Co., 37 Minn. 418, 35 N. W. 1. The principle there announced, and which we think applicable to the case at bar, is as follows:

> "The defendant is entirely right in his law that the compromise of a disputed or doubtful claim is in itself a good consideration, and that no investigation into the character or value of the claim submitted will be gone into for the purpose of setting aside a compromise honestly made. It is sufficient if the parties entering into it thought at the time that there was a question between them. It is not even necessary that the question in dispute should be really doubtful, if the parties bona fide considered it so. The real consideration which each party receives under a compromise is not the sacrifice of the right, but the settlement of the dispute. But, on the other hand, it is equally true that, to constitute a good consideration for a settlement by way of compromise, there must have been an actual bona fide difference or dispute between the parties as to their [legal] rights. There is an entire absence of evidence in this case tending to show any such dispute. There was certainly none as to the amount of plaintiff's claim. Neither was there any as to when it was due according to the terms of the contract. Swenson, who made the alleged settlement with plaintiff, did not claim that the contract was different from what plaintiff asserted it to have been, or that by law the wages were not payable until the logs arrived at the boom. He simply asserted, according to plaintiff's statement, that he would not pay all the money because it was not 'the law of the company,' or, according to his own statement, because they 'didn't settle that way,' without giving any reason. A person cannot create a dispute sufficient as a consideration for a compromise by a mere refusal to pay an undisputed claim. That would be extortion, and not compromise. There must in fact be a dispute or doubt as to the rights of the parties honestly entertained. The evidence of this is utterly wanting in this case."

Lastly we come to a consideration of the check and statement sent with it. The rule is that, where the amount due is in dispute, as claimed here, and a check for a less amount is sent to the creditor with a statement that it is sent in full satisfaction of the claim, or language equivalent thereto is employed, and the tender is accompanied with such acts or declarations that it amounts to a condition that if the check is accepted at all it is accepted in full satisfaction of the disputed claim, and the creditor so understands it, its acceptance, even though the creditor states at the time that the amount tendered is not accepted in full satisfaction, constitutes an accord and satisfaction. An examination of the check and the accompanying statement will show that the language used does not measure up to the requirements of the leading authorities to be found on the subject. In all the cases that have been called to our attention in which a satisfaction has been held to have been conclusively expressed in writing, the writing in some form shows without question that the acceptance of the inclosure was clearly intended to be a satisfaction in full of the claim. This sometimes is shown by the express words used in the body of the check or by an accompanying receipt, stating that the amount sent is in full of all demands. Of course, the statements, declarations, and acts of the parties are to be considered and weighed in arriving at the understanding of the parties, but they must be of such a character as to express in a clear manner the intention of the parties to be affected. Neither the language of the receipt nor the check here involved can be said to be conclusive on the case at bar. The plaintiffs with reasonable diligence notified defendant that the payment made was not to be considered in full satisfaction of the claim, and that there remained a balance due. Neither Jenal nor any of his partners consented at any time to accept $500 in full satisfaction of the demand.

[7-11] We have reviewed the facts in this case in their relation to a judgment of nonsuit. In so doing we have been compelled to adopt the rules of law which apply to cases of nonsuit and which may be briefly summarized as follows: Every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence adduced must be considered as facts proved in favor of the plaintiffs. Where evidence is fairly susceptible of two constructions, or if one of several inferences may reasonably be made, the court must take the view most favorable to the plaintiffs. If contradictory evidence has been given, it must be disregarded. Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 Pac. 252. The plaintiff must also be given the benefit of every piece of evidence which tends to sustain his averments and such evidence must be weighed in the light most favorable to plaintiffs' claim. Anderson v. Wickliffe, 178 Cal. 120, 172 Pac. 381. Evidence, whether erroneously admitted or not, if relevant to the issues joined, must be given the credit and benefit of its full probative strength and any question arising from the fact of variation between the evidence of the witnesses cannot be raised or considered. The evidence must be taken most strongly against the defendant, and, if the plaintiff has introduced proof sufficient to make out a prima facie case under the allegations of his complaint, the motion, if made upon the close of the case, should be denied. Bush v. Wood, 8 Cal. App. 647, 97 Pac. 709; In re Estate of Daly, 15 Cal. App. 329, 114 Pac. 787; Wassermann v. Sloss, 117 Cal. 425, 49 Pac. 566, 38 L. R. A. 176, 59 Am. St. Rep. 209; Lassen v. S. P. Co., 173 Cal. 71, 159 Pac. 143; Kleist v. Priem (Cal. App.) 196 Pac. 72.

If an inference can be said to flow from the language used by the defendant to the effect that "the sale has got to net me $28,000," or "I want this to net me $28,000," it is weakened by other testimony in the case. We find that the sale did not, as a matter of fact, net the defendant $28,000, as there were liens outstanding against the property which reduced the amount to some extent. Then, again, we find in the record the uncontradicted testimony of Berger to the effect that Lane was very anxious to sell the property and rid himself of it and told him not to turn down an offer of $650 an acre, and when asked,by Berger if he would pay a commission on a sale at $650 he replied, "I will pay a commission on the price that I accept."

We are of the opinion that Petz brothers, whose testimony was offered by the plaintiff, should have been heard, although offered as witnesses after plaintiffs formally closed their case, inasmuch as they were the only disinterested persons who were present and heard the full conversation about which the controversy arose. Upon a review of the situation we are of the opinion that the motion for a nonsuit was erroneously granted.

The judgment is reversed.

McNEIL v. KINGSBURY, Surveyor General.

1. Public lands ⚿29—Statutes ⚿162—Public lands devoted to public use not included in general statutes for disposal of public lands, such general statute not repealing special act.

The principle, that the law does not favor a repeal by implication, and where two statutes treat the same subject, one being special and the other general, unless irreconcilably inconsistent, the general, though later in date, will not be held to have repealed the special, but the special act will prevail in its application to the subject-matter, so far as coming within its particular provisions, when applied to public lands results in the rule that, where lands are devoted to some special public use by legislative authority, they are not included in general statutes concerning disposal of public lands.

2. Mines and minerals ⚿9—Oil Leasing Act held not to authorize issuance of permit for oil exploitations on state hospital grounds.

St. 1913, p. 884, provides for the establishment of a state hospital for the insane and purchase of a site therefor with title in the state, and, under Pol. Code, §§ 2145, 2146, 2150, Norwalk Hospital is a corporation, with power to condemn land, and is under control of board of managers, which board under Pol. Code, §§ 366c, 366d, as added by St. 1921, pp. 1048, 1049, is advisory to the state department of institutions. Held, that the grounds of Norwalk State Hospital, being land devoted to public use of the state, do not come within St. 1921, p. 404, providing that oil and other mineral deposits in lands belonging to the state are reserved to the state, but authorizing prospecting thereon under named conditions.

In Bank.

Application for mandamus by William A. McNeil against W. S. Kingsbury, as Surveyor General of the State of California. Denied.

Raymond Benjamin, of San Francisco, and Pierson M. Hall, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. Petitioner seeks a writ of mandate to compel the surveyor general of the state to issue to him a prospecting permit authorizing him to prospect for oil upon the grounds of the Norwalk State Hospital for the Insane at Norwalk, Cal. Petitioner's application is based upon a statute enacted by the Legislature May 25, 1921, going into effect July 29, 1921. Stats. 1921, p. 404, c. 303. Section 1 of this act provides that all oil and gas and—

> "other mineral deposits in lands belonging to the state, or which may become the property of the state, are hereby reserved to the state; provided, however, that nothing in this act shall apply to lands acquired by the state on a sale of delinquent taxes, except such land, the deed for which is required to be filed in the surveyor general's office. Such deposits are reserved from sale except upon a rental and royalty basis, as herein provided for; and a purchaser of any lands belonging to the state, or which may become the property of the state, shall acquire no right, title or interest in, or to, such deposits except as hereinafter expressly provided; and the right of such purchaser shall be subject to the reservation of all coal, oil, oil shale, gas, phosphate, sodium, and other mineral deposits, and to the conditions and limitations prescribed by law providing for the state and persons authorized by it to prospect for, mine, and remove such deposits, and to occupy and use so much of the surface of said land as may be required for all purposes reasonably extending to the mining and removal of such deposits therefrom."

Section 2 provides that all applications to purchase state lands filed subsequent to the passage of the act and all sales shall be subject to this reservation.

The land which the petitioner seeks to prospect for oil was acquired by the state of California under the terms of an act of the Legislature of the state of California, approved June 7, 1913, which went into effect August 10, 1913. Stats. 1913, p. 884, c. 455. This statute provided for the establishment of a state hospital for the care of the insane, for the selection of a suitable site therefor, and the erection of the necessary buildings thereon for a hospital for insane persons. It was further provided:

> "Not more than ninety thousand dollars of the money herein appropriated shall be used for the purchase of said site and water rights. Said site shall contain not less than three hundred acres of tillable land." Section 6.

It is provided that title to the land "shall be taken in the name of the state of California." Section 5. Section 4 of the statute provided:

> "* * * The control and management of said institution as a hospital for the insane shall be continued as and in the manner provided by law for the control, management and operation of state hospitals for the care of the insane."

By section 2145 of the Political Code, the Norwalk State Hospital is declared to be a corporation. Section 2146 of the Political Code provides:

> "Each of the corporations mentioned in the preceding section may acquire and hold in its corporate name by gift, grant, devise or bequest property to be applied to the maintenance of the inmates of the hospital and for the general use of the corporation. All lands necessary for the use of state hospitals must be acquired by condemnation as lands for other public uses are acquired, except those acquired by gift, devise or purchase, and the terms of every purchase must be approved by the commission. No public street or road for railway or other purposes, except for hospital use, must be opened through the lands of any state hospital, unless the Legislature by special enactment consents thereto."

By section 2150 of the Political Code, the board of managers of the state hospital has general control and direction of the property and concerns of the institution for which it is appointed, where not otherwise provided by law.

By an act subsequent to the Oil Leasing Act under which the petitioner seeks his permit, a department of institutions was created (Stats. 1921, p. 1047, c. 610), and this department succeeded to all the duties, powers, purposes, responsibility, and jurisdiction of the board of managers of the Norwalk State Hospital and other state institutions (section 366c, p. 1048, Stats. 1921), but the board of directors and managers and trustees of the institutions were continued in force in an advisory capacity to the department of institutions (Stats. 1921, p. 1049, § 366d).

The respondent contends that the statute providing for the acquisition, control, management, and use of the Norwalk State Hospital grounds, being a special statute applicable to use of those grounds, will control over the broad general language of the later act under which petitioner seeks his permit, and that the later act, general in terms, will not be held to have repealed the previous act devoting such land to an altogether different purpose. He also relies upon the general proposition that lands devoted to a public use are not subject to entry or sale under general laws affecting the public domain. Petitioner concedes the correctness of these general propositions, but asserts that the Oil Leasing Act under which he seeks his permit is a special act, in that it relates to subterranean rights only, and does not interfere with the surface, and that certain provisions in the act themselves indicate that the purpose of the Legislature was to deal with such properties as the Norwalk State Hospital grounds in its provisions concerning the granting of oil leases, and prospecting permits.

[1] The whole question involved is one of the intent of the Legislature in the passage of the Oil Leasing Act. No question is raised by either side as to the right of the state to sell or lease the land used by the Norwalk State Hospital, but the question is whether or not such provision has been made by the Legislature in the act in question. In short, the question is whether the Legislature, in the general terms used in the statute concerning state lands, intended such provisions to apply to land used and controlled by public corporations utilizing lands belonging to the state for the purpose of maintaining thereon hospitals for the care and treatment of the insane. That the terms of the statute are broad enough to cover such lands if literally construed is admitted, and hence the necessity of recourse to the well-established rules of construction stated by the Attorney General as follows:

> "The law does not favor a repeal by implication, and where two statutes treat the same subject, one being special and the other general, unless they are irreconcilably inconsistent, the latter, though later in date, will not be held to have repealed the former, but the special act will prevail in its application to the subject-matter, so far as coming within its particular provisions"—citing Bateman v. Colgan, 111 Cal.

580, 44 Pac. 238; People v. Pacific Imp. Co., 130 Cal. 442, 62 Pac. 739; Trinity County v. Mendocino Co., 151 Cal. 279, 90 Pac. 685; Reed Orchard Co. v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. App. 648, 128 Pac. 9, 18; Estate of Brewer, 156 Cal. 89, 103 Pac. 486.

[2] This principle applied to public lands results in the rule that where lands are devoted to some special public use by legislative authority they are not included within general statutes concerning the disposal of public lands. See Scott v. Carew, 196 U. S. 100, 25 Sup. Ct. 193, 49 L. Ed. 403; Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet. 498, 10 L. Ed. 264; Leavenworth L. & G. R. Co. v. U. S., 92 U. S. 733, 23 L. Ed. 634; Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 761, 23 L. Ed. 769; United States v. Midwest Oil Co., 236 U. S. 459, 35 Sup. Ct. 309, 59 L. Ed. 673; Buhne v. Chism, 48 Cal. 467. The petitioner seeks to break the force of these well-established rules by pointing out that the act in question deals only with the mineral rights in the land, and hence is a special statute on that subject, not inconsistent with the surface rights already in use by the public agencies of the state, and thus seeks to apply the terms of the Oil Leasing Act to all state lands whether or not already devoted to a public use. Petitioner points out some provisions of the Oil Leasing Act which he contends lead to the conclusion that the law was intended to apply to all lands belonging to the state. He insists that the reservation of oil in the lands of the state, made in section 1 of the act, is necessarily as applicable to lands occupied by state hospitals as to any other state land. The obvious answer to this contention is that it was unnecessary for the state to reserve rights in land which it owns in fee and which is not subject to sale except by special authority of the Legislature. These rights already belong to the state, and will remain in the state until the lands are sold pursuant to such legislative authority. The necessity for the reservation of mineral rights in state land only exists with reference to these lands already authorized to be sold, and the purpose of such reservation is to indicate the character of title that can be conveyed by the state officer authorized to execute such grant. Even without the aid of the above rule of construction, which would exclude from the general provisions of this statute land procured for special purposes and dedicated to those purposes, it is manifest on the face of the act itself that this reservation was intended to apply only to the public domain which was subject to sale under statutes in existence at the time the Oil Leasing Act was passed. The petitioner also insists that the provision of section 3 of the Oil Leasing Act, by which the surveyor general is not only authorized to classify the land of the state for its different possible values and uses, but is also authorized to require the state mineralogist, the director of agriculture or other organization, agency, or institution of the state government to make such classification, is an indication that the statute was intended to be applicable to all lands owned by the state. The very general provisions of this section do not point with any clearness to the construction that lands of the state, purchased for the purpose of the state and devoted to such purposes, are intended to be subject to sale or exploitation under the terms of the act. The legislators who passed this statute would undoubtedly be astonished to find an oil derrick erected upon the state capitol grounds under the authority vested in the surveyor general of the state by this statute, and no doubt would be equally surprised to see noisy oil well drilling outfits invade the grounds of hospitals for the insane where peace and quiet are so essential to proper treatment and recovery of the patients.

The statute expressly mentions river beds, lake beds, overflowed, tide, and submerged lands as subject to the issuance of prospecting permits (section 4, Stats. 1921, p. 405), and also reserves one sixteenth only of the mineral rights in state lands sold by the state (section 10). We cannot see that these provisions concerning lands held by the state by virtue of its sovereignty, and its public lands offered for sale under its public land laws, shed any light upon the question as to whether or not the statute was intended to apply to lands already devoted to a public use.

It is clear from the foregoing considerations that there is no reasonable basis for deciding that the act in question authorizes the surveyor general to issue permits for oil explorations upon the state hospital grounds at Norwalk. In view of this conclusion it is unnecessary to pass upon the other points advanced by the petitioner.

In re DOANE'S ESTATE.

DAYTONA INSTITUTE et al. v. DOW et al.

1. Wills 🔑487(3)—Letter not mentioned in will held not part thereof, and inadmissible to show testator's intent.

A letter, explaining that a bank, the residuary legatee under a will, was to take in trust for certain others, held inadmissible to show the testator's intent, where the will was clear and unambiguous, notwithstanding the bank would otherwise be disqualified to take, by Civ. Code, § 1275.

2. Wills 🔑97—Extrinsic writing must be clearly identified to become part of will.

To make an extrinsic writing a part of a will, it must be described in such clear, explicit, and unambiguous language as to leave its identity without doubt.

3. Wills 🔑487(5)—Parol evidence inadmissible to show testator intended bank to take as trustee, in absence of language creating trust.

Though a bank may have two legal capacities, one as an individual and one as a trustee, parol evidence is inadmissible to prove that a testator, who, by unambiguous language, left his residuary estate to a bank, intended it to take in the capacity of a trustee, for, in order to create a trust, some expression of intent is requisite.

4. Wills 🔑671—No particular form necessary to create.

No particular form of expression is necessary to create a trust, though some expression of intent to that end is requisite.

5. Wills 🔑446—Where language is clear, courts cannot construe will unnaturally to save it from condemnation.

Where the language of a will is clear and unambiguous, the courts may not wrest from it an unnatural meaning to save it from condemnation, however beneficial the testator's unexpressed intent may have been.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rivers, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of George S. Doane, deceased. Appeal by the Daytona Institute and others against Arthur P. Dow and others, from an order directing partial distribution. Affirmed.

Parker & Parker, of Pasadena, for appellants.

James G. Owen and Henry M. Willis, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

Hahn & Hahn, of Pasadena, for intervener Doane Orphanage.

G. A. Gibbs, of Pasadena, for National Bank & Trust Co. of Pasadena.

LENNON, J. By an order for partial distribution in the above-entitled cause it was decreed that George S. Doane died intestate as to the residuary portion of his estate, and that the residue of the estate be distributed to the heirs at law. The correctness of this adjudication is the sole question raised upon the present appeal.

Clause tenth of the last will and testament of the decedent, dated April 28, 1920, provides:

> "All the rest and residue of my property of whatever nature and wheresoever located, I give, devise and bequeath to the National Bank & Trust Company of Pasadena, a national banking association, of Pasadena, California."

The trial court's conclusion that this clause of the will is invalid is based upon section 1275 of the Civil Code, which provides that corporations other than counties, municipal corporations, and corporations formed for scientific, literary, or solely educational or hospital purposes cannot take under a will, unless expressly authorized by statute. Appellants concede that the National Bank & Trust Company of Pasadena is incompetent to take property under a will for its own use and benefit but contend that the residue of the estate must be distributed to the bank in its capacity of trustee; that being the only capacity in which the bank could lawfully receive the property. In support of the contention that it was the intention of the testator to devise and bequeath to the bank as trustee only, appellants introduced in evidence a letter signed by the decedent, and reading as follows:

> "National Bank & Trust Company of Pasadena, Pasadena, California—Gentlemen: I hereby request that you as residuary legatee under my last will and testament dated January 26, 1920, distribute any property or funds which may come to you as such residuary legatee, as follows:
> "1. To the Doane Orphanage ten thousand dollars ($10,000).
> "2. To the Rescue Mission, Springfield, Massachusetts, one thousand dollars ($1,000).
> "3. To the Daytona Institute of Daytona, Florida, three thousand dollars ($3,000).
> "4. To the Baptist Academy near St. Augustine, Florida, one thousand dollars ($1,000). * * * [Signed] George S. Doane.
> "Pasadena, Cal. January 26, 1920.
> "Witness: George S. Pooley, Pasadena, Calif.

> "An existing writing may by reference be incorporated into and made a part of a will. But before such an extrinsic document may be so incorporated the description of it in the will itself must be so clear, explicit and unambiguous as to leave its identity free from doubt."

Quoting from In re Shillaber, 74 Cal. 144, 15 Pac. 453, 5 Am. St. Rep. 433:

> "If the will be duly executed and attested, the paper referred to, whether attested or not, will become a part of the will, if it be already in existence, and is clearly described and identified. The identification must be by a description given of the paper in the will."

There is no identification or even mention of the letter in the will under consideration. Moreover, it will be noted that the letter itself refers to a will "dated, January 26, 1920," whereas the date of the will before the court is April 28, 1920. There is an attempt to overcome the discrepancy by evidence to the effect that the testator originally intended the letter to accompany a will executed on January 26, 1920, but that, having subsequently revoked that will, he declared on the occasion of the execution of the will of April 28, 1920, that he desired the letter to be in full force and applicable to the later will. The danger of accepting such evidence in the construction of wills is obvious, and therefore the necessity of the rule that a document cannot be incorporated as part of a will unless referred to therein is illustrated by the very facts of the case now presented.

[3-5] It is further contended by appellants that the National Bank & Trust Company of Pasadena has two legal capacities, one as an individual and one as a trustee, and in view of the presumption in favor of testacy, it is urged, parol proofs were admissible for the purpose of showing in which capacity the testator intended that the residuary legatee should take. This contention cannot be sustained, for the reason that there is no ambiguity or uncertainty in the language employed by the testator in disposing of the residue of his estate. While no particular form of expression is necessary for the creation of a trust, nevertheless some expression of intent to that end is requisite. Estate of Marti, 132 Cal. 666, 669, 61 Pac. 964, 64 Pac. 1071. In the present case there is nothing in the will in question which even hints at a restriction or limitation upon the residuary legatee. On the contrary, it affirmatively appears upon the face of the will that the residue is given, devised, and bequeathed, outright, to the National Bank & Trust Company of Pasadena, a national banking association of Pasadena, Cal. The bequest is absolute in terms.

> "Where the language of the provisions of a will is plain and unambiguous the courts are not permitted to wrest it from its natural import in order to save it from condemnation." Estate of Walkerly, 108 Cal. 627, 660, 41 Pac. 772, 780 (49 Am. St. Rep. 97).

The decedent having made an invalid provision in clear, unequivocal language, the courts are without power to alter that language to express what may have been in the testator's mind but was not attempted to be expressed by him, however beneficent such unexpressed intent may have been.

> "It may be said of all wills, that the testator's intent is to make a valid disposition of his property. * * * But a court is not therefore authorized to modify or vary the plain language of the testator, and thus create a new and valid will for him, even if it were certain that the testator would have adopted the interpretation of the court, had he known his own attempt was invalid." Estate of Walkerly, supra, 108 Cal. 627, 659, 41 Pac. 772, 780 (49 Am. St. Rep. 97).

The order appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. REYNOLDS. (Cr. 901.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 16, 1923.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1169(12)—Admission of evidence that accused gave prosecutrix liquor held nonprejudicial.

Evidence that accused had given the prosecutrix intoxicating liquor held nonprejudicial.

2. Criminal law 🔑1036(1)—Objection to testimony, not available at trial, held not proper to be considered on appeal.

Where the prosecutrix in a prosecution for rape testified to one act at a particular place, and it was shown on cross-examination that she had on preliminary examination fixed the act as occurring at a different place, held that the objection on appeal that accused was shown to have been held to answer for an offense other than that for which he had been placed on trial was not available to defendant on trial, and hence not proper to be considered on appeal.

3. Indictment and information 🔑137(6)—Motion to set aside remedy, where complaint and commitment at variance with information.

If the complaint and commitment based thereon charge an offense as having been committed on a different day from that set forth in the information, defendant's only remedy is under Penal Code, § 995, by a motion to set aside the information.

4. Witnesses 🔑379(9)—Discrepancies in prosecutrix's testimony at preliminary hearing and at trial properly considered as affecting credibility.

If the testimony of the prosecutrix at trial differs from her testimony given at the preliminary examination, that fact may properly be considered by the jury as affecting her credibility, but such discrepancies do not constitute ground for objection by accused.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

George W. Reynolds was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Emmons & Aldrich, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of rape, and appeals from the judgment of imprisonment.

[1] It was charged in the information that defendant, on or about the 28th day of March, 1921, in the county of Kern, committed the crime referred to. The other person concerned was a girl, who, it was charged in the information, was at the time of the age of 14 years. It was shown by the testimony of the girl in question that she had on several occasions voluntarily consented to acts of sexual intercourse with defendant. Defendant denied the charge, admitted that he was acquainted with the girl, and offered evidence to establish an alibi as to the date charged in the information. The court allowed evidence to be introduced showing that upon divers occasions defendant had given the girl intoxicating liquor to drink, and that he had given such liquor to others who happened at some of the times to be a part of the company present. The girl did not testify that she became intoxicated at all, and we cannot infer that such was the fact, or that her failing to show it was due to any reticence, for she testified, as the record indicates, boldly and unhesitatingly as to the facts showing her illicit relations with defendant, and she exhibited very complete knowledge of the meaning of the terms necessary to describe the acts referred to. Appellant complains that it was highly prejudicial to his right to a fair trial to allow the district attorney to make proof of his habit of drinking liquor and of having given it to the girl and other companions to drink. It is not necessary to make a close analysis of the argument addressed to this proposition, for the record discloses that the girl was allowed to testify without objection to the fact that defendant, upon at least two occasions, gave her liquor to drink. Assuming that evidence of the giving of liquor to others was wholly irrelevant, we cannot see how defendant was injured thereby.

[2-4] The prosecution was allowed to prove the commission of acts of sexual intercourse separate from that which was shown to have been committed on the particular day charged in the information; this under the rule which is too familar to require any statement as to the reason supporting it. The prosecution elected to rely upon an act which the girl testified occurred on the 28th day of March in a tent a short way from her father's house. The girl fixed the happening of a like occurrence at another time and at a place near the Kern river bridge. By the cross-examination of this witness it was shown that at the preliminary examination she had testified to but one such occurrence, and had at that time fixed the act as having been committed near the bridge. Appellant's counsel insists that because of the variance his client was shown to have been held to answer for an offense other than that for which he was placed on trial. This objection was not available to the defendant at the trial; hence is not proper to be considered on his appeal. It seems to be admitted, for the contrary is not shown, that by the commitment of the magistrate the defendant was held to answer for the crime of rape which was charged to have been committed at the same time and place as the rape charged in the information filed by the district attorney. But if such had not been the case, and if the complaint in the justice's court and the commitment based thereon had charged the offense as having been committed on a day different from that set forth in the information, defendant's only remedy would have been to move to set aside the information on the ground that he had never been legally committed for the offense as therein charged. Pen. Code, § 995. The discrepancies, if such there were, between the testimony of the girl given at the trial and that given at the preliminary examination were matters which the jury had a right to take into consideration for the purpose of determining her credibility, but such discrepancies would not furnish ground for the objection which appellant has argued. The information was clear in the statement of the charge as to the date, place, and other essential facts; the district attorney gave notice of his election to stand upon his proof directed to the particular date charged, and there was evidence to make out the case as claimed by the prosecution. The court was careful to advise the jury that the prosecution was required to make proof beyond a reasonable doubt of the commission of the act described on the particular day charged, and further advised the jury as to the limited effect which should be given the evidence as to the other and independent acts. The instructions, taken as a whole, clearly and fully advised the jury of the law as it appllied to the case before it. No error appears from which it could be inferred that defendant has been prejudiced in his right to a fair trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

DIAMOND MATCH CO. v. ÆTNA CASUALTY & SURETY CO. (Civ. 2482.)

1. Pleading 🔑403(3)—Answer admitting partial liability of surety precludes attack on sufficiency of complaint.

Even though a complaint against the surety on an undertaking for the payment of materials to be used in constructing a school building was insufficient to state a cause of action, because it failed to allege that the undertaking which was attached to the complaint was executed by the defendant, the defendant cannot raise that objection on appeal, after it had filed an answer below admitting its liability for a portion of the amount claimed, which was equivalent to an agreed statement of all the facts except the amount of liability, even though Code Civ. Proc. § 447, providing that, when the written instrument on which the action is brought is annexed to the complaint, the due execution of the instrument is deemed to be admitted, unless the answer denying it be verified, furnishes a rule of evidence only and not of pleading.

2. Trial 🔑397(1)—Finding on undisputed issue is unnecessary.

It is not necessary to make a finding upon a fact that is not disputed.

3. Principal and surety 🔑162(4)—Findings held to show execution of instrument sued on.

In an action on a bond to secure payment for building material, a finding that "the bond executed and delivered by defendant as surety for the contractor, and upon which the action was brought, did not provide," etc., is a sufficient finding of the execution of the bond by defendant, under the rule requiring construction of the findings, if possible, so as to uphold the judgment.

4. Interest 🔑39(1)—Allowed in quantum meruit on amount admitted to be due from date of answer making admission.

Though, ordinarily, the rule with reference to the allowance of interest is not the same in an action on quantum meruit as in one based on an express contract, interest can be allowed in the former case on the amount which defendant admitted to be due from the date of filing of the answer containing the admission, though interest on the balance recovered by plaintiff can be allowed only from the date of the judgment.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1140(5)—New trial unnecessary to correct erroneous allowance of interest which involves mere computation.

A new trial need not be granted for the erroneous allowance of interest, which can be corrected by a mere computation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by the Diamond Match Company against the Ætna Casualty & Surety Company, on an undertaking to secure payment for building material. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Judgment modified by reducing the amount of interest, and as modified affirmed.

George R. Freeman, of Willows, for appellant.

George F. Jones, of Oroville, and L. W. Hughes, of Corning, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was brought to recover on an undertaking executed by defendant, to secure the payment by W. R. Zumwalt to plaintiff of the amount due for lumber and building material furnished to said Zumwalt for the construction of a public school building in Corning, Tehama county, and plaintiff recovered judgment for the sum of $6,553.54, with interest thereon from March 11, 1921, the date of the filing of the complaint. The appeal is from the judgment, and the contentions of appellant are, first, that the complaint is fatally defective; second, that the findings do not support the judgment; and, third, that interest should not have been allowed until the judgment was rendered.

The particular point as to the complaint is that there is no allegation that the undertaking was executed by defendant, and it is claimed that, although no demurrer was filed, the question goes to the sufficiency of the statement of a cause of action and can be raised at any time. Appellant relies upon San Francisco S. Co. v. Ætna I. Co., 7 Cal. App. 98, 93 Pac. 888, and similar decisions. In the first of these it was said:

> "It is elementary that in order to state a cause of action against a surety upon an undertaking, the complaint must in some way allege or show that the defendant executed or delivered the undertaking."

On the other hand, it is the contention of respondent that this fact sufficiently appears to withstand a general demurrer or, at any rate, a cause of action is stated under the Public Works Bond Act of March 27, 1897 (Stats. of 1897, p. 201), as amended in 1911 (Stats. of 1911, p. 1422); and attention is called to the various allegations of the complaint setting out the corporate capacity of the parties, the fact that a contract in writing was executed on February 11, 1920, by said Zumwalt and said school district for the erection of a public school building; that said contract was duly recorded; that said Zumwalt, "before entering upon the performance of said work, duly filed with the said board of trustees * * * a bond of which the following is a true and correct copy" (the bond being set out in full); that said bond was in the sum of not less than one-half of the total amount payable to the said W. R. Zumwalt by the terms of said contract, and that it was duly approved by said board of trustees before being filed; that plaintiff sold to said Zumwalt lumber and building material of the value of $16,507.33, to be used, and which were used, in said building, the amount paid and the balance still due on said claim were also alleged; that the work was finished on January 15, 1921, and that the notice of completion was filed in the county recorder's office on January 20, 1921; that on December 17, 1920, plaintiff filed with said board of trustees its verified statement of claim against the contractor and "that 90 days have not elapsed since the completion and acceptance of said building or since the filing of said verified claim."

[1] Whether there should have been an additional specific allegation that said undertaking was executed by defendant it is unnecessary to decide, for the reason that it is entirely apparent that, under the peculiar facts of the case, appellant was not prejudiced by the absence of such allegation, and it should not be permitted to raise the objection now. This will appear from the following statement: The default of defendant was entered for its failure to appear, but thereafter, on motion, the default was set aside and an answer was filed, in which the only issue tendered was as to the amount due to plaintiff from said Zumwalt, defendant claiming that it was $6,431.18 instead of $7,158.54, as claimed by plaintiff. Thereafter, on June 15, 1921, an amendment to the answer was filed, stating the amount due to be $6,297.68, and praying "that plaintiff take judgment for no greater sum that the sum of $6,297.68." Another amendment was subsequently filed after trial, in which it was claimed that Zumwalt was entitled to a credit of $234.10 for work done by him which should have been done by plaintiff. Since a copy of the undertaking was set out in the complaint, the case is one for the application of section 447 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing:

> "When an action is brought upon a written instrument, and the complaint contains a copy of such instrument, or a copy is annexed thereto, the genuineness and due execution of such instrument are deemed admitted, unless the answer denying the same be verified."

Herein there was no denial of the same, the only denial being, as we have seen, as to the exact amount which was due. Appellant claims that the section furnishes a rule of evidence but not of pleading. If we concede that it is thus correctly characterized, it cannot be disputed that the situation is the same in effect as if the appellant had admitted or stated in open court that said undertaking was genuine and was duly executed. Indeed, in view of said exhibition of the bond and the only denial of the answer as to the amount due, the court was called upon to try only that one issue and appellant is in the same situation as though it had admitted that such was the only controversy in the case. Under such circumstances, the practical and sensible rule in the interest of the expeditious administration of justice precludes an appellant from successfully maintaining on appeal that one of the material issues was not sufficiently presented by the complaint. Indeed, the case is the same in principle as though there was an agreed statement of all the material facts, except the single one to which we have referred. This phase of the matter is governed by the principle announced in such cases as Cushing v. Pires, 124 Cal. 663, 57 Pac. 572; Throop v. Weaver, 180 Cal. 335, 181 Pac. 55; Slaughter v. Goldberg, Bowen & Co., 26 Cal. App. 318, 147 Pac. 90; Boyle v. Coast Improvement Co., 27 Cal. App. 714, 151 Pac. 25; Ruperd v. Hunter, 40 Cal. App. 96, 180 Pac. 638. In the first of these it is said:

> "It is true that the objection that the complaint does not state a cause of action may be successfully made for the first time on appeal, but the appellate court will not be overzealous to find a defect in a complaint that the appellant himself failed to discover until the case had been decided against him on its merits."

In the second, the court declares:

> "Appellants also make the point that the cross-complaint does not state a cause of action, their criticism really being that the cause of action pleaded is not a proper matter for cross-complaint. Conceding this to be true, they cannot here raise the point as they joined issue upon said cross-complaint and went to trial without demurrer or objection."

In the Goldberg Case the court declared:

> "It seems to us that the reformed procedure would receive a decided shock, if a defendant should be permitted to stand by and without objection allow an issue to be tried as though properly presented by the pleadings and on appeal escape the consequences by claiming that the complaint failed to present such issue."

Therein, it is to be observed, there was omitted from the complaint an essential element in the statement of a cause of action, but it was held to be unjust to permit appellant to maintain the point an appeal.

In Boyle v. Coast Improvement Co., supra, it was said:

> "If counsel were of the opinion that the complaint stated no cause of action, or, if they conceived that the negligence to the proof of which the testimony was directed was not the negligence pleaded and relied upon in the complaint, they should have objected to the evidence upon that specific ground, and their failure to do so supplied the deficiency of the complaint in that respect or any omission to allege therein facts essential to the statement of a cause of action."

The last two decisions were cited with approval in the Ruperd Case, supra, and in all three a hearing was denied by the Supreme Court. Assuredly, there is as much reason herein as in any of those cases for disallowing this belated objection.

[2, 3] A similar objection has been made to the findings, but, since the genuineness and due execution of the instrument are deemed admitted, no finding thereon was required. Our practice does not demand a finding upon a fact that it is not disputed. Besides, the execution of the bond does sufficently appear in finding 4:

> "That the bond executed and delivered by the defendant herein as surety for the said W. R. Zumwalt, and upon which this action is brought, does not provide," etc.

Of course, the rule is to construe the findings, if possible, so as to uphold the judgment, and we think the application of that rule to this case does not give rise to any serious difficulty.

[4] As to the allowance of interest, there seems to be some merit in the contention of appellant. The liability of the surety, admittedly, is coextensive with that of the principal and the latter's obligation was based upon a quantum meruit. Ordinarily, in reference to the allowance for interest, a distinction exists between such case and one based upon an express contract. Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 18 Pac. 100, 99 Am. St. Rep. 164; Courteney v. Standard Box Co., 16 Cal. App. 600, 117 Pac. 778; Merchants' C. Agency v. Gopcevic, 23 Cal. App. 216, 137 Pac. 609; Sea v. Lorden, 37 Cal. App. 444, 174 Pac. 85; Erickson v. Stockton, etc., Co., 148 Cal. 206, 82 Pac. 961.

However, in Gray v. Bekins, 186 Cal. 389, 199 Pac. 767, the defendants admitted in the answer that the amount was due as subsequently found by the trial court, and, in discussing the question, the Supreme Court said:

> "The test, then, to be applied in the instant case is whether or not the exact sum found to be due was known and admitted by the defendants to be due to the plaintiffs. We are of the opinion that the allegations of the defendants' answer in the particulars previously pointed out constituted an acknowledgment of plaintiffs' claim, to the extent of the sum therein admitted, and by the trial court found to be due to the plaintiffs. In short, the admission of the defendants' answer in this behalf was tantamount to the ascertainment of the balance found to be due the plaintiffs, and, consequently, interest should have been allowed thereon from the date of the filing of the answer, namely, March 27, 1907. Skinker v. Clute, 9 Nev. 342."

Herein, on April 22, 1921, appellant filed an answer in which it admitted expressly that the sum of $6,431.18 was due, and offered to allow judgment to be entered for that sum in favor of plaintiff and against defendant, provided that an order given by said Zumwalt on February 28, 1921, to the board of trustees for the payment of that sum to plaintiff was not accepted and the money therein paid to the plaintiff. But, as we have seen, on June 15, this was amended, so as to admit that $6,297.68 was due. Under the settled rule, therefore, plaintiff should be allowed interest on that sum from the date of the filing of the amended answer, and on the amount found due from the time of the judgment. It is to be observed that this is in accordance with the provision of section 1917 of the Civil Code, allowing interest on an "account, from the day an which the balance is ascertained." Herein, the admission in the answer is equivalent to an ascertainment on that date that $6,297.68 was due, but the difference between that sum and the said $6,553.54 was not ascertained till the date of the judgment.

[5] As the question involves a mere matter of computation there is no necessity for a new trial.

The judgment is modified by striking therefrom the phrase "together with interest thereon from the date of the commencement of this action, to wit, March 11, 1921," and substituting therefor "together with interest on the sum of $6,297.68 from June 15, 1921, to the date of the judgment, and interest on the sum of $6,553.54 from the date of the judgment," and, as thus modified, the judgment is affirmed.

Homicide ⚷250—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for manslaughter.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for manslaughter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

E. H. De Vaul was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals from the judgment and order denying new trial. Affirmed.

F. W. Taft, of Willits, and Will Van Dyke, of Ukiah, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was indicted by the grand jury of Mendocino county for the crime of murder, and, on being tried, was convicted of the crime of manslaughter. A motion for a new trial was made in his behalf and the same denied. He appeals from the judgment and the order disallowing his motion for a new trial.

of the accused duly notified by the clerk of this court of that fact; but no appearance was made for the defendant before this court when the appeal was regularly called for hearing. No brief in support of the appeal was then on file, nor has any since been filed by or for the accused. We have, nevertheless, read the testimony and thus incidentally noticed the rulings upon proffered but challenged evidence and also have read the charge of the court to the jury. Our conclusion from the examination so given the record is that the verdict is amply supported and the rulings and instructions free from substantial error. Indeed, as to the question (if there be such question here intended to be raised) whether the verdict derives sufficient support from the evidence, we are led to observe that, accepting, as we must, the testimony presented by the people as truly disclosing the circumstances attending the commission of the homicide, the jury appear to have been singularly lenient with the accused.

The homicide took place near the town of Willits, in Mendocino county, on the 25th day of January, 1922. Although the defendant was the father-in-law of the deceased, each, it seems, nursed a violent hatred for the other. They met on the day above named at the home of the defendant's son, and immediately engaged in a bitter altercation, which culminated in a "fist fight," in which, after each had struck the other blows about the face, the two men fell or one or the other was knocked to the ground, with the deceased on the top of the defendant. While they were in this position, the deceased beat the defendant about the face and head. A bystander finally persuaded the deceased to cease fighting and to get up, and both men arose to their feet. As the deceased was leaving the spot where the fight took place, and when about six feet from the defendant, the latter drew a revolver and fired at the deceased; the bullet entering the left hip and passing into and through certain parts of the intestines. The deceased fell to the ground, and the defendant thereupon stepped to where he was lying and began kicking him about the body, particularly on the head and face. The deceased soon lost consciousness; but prior thereto, and while the defendant was still engaged in kicking him, he begged the defendant to cease kicking him and implored him to "let me die in peace." The deceased died the following day from the effects of the bullet wound, aided, perhaps, by the kicking which the defendant had administered to him while he was lying prostrate and helpless upon the ground. The autoptical report of the doctor making such examination showed that, in addition to the bullet wound, the body of the deceased, including the head and the face, was marked with a number of severe bruises, abrasions, and contusions.

The above is a sufficient statement of the facts to confirm the declaration made at the outset that, in finding the defendant guilty of manslaughter, the jury seemed to have shown great, if not unwarranted, mercy to the accused; for, if the evidence, as above outlined, does not bring the defendant's act within the definition of murder of the first degree, the case as made by the evidence, without doubt, borders dangerously close thereto.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. McCURDY. (Cr. 672.)

Infants ⚷20—Acts of defendant held to constitute offense of lewd conduct with child.

In a prosecution for violating Pen. Code, § 288, punishing lewd conduct with a child with intent to arouse or gratify lust or passion, evidence held to show that the acts committed by defendant with a 13 year old girl were such as are denounced by that section.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Wm. McCurdy, who answers his true name to be W. R. McCourtie, was convicted of violating Pen. Code, § 288, and he appeals. Affirmed.

R. P. Talbot, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was convicted in the superior court of the county of Sacramento under an information charging him with the commission of lewd and lascivious acts upon and with the body of a female child under the age of 14 years. Pen. Code, § 288. He made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and he prosecutes this appeal from the judgment of conviction and the order denying him a trial de novo.

The sole point upon which the defendant relies for a reversal is that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. The specific contention is that, conceding it to be true that the accused did all the acts which the prosecutrix testified that he committed upon her body, such acts were not of a nature to bring the defendant's conduct in committing them within the purview or the condemnation of section 288 of the Penal Code.

The crime charged was committed in the month of May, 1922, at which time the prosecutrix was approximately two months over the age of 13 years, and resided in North Sacramento, in Sacramento county. She testified that, on a Saturday early in the month of May, 1922, she was a passenger on the auto stage running between the city of Sacramento and North Sacramento, and on her way to her home; that there were in that stage at the same time other passengers, of whom several were women; that the defendant, who then was a perfect stranger to her, boarded the stage near a railroad station known as Ben Ali, and took a seat beside her; that at a point a short distance from Ben Ali the women passengers left the stage, leaving as the only occupants thereof herself and the defendant and another man, whose name it was subsequently learned was J. C. Hornbeck; that immediately after the women passengers had left the stage, the defendant placed his hand on her leg and pinched it, or to use her own language: "He pinched it and felt of it." He continued this conduct until the point was reached where she was to leave the stage; that, as she was about to alight from the stage, the defendant preceded her to the ground and took hold of her under the arm, and "lifted" her to the ground; that, after reaching the ground, he held onto her elbow, and, after the stage had gotten a short distance from where they stood, he placed his hands around her and pressed her body to his, at the same time saying to her: "You are just old enough to feel good, aren't you?" To this she replied: "I don't know, and he said he knew." She testified:

> "He told me to come up to his place some time and let him feel of my legs and breast, and love me up, and he said I was almost a woman," all this time still holding her body against his.

She stated that when he asked her to "come to his place some time" he pointed "up the road," and said that he "lived up there." She continued:

> "I pushed away from him, but he just held me deep in his arm, and then when he let me go, why I walked fast until I was out of his sight, and he kept calling up the road to me, 'Little girl, little girl;' and before I left, he told me not to tell my mother, and he said: 'Now, you will come up to my place, now, won't you?' And I told him I didn't think I would, and I started away from him, and then I walked along fast until I got off the side, and he kept calling, 'Little girl, little girl;' and after I got on the side I started to run home."

The witness Hornbeck, above named, testified that he saw the defendant place his hand on the girl's lap and leg while they were riding along. He stated, in response to a question on cross-examination, that the familiarities taken by the defendant with the prosecutrix rather led him to suppose that the girl was a relative of the defendant—a granddaughter, perhaps.

The defendant admitted that he had never met or seen the prosecutrix prior to the day of the commission of the alleged acts, but positively denied that he hugged her or pressed her body against his. He further denied saying to her that she was "just old enough to feel good," or that he invited her to visit his place some time for the purpose stated by the prosecutrix. He would not say positively that, while in the auto bus, he did not place his hand on her leg; nor would he likewise say that he did not request the prosecutrix not to tell her mother of the happenings described by the girl. He further stated that it was possible that he might have asked her not to tell her mother "something"; that he "might have told her anything," but that he had no recollection of making any such request of the prosectrix; that there was no reason why he should have made such a request.

The above comprises a statement in substance of all the testimony given at the trial. It is not questioned here, nor could it be successfully, that, if the conduct of the defendant towards the prosecutrix involved acts which come within the ban of section 288 of the Penal Code, the testimony affords ample support to the verdict. Therefore the single question is, as above stated, whether the acts committed by the defendant are such as are interdicted and penalized by the section named. Said section reads as follows:

> "Any person who shall willfully and lewdly commit any lewd or lascivious act, other than the acts constituting other crimes provided for in part two [one] of this Code, upon or with the body, or any part or member thereof, of a child under the age of fourteen years, with the intent of arousing, appealing to, or gratifying the lust or passions or sexual desires of such person, or of such child, shall be guilty of a felony, and shall be imprisoned in the state prison not less than one year."

One of the essential elements of the offense, if, indeed, not the real gist thereof, is in the intent with which the act is done or committed, and the intent may, of course, be betrayed by the nature of the act or any other circumstances which may tend to discover a wicked state of mind in the perpetrator with reference to the act or acts. Whether the acts actually, or in point of fact have the effect of arousing the passions or sexual desires of the person upon whom they are committed is immaterial. If the acts are of a lascivious nature, and the intent is to arouse the passions or sexual desires of the party upon whom they are committed, then the crime is consummated. In the present case, the defendant, at the time of the occurrences responsible for his prosecution and conviction was a stranger to the prosecutrix, they never having seen each other before; and, judging from the testimony of the witness Hornbeck, he was so far her senior in years as to justify said witness in forming the opinion, from his conduct towards the prosecutrix, that he was her grandfather. Under these circumstances, the act of the accused in feeling of and pinching the leg of the prosecutrix was of itself sufficient to suggest libidinous notions and perhaps to generate lustful desires in an infant of unmatured judgment and of little or no worldly experience. But, even if that act alone cannot be held to be sufficient to show an evil intention in the defendant or to bring his conduct within the denunciation of the statute, it cannot be doubted that the acts subsequently committed by him upon the prosecutrix were, not only of a lascivious nature, but were such as irresistibly to lead to the conclusion that they were intended by the defendant to arouse in the prosecutrix lustful desires. Indeed, if those acts in themselves were not such as plainly to show that his intention was thus to arouse the passions of the prosecutrix and so excite in her lustful desires, what he said to her at the time he got hold of her and pressed his body against hers clearly disclosed that those acts were committed with such intention. In fact, what other motive or purpose or intent could have been in the mind of this stranger to the little girl in treating her as she described? The question answers itself.

Our conclusion is that the testimony, as a whole, if true (and the jury so regarded it), clearly shows that the conduct of the defendant towards the girl involved the commission of acts which section 288 of the Penal Code denounces as a felony.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

1. Criminal law 🔑742(1)—Question for jury whether witness is willfully evasive or his memory deficient.

It is for the jury to determine whether one who is apparently an unwilling witness is deficient in memory or merely willfully evasive.

2. Criminal law 🔑673(4)—Evidence limited as against one defendant cannot be considered against another, though it was admissible against him.

Though statements made by two defendants, charged as conspirators, may have been admissible against either defendant as statements made in furtherance of the alleged conspiracy, still, where such testimony upon introduction has been expressly limited to one defendant it cannot thereafter be considered against both, because if it had been admitted against the second defendant he might have been able to disprove it.

3. Conspiracy 🔑45—Time of soliciting money properly considered in determining intended purpose.

The fact that money to defeat a contemplated local prohibition ordinance, either by influencing the vote of the county supervisors or bringing about a referendum in case of its passage, was solicited before the supervisors had voted, and before it was known whether a referendum would be needed, is a circumstance that may properly be considered in determining the use intended.

4. Conspiracy 🔑47—Evidence held to sustain conviction for conspiracy to bribe county supervisors.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for a conspiracy to bribe county supervisors.

5. Criminal law 🔑1159(2)—Appellate court considers only sufficiency, not weight, of evidence.

The appellate court has to do only with the sufficiency of evidence, not its weight.

6. Conspiracy 🔑44½—Criminal purpose may be inferred.

Criminal purpose of defendants charged with conspiracy may be inferred from their acts and declarations.

7. Conspiracy 🔑47—Evidence held to establish doing of overt act.

Evidence held sufficient to establish the doing of overt acts, consisting of soliciting money to influence county supervisors' vote, pursuant to an agreement which would amount to a conspiracy under Pen. Code, § 184, as amended by St. 1919, p. 170.

8. Conspiracy 🔑27—Overt act need not be of itself criminal.

An overt act, pursuant to an agreement sufficient to complete the crime of conspiracy, need not of itself be criminal.

9. Criminal law 🔑427(5)—Abuse of discretion in admitting proof of conspirators' declarations held not shown.

Showing held insufficient to establish an abuse of discretion on the part of the court in permitting proof of declarations by alleged coconspirators, without sufficient independent evidence of the alleged conspiracy.

10. Criminal law 🔑696(7)—Motion to strike testimony should be specifically directed to objectionable part.

A motion to strike an answer, only part of which is objectionable, should be directed specifically to the objectionable part.

11. Criminal law 🔑1159(2)—Court cannot interfere with verdict supported by sufficient evidence.

Where there is sufficient evidence to support a verdict, the appellate court cannot interfere.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; George H. Thompson, Judge.

Walter E. Beck and John C. Calvert were convicted of conspiracy, and they appeal. Affirmed.

E. Fitzgerald, of Placerville, and Eugene S. Wachhorst, Donald E. Wachhorst, and T. A. Farrell, all of Sacramento (George A. Work, of Sacramento, of counsel), for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendants were convicted of conspiracy and prosecute this appeal from the judgment of conviction and the order denying their motion for a new trial. The indictment charges that the defendants conspired to bribe one of the supervisors of El Dorado county to influence his vote upon the question of adopting a prohibition ordinance, and that they—

> "in pursuance of said conspiracy and to effect the object thereof, did each contribute * * * the sum of twenty dollars * * * and did solicit money from one E. J. Barrett and from other persons to the grand jury unknown; and * * * did collect and receive * * * the sum of twenty dollars * * * from one John Zugnoni."

The defendant Beck was the proprietor of a hotel, and the defendant Calvert of the Klub Café in Placerville. Barrett and Zugnoni were in business in Camino, a few miles above Placerville, and Seymour Hill, a witness at the trial, conducted a business at El Dorado, a few miles below. It is to be inferred from the evidence that these five persons sold soft drinks at their respective places of business. In November, 1921, the board of supervisors had under consideration the adoption of an ordinance prohibiting the unlawful manufacture, possession, transportation, and sale of intoxicating liquors. The proposed ordinance was defeated by a majority vote of the supervisors on the 8th of November. Appellants' main contention is that the evidence is insufficient to prove such conspiracy. Some of the evidence was admitted generally as bearing upon the charge against both defendants, some parts thereof were expressly limited by the prosecuting attorney and the court to the charge against Beck, and other parts to that against Calvert. The testimony will be stated accordingly under three heads.

Evidence Not Limited.

The defendant Calvert testified:

> That, in a conversation between himself and Beck, on the 5th of November, the latter "spoke of the Little Volstead Act which was coming up for a vote before the board of supervisors the following week. He told me he had been led to believe it might pass, and, if it did, he suggested we get busy and start a referendum to put it to a vote of the people, which had been done the spring previous when he and Mr. Bert Simmons, who was then the proprietor of the Klub Café, had stood the cost, or most of the cost of the referendum." That on the 7th of November he took Mrs. Calvert, at her request, down to El Dorado to meet the Seymour Hill family, arriving there about 9:30 in the forenoon. That in a conversation there with Hill "I mentioned the fact about this Little Volstead Act coming up. * * * I told him what Mr. Beck had led me to believe that they might pass it, and that it would be a good thing to get busy and take up a little money to start a referendum. * * * Mr. Hill * * * said he wished to Christ they would pass the Little Volstead Act." That he and his wife returned to Placerville, and that the latter then suggested that they drive up to Camino "and perhaps have an Italian dinner." That they proceeded to Camino and arrived at Zugnoni's place about noon, where they had lunch. That after lunch his wife requested him to take her up to see a dance hall which he had told her about, and that they drove up to a point near Barrett's place, where the witness left his wife in the machine and proceeded on foot to Barrett's place of business. That "I passed the time of day with Mr. Barrett; I said to him, * * * 'I met our friend Beck as I was coming up to Camino' which I had met Mr. Beck a couple of miles down from Camino. Mr. Barrett said: 'Yes, what the hell do you think he was up here doing?' I said: 'I don't know.' He says: * * * 'He has been up here trying to gather up some money to start a referendum, he says they are going to pass the Little Volstead Act over you fellows down there.' * * * I said: 'I believe myself they are.' * * * Barrett says: 'I wish to Christ they would.' That he did not 'have a chance' to ask Barrett for money for the referendum. That 'Mr. Barrett was in favor that they pass the Volstead Act.'"

Zugnoni testified:

> That some time prior to November 11th Beck called at his place of business and asked for money; that he did not remember for what purpose Beck desired the money, but thought it was for a bill which Mrs. Zugnoni owed; that Beck did not state the amount he desired; that he (Zugnoni) did not have the money at the time, but paid Beck $20 November 11th.

[1] Zugnoni was apparently an unwilling witness for the prosecution. He testified that his memory was very poor and most of his answers were: "I don't remember." It was for the jury to determine whether the witness was deficient in memory or willfully evasive.

Evidence Limited to Charge Against Beck.

Barrett testified:

> That Beck met him at Camino on the 7th of November and "told me that the supervisors were about to meet, and that the Little Volstead Act was coming up to be voted on. He said that the vote could be turned, but it would take a little change. He said there were two wet and two dry; that is about all." That Beck said the fifth supervisor "was on the fence."

The witness then answered questions as follows:

"Q. Did or did not, in that conversation, Mr. Beck say to you anything about money or the amount of money which it would take to influence this vote? A. He did. Q. What amount, if any, did he state? A. Twenty dollars. * * * I contended it was too cheap to have anything to do with. Q. During that conversation whose name, if any, was mentioned in connection with this matter—what other name if any? * * * The name of anybody else who would be likely to contribute, or who would be asked to contribute money? * * * A. He mentioned John Zugnoni of Camino and John George, the Ivy House, Pacifico's, and Seymour Hill, * * * himself and Calvert. Q. Did or did not you in response to that request or that suggestion give Mr. Beck any money? A. I did not. * * * He told me it would take $20 apiece, and I took it for granted he was asking me for that amount, but the exact words he used I can't relate. * * * He told me it might take more later on."

Evidence Limited to Charge Against Calvert.

Barrett testified:

That on the 7th of November, after Beck had left, Calvert called at the witness' place of business. That "when he first came in he said: 'I met Beck going down the road' and he wanted to know if he didn't see me; * * * I said, 'Yes,' and I went on to explain to him what he was there for. * * * I gave him my version of it. * * * He told me that Seymour Hill was of the same opinion that I was." That no reference was made to a referendum while Calvert was there.

Hill testified:

That Calvert called on him at El Dorado on the 7th of November and "spoke something about raising a little fund of money for something, and he wanted to know what I thought about it; in fact, he never talked very much to me about it." That he mentioned the name of one of the supervisors, and "I told him I didn't want anything more to do with it. * * * He says: 'I don't think much about it myself.' * * * He mentioned" the name of a supervisor "and I said: 'I don't know anything about what you intend to do, but in my opinion it would not get any further than his pocket anyhow.'"

Charles Hand, sheriff of the county, testified:

That on the 13th of December he called Calvert to the sheriff's office, and "I informed Mr. Calvert of the facts in the case as I understood them, and Mr. Calvert told me that Mr. Zugnoni had contributed $20 and that Mr. Beck had contributed $20 and that he had contributed $20; that there was $60 raised. * * * He said it was for the purpose of influencing the board of supervisors on the vote that was to be taken on the Little Volstead Act. He said, furthermore, * * * that he did not think very much of the proposition, but he did not want to appear cheap and be a piker so he said: 'I just threw them $20.'"

Other witnesses testified to admissions made by Calvert but their testimony is only cumulative and need not be stated.

[2-6] If it be conceded that the statements of Beck and Calvert, as related by Barrett and Hill, were admissible as evidence against both defendants, on the theory that they were statements made in furtherance of the alleged conspiracy, such evidence can be considered only with relation to the charge against the defendant, to whose case it was expressly limited, because the other defendant might possibly have been able to disprove such testimony if it had been admitted as evidence against him. Keeping in mind such limitation, it is fairly to be inferred from the evidence of Calvert, which was not limited, that on the 5th of November the defendants agreed to raise money for the defeat of the proposed ordinance, either by influencing the supervisors to vote against its adoption, or by bringing about a referendum in case of its passage. On the 7th of November they both went out to raise the necessary funds. The fact that they solicited money prior to the time at which the supervisors were to vote upon the ordinance, at a time when they did not know whether a referendum would be necessary, is a circumstance to be considered in determining what use they intended to make of the money. Zugnoni's testimony, which was not limited, shows that Beck solicited and was paid $20 for some purpose, and, still keeping in mind the limitations upon the testimony, the jury was warranted in believing from the evidence admitted against either defendant that this money was solicited and received for the purpose of carrying out the agreement of November 5th. In view of the manner of his testifying and the character of his testimony, the jury may well have believed Zugnoni's statements as to the solicitation and payment of the money and refused to accept his statement that he thought the money was given in payment of a bill which his wife owed to Beck. Then particularly as to the charge against Beck, the testimony of Barrett is sufficient to show that Beck was endeavoring to raise money to bribe one of the supervisors. Calvert's interview with Hill and Barrett and his admissions to the sheriff are amply sufficient to show that he was endeavoring to accomplish the same purpose. It is true that Calvert denied the incriminating statements attributed to him, but this court has to do only with the sufficiency of the evidence, not its weight. The criminal purpose of the defendants was not proved by direct evidence, but may be inferred from their acts and declarations. In cases such as this, the prosecution is usually under the necessity of relying on the testimony of unwilling witnesses for a conviction. As said in Jenkins v. Commonwealth, 167 Ky. 544, 180 S. W. 961, 3 A. L. R. 1522, 1532:

"From the nature of the crime itself it is difficult to prove a criminal conspiracy by direct evidence, and such conspiracies are most always proved by circumstantial and 'piecemeal' evidence."

[7] Section 184 of the Penal Code (as amended by St. 1919, p. 170) provides:

> "No agreement amounts to a conspiracy, unless some act, beside such agreement, be done within this state to effect the object thereof, by one or more of the parties to such agreement."

[8] The overt acts here charged are: (1) The payment of $20 by each defendant; (2) the solicitation of money; (3) the receipt of $20 from Zugnoni. The evidence is sufficient to establish all of these alleged overt acts as against Calvert but only the second and third as against Beck. It seems clear that these acts are sufficient to make the alleged crime of conspiracy complete. The first step necessary to effect the object of the conspiracy was to solicit and collect the money to be given as a bribe, and these acts were certainly done in pursuance of the conspiracy.

> "A mere conspiracy, without overt act done in pursuance of it, is not punishable criminally, yet the overt act need not be in and of itself a criminal act; still less need it constitute the very crime that is the object of the conspiracy." Pierce v. United States, 252 U. S. 239, 40 Sup. Ct. 205, 64 L. Ed. 542, 546; United States v. Rabinowich, 238 U. S. 78, 35 Sup. Ct. 682, 59 L. Ed. 1211.

In Donaldson v. United States, 208 Fed. 4, 125 C. C. A. 316, plaintiff in error was convicted of conspiracy to receive, conceal, and facilitate the transportation of opium unlawfully imported into the United States. The court said:

> "The plaintiff in error performed the overt act of requesting Powers to aid in unloading certain specified opium then in the harbor on the steamship Siberia, and he took him to the steamer and introduced him to the Chinaman who had the opium in charge. Thereafter Gallagher [a coconspirator] went with Powers from San Francisco to Oakland to accomplish the object of the conspiracy. These were acts which tend to effect the object of the conspiracy, and it was enough if one of the acts charged was proven to have been done."

The following have been held sufficient overt acts under charges of conspiracy: Provisioning and sailing of a vessel in a conspiracy to smuggle Chinese into the United States. Daly v. United States, 170 Fed. 321, 95 C. C. A. 107. Telegraphic orders by one conspirator to another to make shipments of intoxicating liquors in a conspiracy to unlawfully ship such liquors. Witte v. Shelton, 240 Fed. 265, 153 C. C. A. 191. Cutting telegraph wires and going to or near the place at which the offense was to be committed in a conspiracy to rob the United States mail. Collier v. United States, 255 Fed. 328, 166 C. C. A. 498. Calling upon a coconspirator in pursuance of and to effect the object of the conspiracy. Gruher v. United States, 255 Fed. 474, 166 C. C. A. 550. Registration of an illegal voter in a conspiracy to procure such person to vote. State v. Nugent, 77 N. J. Law, 84, 71 Atl. 485.

[9] Appellant contends that the court abused its discretion in permitting proof of declarations by defendants without first requiring independent evidence of the alleged conspiracy.

> "Generally conspiracies cannot be proved as an independent fact, such as the execution of a promissory note, but are shown from circumstances, some testified to by one witness, and others by other witnesses. It is largely in the discretion of the court as to how much evidence of the existence of the conspiracy shall be required before receiving evidence of the acts and declarations of one of the alleged conspirators in the absence of the other." People v. Daniels, 105 Cal. 262, 265, 38 Pac. 720, 721.

It does not appear that the court abused its discretion as to the order in which the evidence was produced, or that the defendants suffered any possible prejudice on account of such order of proof.

[10] In answer to a question whether Beck had asked him to contribute money the witness Barrett replied:

> "He told me it would take $20 apiece, and I took it for granted he was asking me for that amount, but the exact words he used, I can't relate."

[11] Counsel for defendants moved the court to strike out the answer. The motion was denied. The motion was directed to the answer in its entirety. The only objectionable part of the answer at most is the statement, "I took it for granted he was asking me for that amount." The motion to strike out should have been directed specifically to the objectionable part since the other parts were entitled to stand. People v. Ho Kim You, 24 Cal. App. 451, 459, 141 Pac. 950. In any event, it is to be inferred from Beck's statements, as testified to by Barrett, that he was in fact seeking a contribution from the witness, and it does not appear that the denial of the motion resulted in a miscarriage of justice. The controverted issues were resolved against the appellants by the jury, and, since there was sufficient evidence to support the conclusion of guilt, this court cannot interfere with the verdict.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

ALLEN'S COLLECTION AGENCY v. MEANS. (Civ. 3918.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 18, 1923.)

1. Brokers 🔑86(1)—Finding that no agreement to pay commission for procuring purchaser was made sustained.

Evidence held to sustain finding that no agreement to pay a commission for procuring a purchaser for a business was made.

2. Costs 🔑260(4)—Appeal held for delay warranting allowance of damages.

In an action where the evidence clearly preponderated in favor of defendant and an appeal was taken by plaintiff on the sole argument that the testimony is overwhelmingly in his favor, held, that the appeal was for delay and damages in excess of cost allowable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Action by Allen's Collection Agency against P. P. Means. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. F. Allen, of Bakersfield (Dorris & Henderson, of Bakersfield, of counsel), for appellant.

Emmons, Aldrich & Heck, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Plaintiff brings this action as assignee of one B. F. Cooper to recover commissions alleged to have been earned under a contract whereby the defendant agreed to pay Cooper a commission for the sale of defendant's cleaning and dyeing business to any customer or purchaser procured by Cooper. It is alleged that pursuant to that agreement Cooper did procure a purchaser, one Charles T. May, to whom the defendant sold said business.

[1] It is conceded that there was no written contract. The plaintiff and another witness testified to conversations between Cooper and defendant, which conversations we will assume (without deciding) would have been sufficient to constitute a contract. But the defendant in his testimony stated that he never asked Cooper to sell his plant for him, never asked Cooper to see if he could find a buyer for him, and never agreed to pay Cooper a commission for any such service. It is true that after said alleged conversations Mr. May learned from Cooper that said property of the defendant probably was for sale and, after learning that fact, May went to defendant and bought the business. Cooper was not engaged in any brokerage or agency business. His connection with this sale was only of a casual nature. In substance, the only ground of appeal is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding of the court that the alleged contract between defendant and Cooper was not made, and that Cooper did not, pursuant to any agreement, procure a purchaser for said business. The sole argument in support of this point arises from appellant's claim that the testimony is "overwhelmingly in favor of the plaintiff's contention." The rule against this contention, in cases where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, is so thoroughly established by innumerable decisions that we are forced to the conclusion that the appeal in this case was made for delay.

For that reason the judgment is affirmed, with damages hereby allowed to the respondent on account of said appeal, in the sum of $50 in addition to the costs.

ANDERSON v. STANDARD LUMBER CO. (Civ. 2534.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 15, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑2—Code provisions as to appeal should be liberally construed, to promote the disposition of courts to hear appeals upon merits.

The disposition of the courts is to hear appeals upon their merits, and the Code sections relating to the subject should be liberally construed, with the view of promoting such purpose.

2. Appeal and error 🔑417(1)—Notice of appeal may be part of same paper that directs clerk to prepare record.

It is no objection to a notice of appeal that it is a part of the same paper that directs the clerk to prepare a record.

3. Appeal and error 🔑417(1)—Notice that plaintiff "desires and intends" to appeal held sufficient to confer jurisdiction on appellate court.

A notice of appeal that plaintiff "desires and intends to appeal" held sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the appellate court under Code Civ. Proc. § 940, providing that "an appeal is taken by filing with the clerk of the court in which the judgment or order appealed from is entered, a notice stating the appeal from the same, or some specific part thereof."

Motion to Dismiss Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by George A. Anderson against the Standard Lumber Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Motion denied.

H. W. Zagoren, of Sacramento, for appellant.

J. B. Curtin, of Sonora, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. Respondent has moved to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that no actual notice of appeal was ever given. The language adopted by appellant to effect his purpose is as follows:

> "You and each of you will please take notice that the plaintiff in the above-entitled action desires and intends to appeal to the District Court of Appeal of the state of California, Third Appellate District, from the judgment made and entered in said action," etc.

It is the contention of respondent that the foregoing is not equivalent to a notice that the plaintiff "does appeal," but that it simply expresses a purpose or intention to appeal in the future. Respondent calls attention to various Code sections, among them, section 941b, Code of Civil Procedure, and the decisions of the Supreme Court in Boling v. Alton, 162 Cal. 297, 122 Pac. 461, and Wall v. Hunter, 186 Cal. 473, 199 Pac. 775. Said section 941b provided:

> "Any person to whom the right of appeal from any judgment, order or decree of the superior courts of the state is granted, may appeal therefrom by filing with the clerk of the court in which the judgment, order or decree is rendered, a notice entitled in the cause in which said judgment, order or decree was made, which said notice shall state that the person giving the same does thereby appeal to the Supreme Court or District Court of Appeals as the case may be, from the judgment, order or decree, or some specific part thereof," etc.

It is to be observed, however, that this section was repealed in 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 194) before said notice was given herein, it being dated December, 1921, and section 940 of said Code was amended (St. 1921, p. 193) so as to read:

> "An appeal is taken by filing with the clerk of the court in which the judgment or order appealed from is entered, a notice stating the appeal from the same, or some specific part thereof."

This repeal seems to have escaped the attention of counsel, and it may be important, since the statute does not now prescribe so definitely what the notice of appeal shall contain. In the Boling Case, supra, the only notice was:

> "You will please take notice that the defendant in the above-entitled action, Thomas Alton has appealed to the district court of appeal," etc.

Therein it was truly said:

> "It does not comply with the provisions of section 940 or 941b prescribing the method of taking an appeal. It states, in effect, that an appeal had been theretofore taken, which was not true."

Manifestly, by no reasonable construction could it have been held that an untrue statement, namely, that an appeal had been taken, was equivalent to a notice of an actual appeal. The same infirmity appeared in Wall v. Hunter, the notice being as follows:

> "You will please take notice that the plaintiff in the above-entitled action has appealed to the Supreme Court of the state of California from the order entered," etc.

On the other hand, appellant claims that the decision in the Estate of Nutt, 180 Cal. 419, 181 Pac. 661, is directly in point and requires that the motion herein be denied. It is true that the notice therein considered does not appear in the report of the case, but an examination of the original record shows that the purported notice of appeal was as follows:

> "Notice is hereby given by W. Roy Simpson, proponent in the above-entitled matter, that he desires to appeal to the Supreme Court of the state of California from the whole of that certain judgment made and entered," etc.

The only difference, it will be observed, between that notice and the one before us is that herein we have the additional words "and intends." To the claim that said decision is controlling herein, respondent answers:

> "Appellant endeavors to sustain his position by citing Estate of Nutt, 180 Cal. 422, 181 Pac. 661, but in that case the principal point considered was the question of not serving the notice of appeal on one party who was there held not to be an adverse party, and service was not necessary and while the court does not set out the notice of appeal as there before the court, the appellant has taken pains to examine the record on appeal in that case, and from the instruments copied and annexed to his points it would seem that on hearing of the motion, an affidavit was then before the court showing omission and the court concluded to allow the appeal to stand, and hence the notice of appeal was not set out in the decision, but be that as it may, the court where the question was squarely before it held in both Boling v. Alton, 162 Cal. 299, 122 Pac. 461, and Wall v. Hunter, 186 Cal. 473, 199 Pac. 775, that the notice as given was insufficient and the appeal was dismissed."

Respondent is mistaken as to the principal point considered therein. It was only one of the reasons urged for the dismissal of the appeal. The other was the same as is presented herein, viz. that there was no actual notice of appeal, and this consideration the Supreme Court treated as follows:

> "The other ground of the motion to dismiss was that no sufficient notice of appeal was ever filed. As to this ground, we orally stated our views from the bench at the time of the hearing of the motion, to the effect that the notice should be held to be sufficient. No useful purpose would be subserved by further discussion of this point."

It is true that an affidavit was filed in the Supreme Court by the appellant stating, among other things:

> "That said notice was filed, as aforesaid, for the express purpose, and with the intention of appealing from the decision of the trial court to the Supreme Court; that through inadvertence of the clerk in affiant's office, who prepared said notice of appeal, the words 'desires to appeal' were used, instead of the words 'does appeal.' "

But it is difficult to understand how the notice could be aided by such an affidavit, and it seems the Supreme Court paid no attention to it. Herein, a similar affidavit has been filed, but, as we understand it, the motion must be determined by the consideration alone of the language used in said notice. The case of Wall v. Hunter, cited by respondent, is a later case, but it cannot be held to overrule the decision in the Estate of Nutt, since there was no statement therein whatever indicating a present intention to appeal.

[1, 2] Of course, the disposition of the courts is to hear appeals upon their merits, and the sections of the Code relating to the subject should be liberally construed with a view of promoting such purpose. Southern Pacific Co. v. Superior Court, 167 Cal. 250, 139 Pac. 69. It may be added that it is no objection to the notice that it is a part of the same paper that directed the clerk to prepare a record, as the dual purpose may be accomplished by one paper. In re Estate of Faber, 168 Cal. 491, 143 Pac. 737. It may be also added that this was the situation in the Estate of Nutt, supra, wherein the notice was almost identical with that herein.

[3] While it would be more satisfactory, if the notice had been more explicit, under the authority cited, it must be held sufficient to give the appellate court jurisdiction and the motion to dismiss the appeal is therefore denied.

1. Criminal law 🔑1144(13)—Evidence on appeal, presenting conflict, must be resolved against appellant.

Since the appellate court can consider only errors of law, if evidence on appeal presents a conflict, it must be resolved against appellant.

2. Homicide 🔑244(2)—Statement made by accused held not to indicate anything other than self-defense.

A statement made by accused after arrest held not to indicate anything other than a killing in self-defense.

3. Homicide 🔑118(2)—Defendant, attacked with knife and club, held not required to retreat.

Defendant, who had been attacked with a knife and club by one partially intoxicated and quarrelsome, held not required to retreat, since no duty to retreat is imposed on one who is without fault exposed to a sudden, felonious attack, and though the killing, to be excusable, must be under absolute necessity, actual or apparent, such a condition exists as a matter of law when an innocent person is placed in sudden jeopardy.

4. Homicide 🔑151(1)—Statutory burden of proving mitigating circumstances held inapplicable.

Where the evidence shows an excusable homicide, the state's case is not strengthened by reference to Pen. Code, § 1105, which places the burden of proving mitigating circumstances on accused, after it is shown he committed the homicide, since by its very terms the statute is inapplicable, where the proof tends to show only manslaughter or justifiable or excusable homicide.

5. Homicide 🔑244(2)—Evidence held to show self-defense.

Evidence, including a statement of accused, held to show an excusable homicide, and insufficient to support a finding of manslaughter.

6. Homicide 🔑174(7)—Rejection of evidence showing defendant did not conceal flight held not error.

Where the state made no point of or argument on accused's flight, though it was shown that after the killing he left home, the rejection of evidence that, when he left, he left word where he was going and made no effort of concealment, was not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Tom Estrada was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals from the judgment and the order denying him a new trial. Reversed.

R. C. Noleman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant was charged with the crime of murder, and a verdict was returned finding him guilty of the crime of manslaughter. He appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] It is first claimed that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. The killing of Eduardo Murillo by appellant on the 3d day of July, 1921, in Clearwater, in the county of Los Angeles, was admitted; but appellant contends that, upon all of the evidence, but one conclusion can be drawn, and that is that the act was done in necessary self-defense. Necessarily, as this court, in its consideration of questions presented, is limited to errors of law alone, if the evidence presents a conflict, the facts must be resolved against the defendant. The only direct evidence showing that the deceased was killed by the defendant consisted of a written statement, made by the defendant shortly after his arrest. On the morning of the 4th of July, 1921, the dead body of Murillo was found on the public roadside. There was a wound in his back on the left side, which the autopsy surgeon determined had been made by a knife which had penetrated the abdominal aorta. Close beside the dead man lay a club of eucalyptus wood, about 2½ to 3 inches in diameter and about 3 feet long. There were no wounds or bruises noticeable upon the body of Murillo, except that which has already been referred to. Around the body, and for a distance, in one direction at least, of approximately 12 feet, the grass which grew there had been trampled or beaten down, and there was blood in several places within the trampled area. The knife with which the fatal wound was inflicted was not found. Relations between the deceased and defendant had been friendly. The deceased boarded at the house of the mother of defendant, where the latter also lived. During the afternoon of the 3d of July the two men had been together, and called upon several of their friends in the neighborhood, and had had several drinks of intoxicating liquor. There was evidence showing that the deceased had been drinking during the month preceding the day of the tragedy, although as to the quantity and kind of liquor drunk by him the evidence does not show, nor does it show how often he drank. At about 10 o'clock of the night of the 3d of July, the man at whose house deceased and defendant last called walked some distance down the road with them, when he left the two men together. This man testified that deceased was quarrelsome, and that deceased said to defendant, "I am going to do you up, you and your mother, too."

As to what occurred between the two men from that point on to the time when the fatal blow was struck no witness was produced to tell, and the jury had only the statement of the defendant to advise them of the details of the encounter. That statement will shortly appear. On the following morning defendant requested a friend to drive him several miles away to an old adobe house on a neighboring ranch, at which place he was arrested shortly after the discovery was made of the dead body of Murillo. When the arresting officer informed him of what the charge was, he replied, "I don't know anything about it." He was immediately taken to the county jail. Before being incarcerated therein, it was noticed that when he was touched on his left side he winced, although he had up to that time made no complaint of any injuries. Upon the officer's inquiring of him what was the matter, he said that he had been injured, and after his shirt had been taken off a very large bruise was discovered on his left breast and across his left shoulder. The bruise on the chest was described as being about as "big as a man's fist." The officers thereupon inquired of him as to whether he was willing to make a statement, and he said that he was so willing, and proceeded to tell what had happened between him and Murillo after they had been left on the road by the friend. The prosecution introduced this statement as a part of its testimony at the trial, and the defendant did not testify.

The matter of the sufficiency of the evidence suggests two questions: First, upon the facts as shown by the statement made by the defendant at the jail after his arrest, was the defendant shown to have been justified in the killing of Murillo as an act of self-defense? Second, if the conclusion on that proposition is in the affirmative, were any other facts shown (and we have given the gist of all of them) which would furnish ground for the finding of guilt by the jury? We here quote the statement as made by the defendant in the presence of the arresting officers at the county jail in full, as it is shown in the transcript, except that a word of vulgar import is omitted, as indicated by the parentheses. The term employed is sufficiently apparent from the context without being literally reproduced.

"Q. What is your name? A. Tomas Estrada. Q. Where were you born? A. In the United States. Q. What town? A. Los Angeles. Q. Are you willing to make a statement, free and voluntary, without duress, or threats of any kind? A. Yes. Q. Where were you on Sunday night, July 3d? A. In Clearwater, I was with Ed Murillo and Samon Maccias. Q. Where did you meet them? A. I met them at four o'clock in the afternoon and we went to Samon's house, and from Celestin's house went to Acevedo's house. We stayed there at Acevedo's house two or three hours. Q. Did you have anything to drink? A. Yes, but Acevedo had some— He gave us a few drinks. Q. After you had your drinks what did you do? A. He gave us a half a gallon of potato wine. Q. It has a good kick? A. I think it has. Q. What did you do then, what happened? A. Then we started for the house. Q. Whose house? A. I was going to my house and Samon was going to his house. Q. Where was the deceased? A. He was with us, that is, Samon, the deceased and us; Ed started to abuse me and wanted to fight. Q. What did he say? A. He told me to go and (———) my mother and it was not the first that he owed. Q. What did you understand when he told you to go and (———) your mother, and it was not the first he owed, what did you understand? A. I understood it, that being he had killed my half-brother, he could kill me. Q. Is that what you understood? A. Yes, sir. Q. When did he kill your half-brother and where? A. He killed him between San Pedro and Wilmington. Q. How long ago? A. About four or five years ago, I think; then right after that he struck me a blow. Q. Where did he hit you? A. On the jaw, and then we clinched and I broke away, and he went over and got a club, and when he was coming back he had a knife in his hand. Q. In what hand? A. I could not tell you what hand it was in. Q. How do you know he had a knife? A. I saw it. Q. You don't know in what hand he had it? A. I think he had it in his left hand, because he had the club in his right hand. Q. What did he do? A. He struck at me with the club, and he hit me with the club on the left hand, and the second blow (indicating) he hit me on the left breast, and then he struck me another blow on the right arm, a glancing blow, I saw the knife drop, and then I grabbed the knife, as he swung to strike me, he swung around and as he did I shoved the knife in him, and stuck him on the side (indicating). Q. And what did you do? A. And then I left. Q. What did you do with the knife? A. I dropped the knife. Q. Where? A. Close to the body of the deceased. Q. And what next? Where did you go? A. I went to my house, to my mother's house. I did not want to tell my mother what had happened, and I went over to the adobe, and then I stayed there until the officers came for me. Q. Had you had any trouble with this man before? A. No, not any trouble, but he always tried to belittle me, he always had it in for me. Q. How do you know he had it in for you? A. I don't know why he had it in for me. I never done him anything. I never done him any harm. I done him good. For a fact he owe me $6 that I loaned him. He had not been working for some time. Q. Did you have a coat on when you went over to Acevedo's house? A. He had a thin coat on, and he said he was cold, and I loaned him my coat. Q. Where were you when you loaned him your coat? A. I was leaving Acevedo's house. Q. Was this your book and coat found near the body of the deceased? A. Yes."

[2, 3] In our opinion there is nothing indicated by the narrative, as expressed in the statement of the defendant, to warrant the conclusion that defendant, in repelling the attack of Murillo, acted other than in necessary self-defense. The deceased was quarrelsome and threatening, and, while the facts of that occurrence are not made to appear, it does not appear that the defendant knew that at a prior time the deceased had killed a half-brother of defendant. A further fact appeared in evidence, which may be added to the preceding statement, and that is that deceased was a young and vigorous man of about 27 years of age, heavier and more muscular than the defendant, who was at the time about 35 years old. As the defendant pictured the encounter, no particular interval of time elapsed between the acts of assault committed by deceased until the fatal blow was struck. There was no duty resting upon the defendant to retreat under the circumstances.

"Our law nowhere imposes the duty of retreat upon one who without fault himself is exposed to a sudden felonious attack, and that the duty of withdrawal or retreat is imposed upon him alone who is the first aggressor, or has joined in a mutual combat. * * * This state has upheld a defendant's right to stand his ground and meet by force a sudden and violent attack. So that while the killing must be under an absolute necessity, actual or apparent, as a matter of law that necessity is deemed to exist when an innocent person is placed in such sudden jeopardy." People v. Lewis, 117 Cal. 191, 48 Pac. 1089, 59 Am. St. Rep. 167, citing People v. Hecker, 109 Cal. 451, 42 Pac. 307, 30 L. R. A. 403.

It was not necessary that the defendant should have in words pictured his state of mind as it was at the time of the attack, for under his statement of the encounter the circumstances were such as to indicate nothing else but that by doing what he did he was defending himself against a murderous assault then being made by the deceased. That the attack made by Murillo was of that character, the defendant's swollen and bruised body and the production of the club used by the deceased furnished sufficient evidence, if defendant's own statement was not conclusive on that proposition.

[4, 5] The case for the prosecution is not aided at all by reference to the provisions of section 1105, Penal Code: rather the contrary. That section provides as follows:

> "Upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon him, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable."

The proof on the part of the prosecution (referring now to the statement of the defendant) did, as we have indicated, show a case of justification, and there is nothing in any of the other evidence presented which in any wise tends to contradict or dispute defendant's version of the affair. The fact that upon the ground there were signs of a struggle, indicated by the trampling down of grass, and that spots of blood were distributed in several places away from the body, is wholly consistent with the story told by defendant. The latter was not asked to describe precisely what movements were made and what ground was covered by the two men engaged in the encounter. The distribution of blood at the several places may have been occasioned by the movements of the deceased after he had been cut by the knife and before he fell to the ground. The surgeon who made the post mortem examination testified that a man wounded as deceased was might die very quickly or not for some time thereafter—even several hours. We conclude that defendant's first contention is well made, and that the verdict of the jury is not supported by the evidence.

Other errors are urged, which refer to instructions as given and refused, and to the ruling of the trial judge in excluding offered evidence showing that at the time defendant left his customary abode on the morning after the tragedy and went to the adobe house he left word as to where he might be found if he was wanted. The instructions of the court, taken as a whole, must be said to correctly state the law. While conceding this, it may be added that in their tenor the instructions of the court were critical of the self-defense claim. The court might well have given more comprehensive instructions on the right of self-defense, as viewed from the standpoint of the accused.

[6] As to the rejected evidence, error does not appear, because no contention appears to have been made by the prosecution that defendant's act in going away and to the adobe house on the morning after the tragedy was a circumstance tending to show flight and hence indicating a consciousness of guilt. No instruction was given the jury to advise them that evidence of this act of the defendant should be considered as showing an attempt to escape arrest. If the prosecution had relied upon the fact as showing flight, and the court had predicated an instruction upon it, it would seem clear that the rejected testimony should have been admitted. Flight involves concealment, and, if there was no concealment, evidence of the departure of an accused person from his customary place of abode could hardly be considered as a guilty circumstance.

We have adverted to the latter contentions of appellant because of their being the subject of serious argument in the briefs. Our conclusion on the first point considered necessarily and by itself disposes of this appeal.

The judgment and order are reversed.

1. Master and servant ⚷375(1)—Truck driver returning from lunch held not to have received compensable injury "arising out of and in course of employment."

Where a driver of an ice truck was killed while crossing the street from a cigar store just after having obtained lunch at a place where his duties did not call him, the employer permitting him to take his lunch where and when he desired, the injury did not arise out of or happen in the course of his employment so as to warrant an award of compensation to his dependents, under Workmen's Compensation Act 1917, § 6(a), as amended by St. 1919, p. 912, § 2.

2. Master and servant ⚷417(9)—Effect of determination on appeal.

A decision of Supreme Court, in reviewing on certiorari an award of the Industrial Accident Commission, that facts shown did not warrant an award of compensation, and annulling the award, held to set the matter at large, and the commission could admit additional evidence.

In Bank.

Proceeding by Mrs. Lena Young and Merle Wayne Young, a minor, by Mrs. Lena Young, his guardian ad litem, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, to obtain compensation for the death of Charles W. Young, husband and father, opposed by the Union Ice Company, employer, and the California Casualty Indemnity Exchange, insurance carrier. There was an award of compensation, and the insurance carrier brings certiorari. Award annulled.

Willis I. Morrison, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, J. This is a proceeding to review and have annulled an award of the Industrial Accident Commission against petitioner, the insurance carrier of the Union Ice Company, employer of Charles W. Young, deceased, made in favor of his widow and his minor son, in the maximum amount for death benefit allowed under the Compensation Act.

[1] The facts are undisputed. Petitioner's statement thereof, accepted by the respondents, is as follows:

"The Union Ice Company is engaged in the manufacture and delivery of ice in Los Angeles and vicinity, with plants at Hollywood and elsewhere. Delivery routes are laid out by its route foreman to enable its customers to be supplied in the most efficient and economical manner, and so laid out as to avoid the necessity of covering the same streets twice in any one day. Each driver is assigned to a designated route, and one that he can cover in an average day, usually fairly early in the afternoon, and is through for the day and at liberty to go home as soon as the assigned route has been covered. The drivers are given more or less leeway in the time and manner of covering the route, and are expected to get their lunch during the day. No specified hour is set aside for lunch, the drivers being allowed to procure lunch as and whenever desired, in a public restaurant, at home, or elsewhere.

"The deceased was an old employee of the Union Ice Company, thoroughly familiar with the particular route assigned to him. Frequently he covered a part of his route which would bring him to a cafeteria located at Palm avenue and Santa Monica boulevard, Sherman, about 7 a. m., made a delivery of ice to the cafeteria, and got his breakfast, then covered another portion of the route, returning to this same cafeteria about noon for lunch. Neither his assigned route nor the requirements of his customers necessitated his return to the cafeteria during the noon hour, this return being for the sole purpose of obtaining his noonday meal. As stated, he could have gone home for lunch, had he so desired, or obtained it elsewhere, the only requirement being that he make his route in average time, with considerable latitude to him. If he wanted to get home very early, he might hurry over his route, or otherwise could take his time.

"On the day of the accident, as on frequent other occasions, the deceased was accompanied over his route by his minor son, the respondent Merle Wayne Young, the two taking breakfast at the cafeteria, at which time a delivery of ice was made there, and then returning to the cafeteria for lunch at about 11:30 a. m., and for no other purpose, the deceased having no business to transact in that vicinity at that time for his employer. The truck was parked on the opposite side of the street, and the two crossed the street to the cafeteria for lunch. After luncheon at the cafeteria, the father left his son in the cafeteria, and went on down the street to a cigar store to get a 'smoke.' The boy crossed the street in safety to the truck, but the father, upon starting across after coming out of the cigar store, was run down and killed after proceeding but a little way into the street, and before he crossed to the side on which his truck was parked."

The finding of the Industrial Accident Commission on these facts is that the "injury occurring as above set forth arose out of and happened in the course of the employment of said employee." But such finding is not supported by the concurrence of the necessary conditions of compensation required by the act. Stats. 1919, p. 912, § 6 (a). To entitle the representative of the deceased to recover in this case it must be shown that the employee, at the time of the injury, was not only "performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment, and acting within the course of his employment," but also that the injury was proximately caused by such employment. In the very broadest sense, of course, it is true that the injury to the decedent grew out of and was incidental to his employment, since it was necessary that he should return from the place where he lunched to the truck. The right to an award is not alone founded upon the fact that such is the case, but upon the fact that the service the employee is rendering at the time of the injury grows out of and is incidental to the employment. For instance, it is the rule that an employee going to and from his place of employment is not rendering any service, and begins to render such service only when he arrives at the place of his employment, and proceeds to use some instrumentality provided, by means of which he immediately places himself in a position to perform his task. Ocean Accident, etc., Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 173 Cal. 313, 322, 159 Pac. 1041, L. R. A. 1917B, 336. It was not intended by the Compensation Act that the employer who comes within its provisions shall be the insurer of his employee at all times during the period of his employment.

The employer is liable for compensation only when an injury occurs to the employee while performing some act for the employer in the course of his employment, or incidental to it. Fairbank Co. v. Ind. Comm., 285 Ill. 11, 13, 120 N. E. 457. There must be some connection between the injury and the employment other than the mere fact that the employment brought the injured party to the place of injury. There must be some causal connection between the employment and the injury in the sense that, by reason of the employment, there was an unusual or additional exposure of the injured party to the kind or character of hazard and danger (in this case an ordinary street risk) which caused the injury. The injury must have its origin in a risk connected with the employment, and must have flowed from that source as a rational and natural course. In re Betts, 66 Ind. App. 484, 118 N. E. 551. In that case the employee, a furnace repairman, was returning from lunch to the place where he was working. He was riding with his employer. He said: "I want to get off and get some tobacco." As the driver stopped the horse, Betts stepped from the wagon into the street to go across to a store. He had taken but two or three steps when he was struck by an automobile and killed. His heirs were awarded compensation against the employer. In reversing the award the court said (at page 487 of 66 Ind. App. at page 552 of 118 N. E.):

> "We understand that all of these cases recognize and in effect hold that: 'It is not enough for the applicant to say, "The accident would not have happened if I had not been engaged in that employment, or if I had not been at that particular place." He must go further and must say, "The accident arose because of something I was doing in the course of my employment, or because I was exposed by the nature of my employment to some particular danger."'"

Other cases affirming the rule which prevails in this state are Clark v. Voorhees, 231 N. Y. 14, 131 N. E. 553; Taylor v. Binswanger, 130 Va. 545, 107 S. E. 649.

On the day on which the injury occurred Young, the decedent, breakfasted at the cafeteria located on Palm avenue and Santa Monica boulevard, at which time he made his delivery of ice. Neither his assigned route nor the requirements of his customers necessitated his return to that place. He had no business to transact for his employer in that vicinity. His movements during the time he was getting his noonday lunch were dictated wholly by his own desires and as the convenience of the route admitted. Had he gone home for lunch, and been injured while returning to the place of his employment, the situation would be plain. We see no distinction between such a case and this. When he ceased delivering ice, deviated from his route, and returned to the cafeteria for lunch, he was not doing anything required by or incidental to the employer's business. When struck down by the automobile and injured, his relation to his employment had not changed. It has been suggested that the injury to the deceased was the result of a hazard and risk to which he was exposed equally with the general public. That is unquestionably so, but, in view of the conclusion we have reached, it is not necessary to further consider that question.

Respondents rely very largely upon Burton Transfer Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 37 Cal. App. 657, 174 Pac. 72. In that case Fickett, the employee, was directed by his employer to haul a quantity of pipe to the depot. He procured his load, and was on his way to his destination when the noon hour arrived. Because he knew the depot was closed from noon until 1 o'clock, Fickett stopped at the premises of his employer, which were directly on his way, parked the loaded truck on the opposite side of the street, and went across to the office. Shortly before 1 o'clock the employer ordered him to proceed and take his load to the depot, in order that he might be there "at the time they open the doors and get away a little quicker." The employee left the office, started to cross the street toward his truck, and was run down by a passing automobile. In affirming an award of compensation for his injuries the District Court of Appeal held that Fickett was injured in the regular and usual discharge of his duties, and while obey-ing an instant direction of his employer. The mere statement of the facts is sufficient to differentiate that case from the one at bar. The decision in Papineau v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 45 Cal. App. 181, 187 Pac. 108, also relied upon by respondents, is so far at variance with the recognized legal principle accepted and followed in this state that it cannot be regarded as having any weight of authority. The facts underlying the decision in Judson Mfg. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 181 Cal. 300, 184 Pac. 1, clearly differentiate that case from this.

The award is annulled.

In re PARKINSON'S ESTATE. (L. A. 7549.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Finding amply justified by the evidence not reviewed.

A finding by the trial court amply justified by the evidence cannot be reviewed on appeal.

2. Wills 🔑164(1)—Evidence that property in name of person alleged to have procured will by undue influence was in fact decedent's held inadmissible.

In proceedings to revoke the probate of a will on the ground of undue influence, evidence that certain property standing in the name of a sister of decedent, who it was alleged procured the execution of the will by undue influence, was in fact the property of decedent, held not admissible on the theory that the sister would have been more greatly tempted to influence decedent to make a will in her favor if the property to be derived by her was greater than she would have if it were less.

3. Appeal and error 🔑232(2)—Reason for admissibility of evidence not made in trial court not considered.

A reason for the admissibility of evidence not made in the trial court will not be considered on appeal.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Charles A. Parkinson, deceased. On petition for the revocation of the will of deceased. From an order refusing to revoke the probate of the will, the petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

Albert Sidney Brown and Arthur E. T. Chapman, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Stewart & Stewart, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WILBUR, C. J. [1] Appellants filed a petition for the revocation of the will of deceased, and the issue of undue influence raised by them was tried and determined adversely to them in the trial court. They claim on this appeal from the order refusing to vacate the probate of the will that the finding that the will was not procured by the undue influence of Ida J. Parkinson is contrary to the evidence. Even upon the view of the evidence on this subject most favorable to the appellants, it is clear that there is a conflict of the testimony. Ida J. Parkinson testified, in effect, that she did not exercise any influence whatever upon the decedent in connection with the execution of the will. Other corroborating testimony was received, and was amply sufficient to justify the finding of the trial court, and therefore that finding cannot be reviewed by us. No useful purpose would be subserved by an analysis of the testimony upon this issue.

[2, 3] Appellants also claim that the trial court erred in its refusal to receive testimony concerning the character and value of the estate of the deceased. The trial court permitted the introduction of evidence showing the value and character of the estate in California. The value, as shown by the inventory, was $5,550. Appellants claim that they had a right to show that certain property standing in the name of the sister, Ida J. Parkinson, was, in fact, the property of the decedent. The reason given the trial court for the introduction of this evidence seems to be, in substance and effect, that the sister would have been more greatly tempted to influence the decedent to make a will in her favor if the property to be derived by her was greater than she would have if it were less. The evidence was not admissible for that purpose. Upon the argument in this court it was claimed that the evidence was also admissible to show a trust relation between the decedent and his sister. It is a sufficient answer to this claim on appeal to state that it was not made in the trial court as a reason for the admissibility of the evidence when that matter was under discussion.

It is next claimed that the trial court erred in not requiring respondents to produce a document purporting to be a former will of the decedent, and in not permitting the appellants to introduce the same in evidence. It appears from the record that the document in question was produced and shown to appellants' attorney, and that it was not offered in evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Principal and agent 🔑132(1)—Record owner held not bound by written agreement to level land not made in her behalf.

Where defendant, a record owner of land exchanged it for other lands with plaintiffs, and defendant's son, who was claimed by plaintiffs to have an interest in the land, agreed in writing to level part of the land so that it could be rented, the writing purporting to be solely the agreement of the son, defendant could not be bound thereby; plaintiffs knowing at the time that she was the record owner, and the writing not purporting to be made in her behalf.

2. Principal and agent 🔑194(3)—Instructions as to effect of written agreement not binding on record owner held erroneous.

In an action for breach of defendant's agreement to level land taken in exchange by plaintiffs in accordance with an agreement made by defendant's son, who had an interest in the land, but not made on behalf of defendant, who held the record title at the time of the exchange, instructions that, if the son had no interest in the land, defendant could not be bound unless she acquiesced therein and received the benefits thereof, held erroneous, as in effect instructing the jury that, if they should find that defendant had knowledge of the agreement prior to the exchange and acquiesced therein and received the benefits thereof, she would be liable upon the agreement, notwithstanding that she was the sole owner and the agreement did not purport to refer to her as a party to be bound.

3. Principal and agent 🔑166(2) — Owner of land held not to have authorized agreement by purported agent to level land.

Where defendant exchanged land with plaintiffs, and defendant's son, who was claimed to have an interest in the land, agreed to level part of it at his expense, defendant could not be held to have ratified such agreement, where she had not authorized it nor had any knowledge or notice thereof, in view of Civ. Code, § 2310.

4. Judgment 🔑240—Judgment against two defendants for damages not segregated held erroneous.

Where defendant and her son exchanged property with plaintiffs, the son agreeing to level the land so that it could be rented, a judgment, holding defendant liable upon her agreement to level her share of the land, was erroneous, where the damages were not segregated.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by Walter R. Bloom and others against Eliza J. Coates and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant named appeals. Reversed as to defendant named.

Fred Horowitz, of Los Angeles, and Walter E. Barry, of Ventura, for appellants.

John B. Haas, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MYERS, J. The following is the opinion of the District Court of Appeal herein, prepared by Mr. Presiding Justice Conrey:

"In or about the month of March, 1919, a 320-acre tract of land, the same being the north one-half of section 25, township 12 south, range 15 east, in the county of Imperial, was conveyed by deed of grant from one Launspach, the owner thereof, to the defendant Eliza J. Coates. The other defendant, R. M. Arnold, is her son. In April, 1919, Mrs. Coates executed to two Japanese tenants a lease covering 120 acres of said land at a specified rental to be paid. The lease contained a further agreement that the lessor would forthwith cause to be leveled an additional described 80 acres of her said land, which likewise she agreed to lease to said tenants at a separate stated rental to be paid by them. As to each of said tracts the lease was to be for a term of three years. In September, 1919, Mrs. Coates conveyed said land to the plaintiffs in exchange for certain land in San Bernardino county, and upon other considerations. The alleged cause of action of the plaintiffs upon which they have recovered judgment herein, arises out of alleged agreements incidental to the transaction of exchange. By the complaint it is alleged that on September 10, 1919, the title to 120 acres (being the same 120 acres first described in said lease) stood in the name of Eliza J. Coates, but that the defendant R. M. Arnold, at all times mentioned in the complaint, held a beneficial interest in and to said property, 'the extent of which is unknown to the plaintiffs.' The complaint then set forth a copy of the lease made by Mrs. Coates to the Japanese tenants, and alleged that she made it in her own name, but in fact for herself and for and on behalf of R. M. Arnold. It is then alleged that defendant Coates did for herself and on behalf of R. M. Arnold further expressly agree to carry out the terms of said lease by agreement in writing indorsed on the back of said lease in words and figures as follows, to wit: 'September 10, 1919. For value received I hereby assign, transfer and set over unto J. S. Pritchard and Walter R. Bloom, their heirs, or assigns, all my right, title and interest in and to the within lease. Eliza J. Coates.' 'It is hereby understood and agreed that all leveling is to be done as per terms of the within lease. Eliza J. Coates.' It is then alleged that on or about September 10, 1919, defendant Coates, on her own behalf and on behalf of R. M. Arnold, did grant, bargain, sell and convey unto the plaintiffs, by grant deed, said 320-acre tract of land. It is next alleged: (8) That on the 10th day of September, 1919, R. M. Arnold, as beneficial owner and in consideration of the sale of said land to the plaintiffs, made, executed, and delivered to J. S. Pritchard and Walter R. Bloom the following agreement:: 'September 10, 1919. Messrs. J. S. Pritchard and Walter R. Bloom. Gentlemen: In consideration of the sale to you of the following described land I hereby agree to level and put in position to rent balance of unleveled portion of the N. ½ of section 25, twp. 12 S., range 15 E., Imperial county, California. Work to be started within 15 days after this deal on said land is closed. R. M. Arnold. Work to be completed within 6 months from this date.' (9) That the said agreement was made, executed, and delivered by the said defendant R. M. Arnold as part consideration of the transfer of the beneficial interest and title of the said R. M. Arnold to the plaintiffs and in consideration of the purchase of the legal title and interest to the said land by the said plaintiffs from said defendant Eliza J. Coates. (10) That plaintiffs have performed all the conditions, terms, and covenants upon their part agreed to be performed. (11) That the said defendant Eliza J. Coates has failed and refused and still does fail and refuse to comply with her agreement to level or cause to be leveled the property as set out in the lease, which property is embraced in and included in the property as set out in the agreement executed by defendant R. M. Arnold, although repeated demands have been made on said Eliza J. Coates so to do. (12) That said defendant R. M. Arnold has failed and refused and still does fail and refuse to level or cause to be leveled the land set out in the agreement executed by said R. M. Arnold, which land embraces and includes therein the land which said defendant Eliza J. Coates agreed to level or cause to be leveled, although repeated demands have been made on said defendant R. M. Arnold so to do. (13) That by reason of said failure of said defendants to comply with the terms of their respective agreements, plaintiffs have been damaged in the sum of $10,000, the reasonable cost of leveling the said land, and in the further sum of $2,000, the reasonable rental value of the said land.

"The defendants having separately demurred to the complaint, and their demurrers having been overruled, they answered separately, and Mrs. Coates also filed a cross-complaint, seeking damages arising out of false representations concerning the San Bernardino county property received by her from the plaintiffs. Plaintiffs answered to the cross-complaint. The case was tried before a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs against both of the defendants, and awarded damages in the sum of $8,000. Judgment having been entered in accordance with the verdict, the defendant Eliza J. Coates alone appeals therefrom.

"From the record it is apparent that the damages awarded have been assessed equally against both defendants, upon the theory that appellant Mrs. Coates was bound, not only to do the leveling upon 80 acres as provided in the Japanese lease, but that she was also bound by said written agreement of R. M. Arnold, made in the terms hereinabove stated. If the complaint, in so far as it was founded upon a writing signed by Arnold, did not state a cause of action against appellant, then the court erred in overruling her demurrer to the complaint, upon the stated ground that several causes of action were improperly united, in that there was an alleged cause of action against appellant for breach of the contract signed by her, together with an alleged cause of action against Arnold on his several contract. Several causes of action may be united in the same complaint only when they 'affect all the parties to the action.' Code Civ. Proc. § 427.

[1] "Notwithstanding the allegation that the agreement signed by Arnold was made as part consideration of the transfer of his alleged beneficial interest and title to said land to the plaintiffs, 'and in consideration of the purchase of the legal title and interest to the said land by the plaintiffs from said defendant Eliza J. Coates,' we are of the opinion that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to charge appellant with any obligation upon the agreement signed by Arnold. The writing purports to be solely the agreement of Arnold. The several allegations of the complaint, read in their sequence, disclose the fact that at that time the plaintiffs knew that Mrs. Coates was at least the record owner of the 320-acre contract. That being so, she would not be bound as principal upon a writing which did not purport to be made in her behalf, and which was not executed by her. Our conclusion on this point is supported by the opinion of the Supreme Court in Ferguson v. McBean, 91 Cal. 63, 72, 27 Pac. 518, 520 (14 L. R. A. 65), where the court said: 'It is undoubtedly true that when the principal is undisclosed he may sue or be sued, but not when he is known, and especially not when he is present at the making of the contract. * * * Considered independent of authority, we think sound policy requires the enforcement, in cases such as these, of the general rule that a writing cannot be varied by parol. It is as important to know who has made a contract as to know its terms; and when the parties put it in writing, there is no more reason or excuse for omitting the name of a known party, whom it is the intention to bind, than there is for omitting its most important stipulation. To allow such a practice opens the door, in every case, to such conflicts of evidence as this case illustrates upon a point which can be easily and forever set at rest by simply making the written evidence of the contract conform to the mutual understanding of the parties as to matters fully within their knowledge. We think the superior court erred in overruling the demurrers, and in admitting the testimony referred to.'

[2] "We think that the court erred in submitting to the jury the question of liability of appellant on the agreement signed by Arnold. The court instructed the jury 'that the rights and obligations of each of these defendants may be entirely separate and distinct from the rights and obligations of the other, or said rights and obligations may be joint, as you may conclude from the evidence and under these instructions.' The court further instructed the jury: 'That if you should find from the evidence that the defendant Eliza J. Coates was the owner of the land in Imperial county, and that the defendant Ralph M. Arnold had no interest in said land, and that the defendant Ralph M. Arnold, of his own accord, and without the express consent of the defendant Eliza J. Coates, executed an agreement to level the unleveled portion of the north ½ of section 25, township 12 south, range 15 east, then I instruct you that the defendant Eliza J. Coates cannot be bound by such agreement; unless you find that said defendant Eliza J. Coates had knowledge of said agreement prior to the exchange, acquiesced therein, and received the benefits thereof, the effect of this instruction was to inform the jury that if they should find from the evidence that appellant had knowledge of said agreement prior to the exchange, and acquiesced therein, and received the benefits thereof, she would be liable upon the agreement made by Arnold in his own name, notwithstanding that she was the sole owner of the land, and that the written agreement did not purport to refer to her as a party to be bound thereby, or at all. This is directly in opposition to the law as above set forth in our quotation from Ferguson v. McBean. Moreover, there is no evidence that appellant saw that agreement, or that its terms were communicated to her.

"It appears from the evidence that on August 13, 1919, four weeks prior to the transactions of September 10, defendant Arnold, as assumed owner of said 320 acres, signed a written instrument employing Stacy Realty Company as his agents, and authorizing them to exchange for him the said 320 acres of land, and agreeing to exchange the same for said land in San Bernardino county and other considerations to be paid by Bloom and Pritchard. On this instrument, and at its date, Bloom had signed an acceptance subject to the approval of Pritchard. In said agreement of August 13, immediately following the description of the 320-acre tract, these words occurred: 'Same to be leveled and put in position to rent.' The meeting of the parties at Stacy Realty Company's office on September 10 was arranged by Arnold with the plaintiffs and through the real estate agents for the purpose of carrying out that agreement. Appellant was present at the request of Arnold, who informed her that he had arranged to dispose of the Imperial county land for her.

[3] "It is contended by respondents that these last-mentioned facts concerning the agreement of August 13 take the case out of the rule declared in Ferguson v. McBean, supra, because at that time Mrs. Coates was an undisclosed principal of Arnold, who then and there was her agent; that Mrs. Coates relied upon Arnold and ratified his acts, and was thus bound by the statement in the agreement of exchange that the land was to be leveled; and that she accepted the benefits of the transaction and was thus bound to assume the burdens and to bear the obligations. From these stated facts, together with the fact, which respondents contend has been proven, that Arnold owned an interest in the land, it is argued that appellant should be held bound by Arnold's agreement for the leveling of the land. But there is a total absence of evidence that appellant at any time knew of the existence of said agreement of August 13, or that she had at any time given him written authority (the only legal authority) to exchange or sell her land for her. We do not know of any principle of law by which she can be held to have ratified a contract which she had not authorized, of which she had no knowledge, and concerning which she did not have knowledge of circumstances sufficient to put her upon inquiry. Said agreement of August 13 is thus wholly irrelevant as to the question of appellant's liability to plaintiffs in this action. Civ. Code, § 2310.

[4] "Assuming, without deciding, that appellant is liable upon her alleged agreement to level 80 acres of the land, exclusive of the 200 acres covered by Arnold's agreement, nevertheless the entire judgment against appellant must be reversed, since the damages have not been segregated."

The application for a hearing by this court was granted because of the earnest insistence of counsel for respondents that the district court had overlooked or disregarded substantial evidence which entitled them to recover against Mrs. Coates as an undisclosed principal, also evidence which bound her under the rule of ratification of a contract by acceptance of the benefits thereof, and evidence which brought into operation the principles of estoppel in pais. Further examination of the record convinces us that the foregoing opinion contains an accurate statement of the essential facts and a correct application of the rules of law thereto.

Mrs. Coates could not be in the position of an undisclosed principal herein, because it appears conclusively from the evidence that the plaintiff Bloom, who acted for both plaintiffs in this transaction, knew, before the deal was made, that she was the owner of the land. This fact brings the case squarely within the rule of Ferguson v. McBean, supra. The so-called contract of August 13th was not a contract at all. It was merely a proposal on the part of Arnold which was tentatively accepted by Bloom, "subject to approval of J. S. Pritchard, my partner." It was never approved by Pritchard, and never became binding upon anybody—nor does it appear ever to have been considered by any of the parties as binding any one. This disposes also of the claim of ratification of the contract of August 13th by the acceptance of the benefits thereof. There being no such contract, of course, there were no benefits thereof. In addition is the circumstance pointed out above that there is no evidence that Mrs. Coates ever had any knowledge of said so-called contract. Plaintiffs cannot claim an estoppel, because the plaintiff, Bloom, who was acting for both of them, testified expressly that he expected Arnold, and Arnold alone, to do the leveling.

The judgment is reversed as to the appealing defendant.

TREAT et ux. v. LOS ANGELES GAS & ELECTRIC CORPORATION.

Master and servant 🔑388—Complaint by parents for death of minor employee held to show they were "dependents" within Compensation Act.

A complaint by parents seeking recovery under Code Civ. Proc. § 376, for the death of a minor son from injuries arising out of his employment, alleging that deceased was contributing the sum of $10 per week to their support, shows that they are "dependents" within Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act, § 14, par. b, and their right of recovery is barred by that act providing in section 6 that recovery of compensation shall be the exclusive remedy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Harold L. Treat and wife against the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

John C. Miles and Bertrand J. Wellman, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Paul Overton, S. W. Guthrie, and Samuel Poorman, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This is an action commenced by parents to recover damages for the death of their minor son. The young man was an employee of defendant, and at the time of the injury which caused the death was engaged in a work which both arose out of and in the course of his employment. The trial court sustained a general demurrer to the complaint, with leave to amend, and afterward, plaintiffs electing not to amend, rendered judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment. The only question to be determined on the appeal, it will be observed, is whether the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

Appellants contend that the action is maintainable under the terms of section 376, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides:

> "A father, or * * * the mother, may maintain an action for the injury or death of a minor child, * * * when such injury or death is caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another. * * *"

Judgment was rendered against appellants in the trial court, however, upon the theory that the allegations of the complaint were such that a recovery under section 376 was barred by the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (Stats. 1917, p. 831; and as amended in part, Stats. 1919, p. 910. See Stat. as amended. Deering's Consol. Suppl. to Gen. Laws, 1917–1921, p. 1555), enacted by the Legislature many years after section 376. It is provided in paragraph (a) of section 6 of the Compensation Act, italics being ours, that—

> Upon the concurrence of several conditions which need not now be specified, "liability for the compensation provided by this act, in lieu of any other liability whatsoever to any person, shall, without regard to negligence, exist against an employer for any injury sustained by his employees arising out of and in the course of the employment and for the death of any such employee if the injury shall proximately cause death. * * *"

Paragraph (b) of the same section is to the effect, with certain provisos not of present interest, italics again being ours:

> "Where such conditions of compensation exist, the right to recover such compensation, pursuant to the provisions of this act, shall be the exclusive remedy against the employer for the injury or death. * * *"

Paragraph (c) of section 6 provides that—

> In cases "where the conditions of compensation do not concur, the liability of the employer shall be the same as if this act had not been passed."

Appellants point out that the act does not provide for compensation to be made to the survivors of those whose lives are lost through injuries received in the service of their employers, where such survivors are not "dependent" upon the deceased persons, and it is claimed by them that the complaint does not show that they were dependent upon their son during his lifetime. They quote an allegation of the pleading, "that by reason of the death of said child the plaintiffs have been deprived of the comfort, society, protection, love and affection of said child, to the plaintiffs' damage in" a certain sum, and insist that the terms thus employed do not show a dependency of the parents upon the son. The language quoted, however, is not the entire ad damnum clause of the complaint. That language is immediately preceded by this allegation, with a semicolon between the two statements, "That said minor child of the plaintiffs resided with the plaintiffs and was a dutiful, obedient and home-loving child, and was contributing the sum of ten ($10.00) dollars per week to the support of the plaintiffs."

Taking the entire ad damnum clause together, it is apparent that the dependency of appellants upon the son appears upon the face of the complaint. It is provided by paragraph (b) of section 14 of the Compensation Act that—

> "Questions as to who constitute dependents * * * shall be determined in accordance with the fact, as the fact may be at the time of the injury of the employee."

It appears plain to us, looking no further than this statute, that the fact is shown by the ad damnum clause, in its averment that the son was contributing $10 the week "to the support" of appellants, that they were dependant upon him. In a note to Temescal Rock Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comn., 13 A. L. R. 686–692, there is set forth a long list of cases showing what proof is necessary to show dependency under compensation laws when the question of dependency is an issue. Here the question is one of pleading, and we have no doubt that the allegation of the ultimate fact that the deceased minor "was contributing the sum of ten ($10.00) dollars per week to the support of the plaintiffs" is sufficient to embrace all the probative facts necessary to show dependency. In other words, it can hardly be said that one person is not dependant upon another person when the latter contributes to the support of the former. When money is contributed, not lent nor advanced, to the support of another, it is surely a factor in his support or maintenance. No more than that is necessary to prove dependency under the authorities collated in the note to which we have referred. We are satisfied that the provisions of the Compensation Act deprive appellants of all right of recovery under the terms of section 376, Code of Civil Procedure, and that the trial court ruled correctly is sustaining the demurrer to the complaint.

Judgment affirmed.

TRUBE v. KATZ. (Civ. 4067.)

1. Fraud 🔑47—Complaint held not to disclose grounds of recovery by employee for deceit causing loss of position; "alter her position to her injury."

Where plaintiff, who had been employed by the firm of which defendant was a partner as saleslady at a salary of $200 a month, brought suit against defendant for wrongfully deceiving plaintiff "to alter her position to her injury" alleging that defendant transferred her from such position to that of assistant buyer at $300 per month, which necessitated a railroad journey during which defendant attempted to have unlawful sexual intercourse with her, to which she refused to consent, and that by reason of the deceit plaintiff lost her position as saleslady held, that the action was not maintainable, as plaintiff did not, by accepting the employment, alter her position to her injury within Civ. Code § 1709, the last contract of employment being binding.

2. Assault and battery 🔑21—Action for assault held barred after one year.

An action for assault not commenced until one year after the offense is barred by the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3.

Action by Georgina Rose Trube against Arthur Katz for damages. Judgment for defendant on demurrer, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank A. McDonald, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Isaac Pacht and Newby & Palmer, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The court having sustained defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's third amended complaint, without leave to amend, entered judgment in favor of the defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

Appellant admits that the complaint did not state a cause of action for damages resulting from an assault. Her only contention is that she has stated a cause of action on account of deceit, whereby she was caused to alter her position to her injury. Civ. Code, § 1709.

The complaint alleged that the defendant was a member of the firm of Katz Bros., engaged in merchandising business; that from the first day of July, 1919, to the 18th day of December in that year she was employed by said firm as saleslady at a salary of $200 per month; that on the 18th day of December, 1919, "defendant for the purpose of willfully deceiving the plaintiff with the intent to deceive her to alter her position to her injury or risk," stated to the plaintiff that he was transferring her from the position of salesday to the position of assistant buyer for the stores of the firm, and that from that day her salary would be the sum of $300 per month; that he instructed her to go with him to the city of New York for the purposes of her said employment as assistant buyer; and that they left the city of Los Angeles for the city of New York on the 20th day of the said month of December. She alleged certain attempted immoral conduct of the defendant toward her on said train on the night of December 21, 1919, to which she refused to consent; "that she then and there and thereupon discovered and learned for the first time that she had not been appointed such assistant buyer at said salary, or any other sum or salary, and that in said or any other capacity, it was not necessary for her to leave Los Angeles, * * * and that said representations made to her as aforestated by the defendant that she was transferred, appointed to, and given said position of assistant buyer at said salary, and that in and about her duties as such she would be required to leave Los Angeles over said Santa Fé route were wholly untrue, and so made by defendant for the purpose of deceiving plaintiff that he might have her on said train for the sole purpose of having said unlawful sexual intercourse with her;" further, "that by reason of said deceit practiced upon the plaintiff by the defendant, she was discharged from her position as such saleslady in which position she was earning the sum of $200 per month, and ever since has been without such or any other position, being wholly unable to obtain such, or any other position, to her actual damage in the sum of $2,500."

[1] It is not alleged that the plaintiff was discharged from her position as assistant buyer, or that the defendant made said contract employing her as assistant buyer without any intention to perform the same. Since the defendant was one of the partners in the firm of Katz Bros., he had authority to enter into a contract on behalf of the firm, whereby she was so employed. Since by such employment her salary was increased, she did not, by accepting such employment, "alter her position to her injury." If she has any cause of action, it is a cause of action against said firm arising out of a contract made in its behalf. The allegation that she learned that she had not been appointed such assistant buyer is contradicted by the particular facts alleged, which show that in fact she was so appointed.

[2] As we have noted, appellant concedes that she did not state a cause of action for assault. Aside from any defects in the statement of the facts concerning the assault, it is admitted that the action was not commenced until more than one year after the 21st day of December, 1919, and that therefore any cause of action for assault is barred by the provisions of section 340, subd. 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1170(10) — Technical objection that finding not sustained by evidence held not ground for reversal.

Where the proofs showed plaintiff broker was employed to find a purchaser of a five-year lease, as well as of the furniture and equipment, but the complaint alleged and the findings referred only to securing a purchaser for furniture, furnishings, and equipment, contention that the finding that plaintiff was employed to sell "furniture, furnishings, and equipment" was not supported by the evidence because plaintiff's employment extended to the procurement of a purchaser of the lease, as well as the furniture and equipment, held not sustainable, the gist of plaintiff's cause of action being the performance of services in bringing about a sale of defendant's property; that the allegation in the complaint and the finding of the court did not describe all that was to pass to the purchaser in the event a sale should be effected through plaintiff's efforts could not have misled defendant as to the nature of services for which plaintiff was employed and seeking compensation, nor injured defendant by the failure of the complaint and findings to make mention of the lease; such error to be disregarded under Const. art. 6, § 4½, and Code Civ. Proc. § 475.

2. Brokers 🔑43(2)—Contract employing broker to procure purchaser of estate for years need not be in writing, not being "real estate."

A lease for years, though a chattel real, is personal property, and, though it may be an estate of interest in real property, it is not "real estate" within Civil Code, § 1624, subd. 6 (Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, subd. 6), enumerating when contracts of agency to sell real estate must be in writing to be valid, and hence a contract employing a broker to procure a purchaser of an estate for five years need not be in writing to be valid.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑70—What "estate for years" embraces stated.

"Estates for years" embrace all terms limited to endure for a definite and ascertained period, however short or long the period may be; they embrace terms for a fixed number of weeks or months or for a single year, as well as for any definite number of years, however great.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Estate for years.]

4. Statutes 🔑178 — Term "real estate" as used in statute to be construed under Code definition.

Where the words "real estate" as used in Civil Code, § 1624, subd. 6 (Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, subd. 6) may be construed in two ways, and each construction leads to an anomaly, that construction will be adopted which accords with the Code definition of the term "real estate" as defined in Civil Code, § 14, subd. 3 (Code Civ. Proc. § 17, subd. 3).

5. Landlord and tenant ⚷70—"Conveyances" as defined in recorded statute held not to make leasehold interest an interest in real estate.

Because a written instrument whereby a leasehold interest is created shall be deemed under Civil Code, §§ 1213, 1214, 1215, to be a "conveyance," does not make such leasehold interest thus conveyed "real estate."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Conveyance.]

6. Property ⚷4—Terms "real estate" and "real property" held not convertible terms technically.

The terms "real estate" and "real property" technically are not convertible terms.

Craig, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Charles E. Guy. trading as the Century Investment Company, against H. W. Brennan and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Walter E. Burke, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

John H. Miller, of San Francisco, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Plaintiff, a realty broker, brought this action to recover the commission earned by him in the sale of defendants' apartment house. Judgment passed for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

[1] The first point advanced by appellants against the judgment is more technical than meritorious. The complaint alleged, and the trial court found, that defendants employed plaintiff to find a purchaser for the "furniture, furnishings, and equipment" of the apartment house. Defendants, who had leased the house from the owner, held a five-year lease thereon. Plaintiff, as the proof showed, was employed to find a purchaser of the lease as well as of the furniture and equipment. It now is claimed that the finding that plaintiff was employed to sell the "furniture, furnishings, and equipment" is not supported by the evidence, for the reason that plaintiff's employment extended to the procurement of a purchaser of the lease as well as of the furniture and equipment. We can see in this objection no good reason for disturbing the judgment. The gist of plaintiff's cause of action is the performance of certain services in bringing about a sale of defendants' property. The fact that the allegation in the complaint and the finding of the court did not describe all that was to pass to the purchaser in the event that a sale should be effected through plaintiff's efforts could not have misled defendants as to the nature of the services which plaintiff was employed to perform, and for which he now is seeking compensation; and we are unable to see how defendants could have been injured by the failure of the complaint and findings to make mention of the lease. Under the familiar and oft-cited sections of the Code and Constitution (Code Civ. Proc. § 475; Const. art. 6, § 4½), the error will here be disregarded.

[2] Appellants' second point is that the contract of employment, which was oral, was invalid under that provision of our statute of frauds which provides that an agreement employing an agent or broker to sell "real estate" for a compensation or commission is invalid unless the same or some note or memorandum thereof be in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged, or by his agent. Civ. Code § 1624, subd. 6; Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, subd. 6. In this particular subdivision of the statute the words "real estate" are used, whereas in the preceding subdivision the words "real property" occur. Appellants' contention, stated in the language of their brief, is:

> "We contend that by the use of the term 'real estate, rather than 'real property' in this subdivision (subdivision 6) the Legislature referred to 'estates in real property.'"

And because a lease for years is an estate (Civ. Code, § 701, and section 761, subd. 3), and a broker employed to sell a lease for years is therefore employed to sell an "estate," it is argued that respondent was employed to sell "real estate" within the meaning of subdivision 6 of the statute of frauds. This argument loses sight of the significance of the word "real" in the expression "real estate." It may be conceded, as appellants contend, that by the words "real estate" as here used the Legislature did refer to "estates" in, i. e., interests in, "real property," and not to the land itself—the corpus. But, even so, the words "real estate" do not connote any and every estate or interest in real property. They embrace only such an estate or interest in real property as reaches to the dignity of real estate. And a lease is not "real" estate. The Legislature was dealing with terms of art, and is presumed to have used them in their technical sense.

> "The term 'real estate,'" says Kent, "means an estate in fee or for life in land, and does not comprehend terms of years, or any interest short of a freehold." 3 Kent's Commentaries, p. 401.

"They [the words 'real estate'] import a freehold interest, either an estate for life or in fee simple." Bourn v. Robinson, 49 Tex. Civ. App. 157, 107 S. W. 873.

"A leasehold interest is not real estate, but merely a chattel real, which is personal property." Townsend v. Boyd, 217 Pa. 386, 66 Atl. 1099, 12 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1148.

See, also, Mayor v. Mabie, 13 N. Y. 151, 64 Am. Dec. 538; Scogin v. Perry, 32 Tex. 21, 29; and Harrington v. Sharp, 1 G. Greene (Iowa) 131, 48 Am. Dec. 365.

If we turn to the definitions which are to be found in our Code, we shall be led to the same result. An estate is an interest in real property. Civ. Code, § 701. A lease—an estate for years—is an estate in real property. Civ. Code, § 761, subd. 3. But, though a lease is an "estate," i. e., an interest in real property, it is not "real" estate. It is a chattel. Civ. Code, § 765. True, it is a chattel real (section 765); but all chattels are included within the Code definition of personal property (Civ. Code, § 14, subd. 3; Code Civ. Proc. § 17, subd. 3). It follows, therefore, that, under the definitions to be found in our Codes, a lease for years, though a chattel real, is personal property, and therefore, though it may be an estate or interest in real property, it is not such an estate or interest as is connoted by the words "real estate."

"A term for years is only personal property —a chattel real. * * * An assignment of a term for years is, therefore, governed generally by the rules applicable to the sale of personal property." Jeffers v. Easton, Eldridge Co., 113 Cal. 352-353, 45 Pac. 680, 681.

See, also, Summerville v. Stockton Milling Co., 142 Cal. 538, 539, 76 Pac. 243.

[3] If the term "real estate," as used in this subdivision of our statute of frauds, were held to include a lease for years, a singular anomaly might arise. Neither an agreement for, nor the actual transfer of, a lease for one year or less need be in writing. This is because our statute of frauds, by appropriate qualifying language, in effect exempts from its operation all leases for a term not longer than one year. Code Civ Proc. § 1973, subd. 5, and Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 5, and section 1091. But the words "real estate" as used in subdivision 6 of sections 1624 of the Civil Code and 1973 of the Code of Civil Procedure, are not thus limited by any qualifying word or phrase. The result is that those words, as used in subdivision 6, include any and every interest in real property, which property may be denominated "real estate." So that, if it were proper to classify an estate for years as "real estate," then no agreement authorizing or employing an agent or broker, for a compensation or a commission, to find a purchaser of any lease, even of a lease for one month, would be valid unless the employment were in writing.

"Estates for years embrace all terms limited to endure for a definite and ascertained period, however short or long this period may be; that is to say, they embrace terms for a fixed number of weeks or months, or for a single year, as well as for any definite number of years, however great." 24 Cyc. 958.

Thus in Stoppelkamp v. Mangeot, 42 Cal. 316, it was held that a lease for one month is technically a tenancy for years. Since a parol lease for a year or for a shorter definite period is valid, what an anomaly it would be if an agreement employing a broker to find a purchaser for such a lease were invalid unless it or a memorandum thereof were in writing! And yet such an anomalous situation is inescapable if the words "real estate," as used in subdivision 6 of the statute, shall be held to include leasehold interests.

[4] We are, of course, aware that there is a reverse side to the picture which we have painted of an anomalous situation, and that under our construction of the words "real estate" an oral employment of a broker to secure a purchaser of a lease for a term longer than one year will be valid, although the lease which is the subject-matter of the employment must be in writing in order to be valid. But because either construction of the words "real estate" will involve what appears to be somewhat of an anomaly, we think there is all the more reason why those words should be construed in the light of our Code definitions—definitions which, as at common law, make all chattels real as well as personal to fall within the definition of personal property.

[5] There is nothing in Commercial Bank v. Pritchard, 126 Cal. 600, 59 Pac. 130, which conflicts with the foregoing views. That case, following the reasoning in Garber v. Gianella, 98 Cal. 527, 33 Pac. 458, holds that an instrument whereby a lease is created must be deemed to be a "conveyance" for all the purposes mentioned in sections 1213 and 1214 of the Civil Code. The court was obliged so to hold because, by section 1215 of the Civil Code, there is an express legislative declaration that the term "conveyance," as used in sections 1213 and 1214, shall embrace every instrument, except wills, whereby any estate or interest in real property is created, aliened, mortgaged, or incumbered. But because the Legislature has said in effect, that, for the purposes of the law respecting the recordation of conveyances, a written instrument whereby a leasehold interest is created shall be deemed to be a "conveyance," it does not necessarily follow that the leasehold interest conveyed by such instrument is "real estate."

[6] The words "real property" as defined by section 14 of the Civil Code (subdivision 3) are "coextensive with lands, tenements and hereditaments." The learned author of the majority opinion in Commercial Bank v. Pritchard, supra, seems to have used the terms "real estate" and "real property" interchangeably. It doubtless was in view of this laxity in the commissioner's use of two expressions which, technically, are not convertible terms that Mr. Justice McFarland was prompted to write a separate but concurring opinion so as to avoid any possible future misconception as to the real purport and extent of the court's decision. That this was the purpose of the concurring opinion seems evident from its language, Mr. Justice McFarland saying:

> "I concur in the judgment; but the opinion of the Commissioner might, perhaps [italics ours], be construed as holding, generally, that an estate for years in land is real property, which, of course, is not so. An estate for years is, in its nature, personal property—a chattel real; and it is subject for most purposes to the law which applies to personal property. See Jeffers v. Easton, 113 Cal. 345, where the subject is discussed and our Code division of property into real and personal is shown to be substantially that of the common law."

We think it clear that whether we look to the common law or to our Code definitions the term "real estate" as used in subdivision 6 of sections 1624 of the Civil Code and 1973 of the Code of Civil Procedure, must be held not to embrace such an estate or interest in real property as amounts only to an estate for years.

The judgment is affirmed.

I concur: WORKS, J.

CRAIG, J. I dissent. In doing so it will serve no useful purpose to write an extended opinion, or one which will more than outline my reasons.

Unquestionably the term "real estate" has been construed as of narrower or broader meaning according to the context in which it is used. This is true of words of similar application, as "conveyance" and "grant." San Pedro, etc., R. R. Co. v. Hamilton, 161 Cal. 610, 119 Pac. 1073, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 686. According to Tiffany on Real Property (2d Ed.) § 3, the expression "real estate" is frequently used by Legislatures and courts as applying to any estate in lands. It is elementary that an estate is the interest one owns in either real or personal property; that a real estate is one whose duration is indefinite, as for life or in fee; and that interest in property of a fixed duration are personal estates. Robinson's Elementary Law, §§ 60 and 62. As used in this common-law sense, "estate" is a noun, and "real" a descriptive adjective. But the words "real estate" may be so employed as to jointly constitute a term in effect a single word in the nature of a noun; and in my opinion it was the intention of the Legislature to apply this meaning to the term when it said that "an agreement authorizing or employing an agent or broker to purchase or sell real estate for compensation or a commission" is invalid unless the same or some note or memorandum thereof be in writing, etc. Subdivision 6, § 1973, Code Civ. Proc. (Italics mine.) Commercial Bank v. Prichard, 126 Cal. 600, at page 603, 59 Pac. 130, holds that a lease for a term of five years with provision for its cancellation and renewal is a "conveyance of real estate." It is true that in the opinion of Mr. Justice McFarland, concurring, the meaning assigned the term by the opinion of the court was justified only because of sections 1214 and 1215 of the Civil Code. However, it is equally clear that the majority of the court did not entertain the same view of the matter as that able jurist. Sections 1214 and 1215 of the Civil Code have to do with the recording of instruments, whereas in that part of the opinion of the court where it is said that "the lease by the railway company to Prichard was a conveyance of real estate" no reference to rights based upon the recording of the instrument was made. That phase of the case was not then being discussed. The opinion states that "the lease * * * is real estate," and upon that fact predicates the proposition that the warehouse placed upon the land by the owner of the lease went with a conveyance of the lease. To my mind the purpose of subdivision 6 was clearly intended to have general application in the prevention of fraud as between real estate agents and their customers, not only in disposing of estates in real property for life or of greater duration, but to accomplish the same purpose in connection with all of the transactions involving interests of any kind in land which are daily a part of the real estate agent's business. If an anomaly is thereby created, as pointed out in the majority opinion, it is the not unusual result of piecemeal legislation.

1. Corporations 🔑337—To make a director personally liable, he must be shown to have been present when debts in excess of subscribed stock are authorized.

To charge a director for debts of the corporation under Civ. Code, § 309, making directors liable for the creation of debts in excess of the subscribed stock, except when they dissent or are not present, he must be shown to have been present when the debts were authorized, the statute as to the directors being penal and strictly construed.

2. Corporations 🔑337—Director's presence at a meeting when indebtedness in excess of capital stock was authorized before he was elected held not to make him personally liable.

A director, who was present at a meeting in which indebtedness in excess of the amount of subscribed capital stock was authorized, and who was thereafter elected director at such meeting, is not liable under Civ. Code, § 309, making directors liable for debts incurred in excess of the subscribed capital stock, unless they dissent or are absent, since, not being a director when the resolution was passed, his presence was without significance, and he had no power to control the actions of the corporation, and was under no obligation to dissent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by the Judson Manufacturing Company, a corporation, and others against A. C. Wyckoff and others, executors of J. A. Elston, deceased. From judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Elbert W. Davis, of San Francisco, J. Raegen Talbot, of Oakland, and J. O. Davis, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Elston, Clark & Nichols, of Berkeley, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment against them in an action brought under section 309 of the Civil Code. Plaintiffs are creditors of the Keystone Construction Company and seek to charge the defendants' testator with liability for the indebtedness of the said company, which indebtedness, it is alleged, is over and above the amount of its subscribed capital stock, and was incurred while defendants' testator was a director of said corporation. The action was originally brought against J. A. Elston in his lifetime, but, upon suggestion of his death, the executors of his last will and testament were duly substituted as defendants in his place and stead.

The following facts were stipulated and agreed to as evidence in the case: At all times herein mentioned, down to 1912, the Keystone Construction Company was a corporation duly organized and existing under the laws of this state, with a total authorized capital stock of $25,000, divided into 250 shares of the par value of $100 each, fully subscribed and issued at the times mentioned. On March 31, 1911, W. A. Hackley, P. B. Hackley, and R. C. Hackley were the owners of all of the capital stock of said company. On said last-named date there was held a special meeting of the board of directors of said corporation. The minutes of said meeting recite that there were present W. A. Hackley, P. B. Hackley, and R. C. Hackley. By resolution, Guy Hyde Chick was employed as general manager of the corporation, such employment to continue until the completion of certain outstanding contracts which the company had entered into. By resolution duly carried, the three Hackleys were then employed to act as superintendents in the construction work being carried on by the company, and the president was authorized to borrow, from time to time, from the First National Bank of Berkeley such amounts of money for the use of the company as he might deem necessary, such loans not to exceed the aggregate sum of $10,000. Thereupon P. B. Hackley tendered his resignation as a director and vice president of the corporation, which was accepted, and J. A. Elston was, thereupon, unanimously elected director and vice president. Mr. Elston, thereupon, took his place as a member of the board and the meeting continued. R. C. Hackley tendered his resignation as director and secretary of the corporation, which resignation was accepted, and R. R. Smith was elected to serve in his place. Thereupon the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

> "Resolved that all checks and drafts executed by or in favor of this corporation, be signed by the president, W. A. Hackley and countersigned by the secretary R. R. Smith or Guy Hyde Chick."

The meeting then adjourned. At the time of said meeting (March 31, 1911), the debts of the Keystone Construction Company amounted to approximately $105,587.95. Between April 1, 1911, and September 8, 1911, Guy Hyde Chick, acting in his capacity as manager of said corporation, incurred debts amounting to $66,757.27. The details of this indebtedness are immaterial under our view of the rights of the parties.

[1] The only resolution of the directors authorizing the borrowing of money which was introduced in evidence was one which was carried before the election of J. A. Elston as a director of the corporation. The mere fact that an indebtedness in excess of the amount of the subscribed capital stock was created during the time that J. A. Elston was a director is not sufficient to warrant a recovery against him. It is also necessary to prove that he was present when the indebtedness was created. This burden has not been sustained by the plaintiff. In the case of Irvine v. McKeon, 23 Cal. 475, it was said, in considering a similar question:

> "It was necessary for the plaintiff to prove also that these debts were contracted under the administration of the defendant, as one of the directors or trustees of the corporation, and that he was 'present when the same did happen'; for 'those who were not present when the same did happen' are expressly excepted from the liability imposed by the statute. In this case, there was no evidence whatever upon this material point."

In the case of Moss v. Smith, 171 Cal. 777, 155 Pac. 90, the case of Irvine v. McKeon, supra, was expressly approved, and attention was called to the numerous cases in accord therewith.

[2] Section 309 of the Civil Code, while remedial in so far as the creditors are concerned, is penal in its nature, when considered from the standpoint of the directors (Moss v. Smith, supra), and its provisions are to be strictly construed. In the present case there is an entire absence of any evidence to show that J. A. Elston was present as a director at the time of the creation of the debts of which complaint is made. Appellant relies upon the evidence in the record that Elston was present at the meeting of March 31, 1911, at which he was elected a director, and that before his election as such director, a resolution was passed empowering the president to borrow money from the bank. Obviously, this cannot strengthen the case of plaintiff. Elston was not a director at the time this resolution to borrow money was passed, and his presence at the meeting was without significance. Not being a director, he had no power to control in any way the actions of the corporation, and he was under no obligation to enter his dissent to a proceeding which in no way concerned him at that time.

The trial court has found that Elston did not—

> "either as a director of the Keystone Construction Company or otherwise, create, or act with any one else in creating, any indebtedness of the Keystone Construction Company, nor did any one else ever create or authorize the creation of any indebtedness of said company on any occasion when he was both present and an officer of said company."

This finding, we think, is sustained by the evidence, and compels the judgment which was entered for the defendants.

The judgment is affirmed.

GRIMES v. LAMAR et al. (Civ. 4079.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 27, 1923.)

1. New trial 🔑138—Premature notice of entry of judgment held ineffectual so that notice of intention to move for new trial held not made too late.

Notice that judgment had been entered at a time previous to its actual entry has no force whatever, and a notice of intention to move for new trial within the time limited by Code Civ. Proc. § 660, after actual entry, was on time.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1072—Party may be deprived of substantial rights by erroneous refusal to grant motion for new trial.

Since the trial court, unlike the appellate court, is not required to affirm a judgment where the evidence is conflicting, defendant is deprived of a substantial right by an erroneous refusal to grant a motion for new trial.

3. Appeal and error 🔑790(3)—When appellate court will set aside appeal from judgment pending outcome of trial court's action on motion for new trial.

Where appellate court reverses an erroneous order refusing a motion for new trial on ground not made in time, it will set aside the appeal from the judgment, since, if the lower court should grant the motion for new trial, the effect of that order would be to set aside the judgment, and a dismissal of the appeal from the judgment would follow, while, if the motion for new trial is denied, the order denying it may be brought into the record on appeal from the judgment and reviewed in connection with appeal from judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 956.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by Anna Wilson Grimes against Sarah Ann Lamar and another. Judgment for plaintiff. From the judgment and an order dismissing motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Order refusing motion for new trial reversed, and appeal from judgment set aside.

Porter C. Blackburn, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

R. E. Bledsoe, of San Bernardino, and Geo. B. Ross, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. [1] In this action judgment against the defendants was entered on the 13th day of September, 1921. On the 9th day of that month the plaintiff gave notice to the defendants that judgment had been entered on the 6th day of September, 1921. On the 23d day of November, 1921, the defendants served upon the plaintiff and on the 26th day of that month filed a notice of intention to move for a new trial. On the 3d day of December, 1921, the plaintiff moved for dismissal of the motion for a new trial on the ground that the notice of intention to move for a new trial was not given within the time allowed by law. This motion was granted. On December 13, 1921, the defendants gave notice of appeal from the judgment and from the order granting plaintiff's motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial.

The notice of entry of judgment was premature and ineffectual for any purpose, since there could be no valid notice of the existence of something which did not in fact exist. North American Co. v. Outer Harbor Co., 178 Cal. 406, 173 Pac. 756. Therefore the notice of intention to move for a new trial was not too late, and, at the time when the order of dismissal was made, the time within which the court might act on the motion for new trial had not expired. Code Civ. Proc. § 660.

[2] Without attempting to contest the proposition that the order dismissing the proceedings for a new trial was erroneous, respondent claims that such action of the court was harmless error, and not prejudicial to the rights of appellant, because there is an appeal from the judgment, and because, as respondent contends, "there is nothing in the record to detract from the righteousness of the judgment rendered in respondent's favor," and that there could not have been any warrant for the granting of a new trial on any of the grounds asserted in the motion.

One of the grounds stated in the proposed motion for a new trial was that the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision. Under the rule that on appeal this court will not reverse a judgment on account of insufficiency of the evidence if there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, it may be that we would be required to affirm the judgment. But the trial judge, in considering the motion for a new trial, would not have been bound by that rule. It might be (although we are not to be understood as intimating that it would be) that in reviewing the evidence he would have been dissatisfied with the findings and would have granted the motion. This he would have had authority to do. It follows therefore that by refusal to consider the motion for a new trial on its merits, and by dismissal of that motion, the defendants have been deprived of a substantial right which cannot be corrected on appeal from the judgment as the record now stands. Therefore it is our conclusion that the order dismissing the motion for a new trial should be reversed.

[3] It seems to us that in this condition of the case we should not at this time proceed to determine on its merits the appeal from the judgment. If, pursuant to the reversal of the order, and on hearing of the motion for a new trial, the lower court should make an order granting that motion, the effect of that order would be to set aside the judgment, and a dismissal of the appeal from the judgment would appropriately follow. If, on the other hand, the motion for a new trial is denied, the order denying that motion may be brought into the record here on appeal from the judgment, and we may then review the merits of the order denying the motion for a new trial in connection with and as a part of the appeal from the judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 956.

The submission of the appeal from the judgment is set aside. The order dismissing the motion for a new trial is reversed.

HUSSEY v. LOEB. (Civ. 4364.)

1. Pleading 🔑120(1) — Answer denying any indebtedness for wages raises issue.

The allegation of a complaint that certain wages are due and unpaid is sufficiently denied by an answer which, in addition to a categorical denial of the allegations of the complaint, denies that there was due plaintiff on account of wages the sums alleged, or any sum at all, to put in issue the allegation of wages due.

2. Appeal and error 🔑843(2)—Where nonsuit is properly granted on other grounds, question of defective plea of limitations not determined.

It is unnecessary on appeal to determine the sufficiency of a plea of limitations for failure to refer to the subdivision of the statute relied upon, where a nonsuit was properly granted on other grounds.

3. Witnesses 🔑178(4)—Executrix waived incompetency of plaintiff as to transactions with testator by taking plaintiff's deposition.

Where the executrix of the estate of a deceased person takes the deposition of the adverse party incompetent to testify under Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3, the provisions of such section are thereby waived, and such adverse party may put such deposition in evidence on the trial.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1056(6)—Exclusion of testimony which would not have avoided nonsuit harmless.

In an action against the estate of a deceased person, where plaintiff's deposition was erroneously excluded under Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3, such error was harmless where the evidence therein contained was insufficient had it been admitted to avoid a nonsuit ordered by the court.

5. Account 🔑18—Evidence held insufficient to warrant recovery.

In an action in which plaintiff sought an accounting for wages and profits due him under an alleged agreement by which he was to receive a percentage of the profits of his work in refinishing, polishing, and varnishing, repairing and upholstering old furniture, evidence held insufficient where no attempt was made to prove the amount of profits of the finishing business during the period covered by the contract.

6. Executors and administrators ⚷221(3) — Evidence as to where decedent procured money to start in business, immaterial.

In an action against an executrix for wages due and an accounting of profits under an alleged agreement, testimony of a brother of deceased as to where decedent obtained his money to start in business was properly excluded as immaterial to any issue; such testimony not tending to show that decedent's estate was subject to accounting at the instance of plaintiff.

7. Executors and administrators ⚷221(3)— Testimony of offer by witness to sell decedent's books of account inadmissible as not binding on executrix.

In an action against an executrix for an accounting of wages and profits alleged to be due, testimony of a brother of defendant's decedent as to his offer to sell decedent's books of account was properly excluded as not binding upon the executrix, in the absence of her refusal after demand to produce such books for the purposes of accounting.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Charles B. Hussey against Henrietta Loeb, as executrix of the last will of Otto Loeb, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Eastin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Theo. L. Breslauer, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from the judgment following defendant's motion for nonsuit. The appeal was taken to the Supreme Court, and by that court transferred to this court for hearing. It was taken under the provisions of section 953a et seq., Code of Civil Procedure, but plaintiff's counsel has not made any effort to comply with the provisions of the Code nor with the rules of court covering such an appeal. As the main consideration for an appellate court upon an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit is whether plaintiff's evidence was sufficient to support his own case, it should be apparent that the attention of the appellate court should be directed to at least some of that evidence. The court has been assisted to some extent by the voluntary act of the defendant in printing some of the testimony upon which plaintiff relies.

The facts of the case material to the opinion are that plaintiff claimed to have been a partner of one Loeb, deceased, under a written agreement made on November 25, 1911, by the terms of which Loeb agreed to employ Hussey as a finisher in Loeb's furniture business and to pay him for his services the regular union scale rate of wages paid to finishers for the actual time of his employment; also 25 per cent. of the net profits of the finishing business done by Loeb. The parties went to work under the agreement and continued until October 31, 1918, which was about the time of Loeb's death. The first cause of action alleged that there was due plaintiff on account of wages the sum of $942.20. The second cause of action alleged, upon information and belief, that 25 per cent. of the net profits of the said business amounted to $2,000, and that there had not been an accounting therefor. It was not alleged that this sum remained unpaid to plaintiff, or that any amount was due under this cause of action.

All the material allegations of the first cause of action were denied, and a special defense was interposed to the effect that plaintiff had been fully paid all moneys due him under said contract, and also that the contract on which the cause of action was based had, by mutual consent of the parties, been abrogated and canceled in the year 1912. To the second cause of action the same defense was made, and it was also denied that no accounting had been had, or that plaintiff was entitled to any accounting at this time. The provisions of section 337 and of subdivision 1 of section 339, Code of Civil Procedure, were also pleaded as barring both causes of action. The motion for a nonsuit was made upon the grounds of failure of proof and the bar of the statute.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that his allegation that $942.20 was the balance due on account of wages was not denied, but the answer categorically denied the allegations of the complaint, and, in addition, denied that there was due appellant on account of wages the sums alleged in the complaint "or any sum or at all." In addition to this the answer alleged that appellant had been fully paid all moneys coming to him under the contract, as well as for any and all work that appellant did for the decedent or for the respondent. This sufficiently raised the issue on the allegations of the first cause of action. It is true, as argued by appellant, that payment and abrogation of the contract are defenses, the burden of proof of which is upon the defendant; but we are now discussing the question of pleading, and not of proof. It is also argued that the pleading of the statute of limitations is defective in that the answer fails to refer to the subdivision of section 337 upon which the pleader relied. It is unnecessary to determine this because the nonsuit was properly granted on the ground of failure to prove either cause of action.

[4] However, we have read the deposition, which is appended to respondent's brief, and find that this error was not a substantial one. So far as the first cause of action is concerned, there is nothing in the deposition which tends to prove that anything was due appellant. The other evidence does not prove the allegations of this cause of action. Reference is made to the testimony of two witnesses who were called by the appellant to show that he had been working steadily under his contract of employment. One of these witnesses was a policeman who walked upon the beat where the place of business was located. Another was an undertaker who had maintained his place of business next door to Hussey and Loeb for the first two or three years of the seven-year period over which appellant's employment extended. From the testimony of these witnesses appellant insists that he intended to prove that he had commenced work under the contract on December 1, 1911, and had continued thereunder until October 31, 1918, working every day, Sundays and holidays included, during that entire period. Of course, the testimony of these witnesses did not tend to prove any such thing, and the testimony of appellant himself at the time of taking his deposition was to the effect that he worked very often on Sundays and holidays. It is also argued that a paper, which appellant designated as a "bill of particulars," and which was filed in response to a demand therefor, proves the first cause of action. This paper is merely a statement of receipts from Otto Loeb, presumably of moneys received by appellant over a period extending from December, 1911, to October, 1918. It does not show any time of employment or any sum due to appellant. From the entire record it is apparent that appellant did not prove any cause of action for wages due, and that he was not prevented from making such proof by any action of the trial court. Judgment for nonsuit as to the first cause of action was therefore properly granted.

[5] As to the second cause of action, although the pleading is not a model in any sense of the word, there are facts pleaded which, in the absence of objection, were sufficient to maintain a cause of action for an accounting. By the terms of the written contract upon which appellant relies he was entitled to 25 per cent. of the net profits of the finishing business. He alleged in his complaint that he was entitled to 25 per cent. of the net profits of appellant's business. He testified in his deposition that the finishing business "pertains to furnishing, that is, refinishing, taking the wood, the new wood, and finishing up; polishing, varnishing, and that sort of thing; and old work, repairing, upholstering; that is finishing business;" but that Loeb was also engaged in the business of buying and reselling furniture, and that he was engaged in "everything pertaining to a shop of that kind." Appellant made no effort whatever to prove the amount of profits of the finishing business covering the period of his contract, and was not prevented from doing so by any action of the trial court. The nonsuit was therefore properly granted as to the second cause of action.

Criticism is made of rulings of the trial court in the examination of the witness Fredericks. There was no error in any of these rulings. In fact, all the testimony of this witness might have been stricken out without affecting appellant's case.

[6, 7] The witness Jules Loeb, a brother of deceased, was asked if the deceased had borrowed money from him or his mother, or from some other person to start in the business with Hussey. He answered that he could not say. He was then asked if he knew where the deceased got the money to put into that business. The objection to this question was sustained. Appellant argues that this was error, as it was essential for him to prove that whatever estate the deceased had was the proceeds of the business with Hussey, and that the deceased had no business or means at the start. We are unable to perceive how the inquiry had any possible bearing upon appellant's case. The same witness was asked if after the death of decedent he had offered to sell the books of account of the business. Objection to this was sustained and this ruling is claimed to be error. The trial court properly ruled that this was not binding upon the estate as the witness had no authority to sell the books. In the absence of a refusal, after demand, to produce these books for the purpose of an accounting, the inquiry had no bearing upon the issues raised in either cause of action.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SAPIENZO. (Cr. 1082.)

1. Criminal law 🔑982—Formal order declaring sentences suspended is unnecessary.

Pen. Code, § 1203, authorizing the court or judge to suspend the imposing or execution of sentence and to direct that such suspension may continue for a time not exceeding the maximum possible term of such sentence, does not require that the court should enter a formal order declaring the imposition of sentence to be suspended.

2. Criminal law 🔑982—Granting probation is equivalent to suspending sentence.

The effect of an order granting probation to one who had pleaded guilty of an offense and releasing him from custody was to suspend the order of sentence.

3. Criminal law 🔑1137(2)—Defendant is not prejudiced by suspension of sentence at his request.

A defendant was not prejudiced by reason of not being sentenced within the time required by Pen. Code, § 1191, where the various continuances for the imposition of sentence were at his request and probation was granted on his request within the time limited provided by that section.

4. Criminal law 🔑982—Probation can be revoked for misconduct without proof of violation of terms.

The granting of probation is an act of grace subject to withdrawal, if clemency is abused, under the terms of Pen. Code, § 1203, subd. d, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1298, and the court did not abuse its discretion in withdrawing probation on undenied affidavits defendant had been guilty of a new crime, though there was no proof of violation of terms of the probation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Nazzareno Sapienzo pleaded guilty to a charge of assault with a deadly weapon, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial and revoking a previous order granting probation, and from the judgment entered on his plea, he appeals. Affirmed.

F. L. Simons, of Fresno, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. This is an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial, and from an order of the court revoking its prior order granting appellant probation, and from the judgment which was thereupon rendered.

The defendant was on January 10, 1922, duly arraigned upon a charge of assault with a deadly weapon. He pleaded guilty at that time to the charge, and the date for pronouncing judgment was fixed for January 28, 1922. An application for probation was made, and the matter was referred to the probation officer on the same day. Thereafter and from time to time at defendant's request imposition of sentence was continued until finally upon April 1, 1922, the court made an order releasing the defendant on probation. The order provided that defendant be released for 10 years on condition that he give a bond in the sum of $1,000 and that he remain in Fresno until April 10, 1922, and if released on bond that he report to the probation officer during such period, and unless detained that he go east and remain out of California during the term of his probation.

Subsequently the district attorney served notice upon defendant and his counsel that he would on July 8, 1922, move the trial court to revoke the order of probation.

The motion was based upon four affidavits of different persons, which indicated that the defendant had committed the crime of arson. At the hearing the defendant made no countershowing, and the order of probation was thereupon revoked.

Defendant appeals from such order, and contends that the court was without jurisdiction to revoke its former order and pronounce judgment upon him over his objection for the reason that no prior judgment had ever been pronounced or rendered against him, as provided by section 1191 of the Penal Code, and that no order had ever been made suspending the same; that the time within which judgment might have been pronounced had expired when sentence was suspended; and it is claimed, therefore, that the court was without jurisdiction to pronounce judgment, and this court must in consequence grant a new trial by reason of section 1202 of the Penal Code. It is further urged that the court below abused its discretion in revoking the probation of defendant without any evidence showing the violation of the terms of probation.

[1] The first contention is based upon the fact that at the time of the granting of probation no formal order was made by the court expressly declaring the imposition of sentence to be suspended.

We do not think the probation law requires such formal order. Section 1203 of the Penal Code provides:

> "The court, judge or justice thereof, may suspend the imposing, or the execution of sentence, and may direct that such suspension may continue for such period of time not exceeding the maximum possible term of such sentence, except as hereinafter set forth, and upon such terms and conditions as it shall determine."

It will be noticed that nowhere does this provision require that the court expressly declare that it suspends the imposition of sentence. The statute only declares that the court "may suspend the imposing" of sentence. It then proceeds and provides that the court "may direct that such suspension may continue," etc., which is the first direction as to what the order shall contain. This is precisely what was done.

[2] Moreover, the effect of the order granting probation and releasing the defendant from custody was to suspend the order of sentence. This is its manifest and necessary result. In Ex parte Slattery, 163 Cal. 176, 124 Pac. 856, it was held that under the so-called probation act the withholding of a commitment upon a judgment of conviction was the equivalent of suspending the execution of the sentence. We are of the opinion that the reasoning in that case applies with equal force here, and that there is no merit in this contention.

[3] Nor did the defendant suffer prejudice by reason of not being sentenced within the time required by law under the provisions of section 1191 of the Penal Code. The various continuances had for the imposition of sentence were at his request. The number of days between January 10th, when defendant pleaded guilty, and April 1st, when probation was granted, amount to 81, which is within the time limit provided by section 1191 for such imposition.

[4] Equally without merit is the contention that the court abused its discretion in revoking the probation of the defendant. The granting of probation is an act of grace subject to withdrawal if clemency is abused. Subdivision (d) of section 1203 of the Penal Code, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1298, provides in part as follows:

> "The court shall have power at any time during the term of probation to revoke or modify its order of suspension; of imposition or execution of sentence."

If any reviewable question may arise under the provisions of this act, they must always be confined to the fact as to whether or not the court abused its discretion. People v. Dunlop, 27 Cal. App. 460, 150 Pac. 389. The case does not present a situation where the court without justification has arbitrarily revoked its order of probation. The evidence upon the hearing for the revocation showed that the court had been deceived and imposed upon in granting the order. To hold under such circumstances that the order could not be revoked would be to sacrifice reason, justice, and the public welfare to technical refinement.

No other questions are here raised.

For the reasons given, the orders and judgment are affirmed.

I concur: RICHARDS, J.

PEOPLE v. EATON. (Cr. 656.)

1. Criminal law 🔑834(2)—Court not required to give instruction in language of defendant.

The trial court is not required to give a pertinent instruction in the language of defendant, or because so requested, if it is substantially covered by a given charge.

2. Criminal law 🔑829(3)—Refusing instruction covered by those given not error.

The refusal of defendant's instruction, stating the nature of the charge covered by those given by the court, is not error.

3. Criminal law 🔑789(4)—Refusing instruction objectionable as requiring acquittal, if jury had doubt as to defendant's having committed any one of acts alleged, not error.

In a prosecution under the Criminal Syndicalism Act, it was not error to refuse an instruction objectionable, in that it required an acquittal, if there was a reasonable doubt whether defendant "organized or assisted in organizing," or knowingly became a member of the proscribed organization, it not being sufficient to justify a verdict of not guilty, if a doubt was entertained whether defendant committed any one of the acts alleged in the information, as a conviction might be had if the jury believed that any of the conditions existed, although there might be a reasonable doubt as to others.

4. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Refusing misleading instruction not error.

In a prosecution under the Criminal Syndicalism Act, where all that the law required for conviction was that the organization advocated and taught criminal syndicalism at the time defendant organized or assisted in organizing or knowingly became a member of it, it was not error to refuse an instruction which required the jury, in order to convict, to believe that the organization at the time and subsequent thereto, advocated and taught criminal syndicalism.

5. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2 — Refusing instruction held not error.

In a prosecution under the Criminal Syndicalism Act, it was not error to refuse an instruction "that the mere advocacy of a change of industrial ownership or political change to be accomplished by lawful means is not a crime," that being so evident that the jury would need no such direction.

6. Criminal law 🔑829(12)—Instruction that personal opinions could not be foundation of verdict covered by instruction given.

In a prosecution under the Criminal Syndicalism Act, it was not error to refuse an instruction that the jury's personal opinions as to the facts proven on the trial could not properly be considered as a basis of their verdict, neither could their suspicions, it being sufficiently covered by a given instruction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

O. J. Eaton was convicted of violation of the Criminal Syndicalism Act, and he appeals. Affirmed.

H. L. Ford and J. S. Burnell, both of Eureka, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Defendant was convicted of a violation of what is known as the "Criminal Syndicalism Act" (St. 1919, p. 281), and he appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial. It is not disputed that the evidence warrants the verdict, and the only claim for a reversal is that the court prejudicially erred in refusing to give certain instructions proposed by the defendant.

[1] That it is the duty of the trial court to instruct the jury as to every legal principle involved in the case is made plain by the statute (Pen. Code, § 1127), and the decisions of the courts, but it is also established that the trial court is not required to give a pertinent instruction in the language of the defendant or because so requested, if it is substantially covered by the charge which is given.

With these admitted propositions in view we may examine the three proposed instructions which were refused.

[2] The first simply states the nature of the charge against the defendant and contains a definition of the terms "criminal syndicalism" and "sabotage." This instruction was clearly and fully covered by those given by the court and found on pages 22 and 28 of the transcript, and no further consideration of it is required.

[3] The second reads as follows:

> "If you find from the evidence to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, that, at the time and place mentioned in the information, the defendant, O. J. Eaton, did willfully organize or assist in organizing, or did knowingly become a member of any organization, or society or group or assemblage of persons organized or assembled to advocate or teach or aid and abet criminal syndicalism, then and under such circumstances you should find the defendant guilty as charged in the information. But, on the other hand, if you do not find from the evidence to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, or, if from all the evidence in the case you entertain a reasonable doubt that said defendant did organize or assist in organizing, or did knowingly become a member of any organization or society or group or assemblage of persons, organized or assembled to advocate or teach or aid and abet criminal syndicalism, then and under such circumstances you should find the defendant not guilty.
> "You are further instructed that, even though you do find that the defendant did willfully organize or assist in organizing or did knowingly become a member of a society or group or assemblage of persons, that of itself is not sufficient to convict him of the offense charged, you must further find from the evidence to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that such organization, if he did organize or assist in such or become a member of such organization, that such organization at the time and subsequent thereto advocated, or taught, or aided and abetted criminal syndicalism. And if you entertain any reasonable doubt that such organization advocated or taught or aided and abetted criminal syndicalism, then your verdict must not be guilty."

Manifestly it was not of much concern to appellant whether the court gave the first paragraph of said instruction, although, as a matter of fact, in other instructions, the court thoroughly covered that hypothetical phase of the case. There is no doubt that the prosecution's theory of guilt was abundantly presented. It is not so certain that equal consideration was paid to defendant's contentions.

However the second paragraph is objectionable in that it required an acquittal if the jury had a reasonable doubt whether the defendant "organized or assisted in organizing" or knowingly became a member of such proscribed organization. It was not sufficient to justify a verdict of not guilty, if the jury entertained a reasonable doubt that he committed any one of these acts as alleged in the information. A conviction might be had if the jury believed beyond a reasonable doubt that any of these conditions existed, although there might be a reasonable doubt as to the others. But, according to the proposed instruction, the jury must believe beyond a reasonable doubt that all these conditions existed before they could convict.

[4] The third paragraph was also defective and misleading, in that it required the jury, in order to convict, to believe that the organization at the time and "subsequent thereto" advocated and taught criminal syndicalism. All the law required was that the organization was of that character at the time defendant organized or assisted in organizing or knowingly became a member of it, since all these acts are alleged to have taken place subsequent to the enactment of the "syndicalism statute." The trial court was therefore justified in declining to give this instruction.

But whether so requested or not, the trial court should always be careful to set forth clearly to the jury that the burden of proof is upon the prosecution to establish all the elements of the crime to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, also that the defendant is presumed to be innocent until his guilt is so established and if, after a consideration of all the evidence in the case the jury entertain a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, they should find him not guilty.

These fundamental principles were not presented as directly and explicitly as they should have been, but, after reading all the instructions, we are satisfied that the jurors, as men of average intelligence, could not have misunderstood the requirements of the law in these respects. Indeed, as to reasonable doubt, it was clearly defined, and the jury was directed that "the defendant is entitled to the benefit of every reasonable doubt which you may have on the evidence." In connection with other instructions, which we need not quote, this would necessarily be understood as a direction to find the defendant not guilty if, after a consideration of all the evidence, there was in their minds a reasonable doubt of his guilt. It must be remembered, also, that these elementary matters are always stressed in the examination of the jurors and in the arguments of counsel. In view of all the facts, it would be an unwarranted reflection upon the intelligence of the jury to hold that they did not fully understand their duty in the premises.

[5] The second proposed instruction, "that the mere advocacy of a change in industrial ownership or political change to be accomplished by lawful means is not a crime," etc., is so evident that the jury would hardly need such direction, but, as a matter of fact, the identical language was used in a given instruction.

[6] The third, "I charge you that your personal opinions, if there be any, as to facts not proven upon the trial cannot properly be considered as the basis of your verdict in this case, nor can your suspicions. You can only act on evidence introduced upon the trial, and from that evidence and from that alone you must form your verdict unaided, unassisted, and uninfluenced by any opinions not found in the evidence," was sufficiently covered by the given instruction, "I instruct you that you are to be guided in your deliberations solely by the law and the evidence in this cause, and no other consideration must influence you in reaching a verdict."

As before stated, no question is raised as to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify a conviction, nor is it argued that the trial court committed error in any other respect, and it is apparent that the point made is not decisive and fatal.

The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

PEOPLE v. GOULDING. (Cr. 937.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1137(3), 1172(7)—Prejudicial error cannot be based on instruction favorable to defendant and given at his request.

In a prosecution for robbery, an instruction that, "If there is one single fact proved to the satisfaction of the jury by a preponderance of the evidence, which is inconsistent with the guilt of the defendant, this is sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt, and in such a case the jury should find the defendant not guilty," being given at defendant's request and being in his favor, did not constitute prejudicial error.

2. Criminal law 🔑829(12)—Instruction as to degree of proof held properly refused as covered by other instructions.

In a prosecution for robbery, refusal to instruct that defendant need not establish his defense beyond a reasonable doubt, nor even to establish it by a preponderance of the evidence, held not erroneous; the substance thereof being amply covered by other instructions given.

3. Criminal law 🔑814(12)—Instruction as to general reputation for peace and quiet held proper, although no evidence thereof.

In a prosecution for robbery, it was not error to give an instruction that, if the jury found from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant was guilty, they should so find "notwithstanding proof of his good reputation for peace and quiet," although no evidence was offered affecting the reputation of defendant.

4. Criminal law 🔑787(2)—Instruction that defendant could not be compelled to testify against himself held not improper.

In a prosecution for robbery, it was not error to instruct that defendant in a criminal case is not required to take the stand and testify, and that his neglect or refusal to be a witness cannot in any manner prejudice him nor be used against him on the trial or proceeding; the instruction being in practical conformity to Pen. Code, § 1323, and being for the benefit of defendant.

5. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Exclusion of evidence as to attempts to dispose of proceeds of robbery held harmless error.

In a prosecution for robbery, where among other things a ladies' hunting-case gold watch had been taken, exclusion of evidence that one who had been in defendant's company at the alleged time of the offense had tried to sell such a watch, and had later procured a loan on a watch of that description, held harmless error, in view of other evidence showing defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, and in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, providing that no judgment shall be set aside for error in rejection of evidence unless it has resulted in miscarriage of justice.

6. Robbery 🔑24(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction.

In a prosecution for robbery, evidence held to show defendant's guilt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

W. R. Goulding was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Judd, Stanley Visel, and Wm. Durham, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J. [1] Defendant was convicter on a charge of robbery. The case comes to this court on the clerk's transcript and the reporter's transcript only. In other words, no briefs on either side have been filed in the case. However, defendant's counsel on oral argument has submitted several reasons for a reversal, the first of which being that the learned judge of the trial court erred in giving a certain instruction to the jury, which was requested by defendant. It is as follows:

> "If there is one single fact proved to the satisfaction of the jury by a preponderance of the evidence, which is inconsistent with the guilt of the defendant, this is sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt, and in such a case the jury should find the defendant not guilty."

No reason was assigned by appellant's counsel, and none appears to this court, showing how or in what possible manner defendant was, or even might have been, prejudicially affected by the giving thereof. It is altogether in appellant's favor—not a word nor a syllable which does not suggest the propriety, if not the absolute duty, of the jury to find the defendant not guilty, provided there be a single fact established by a preponderance of the evidence inconsistent with his guilt. It would seem unnecessary to point out that a defendant who offered such an instruction and which was given at his request, should be estopped to claim any damage to his case by reason of its having been submitted to the jury for its consideration. He must at least show that prejudice resulted to him. Reason is abundant and authorities numerous to the effect that an appellant is in no position to complain of instructions, even though erroneous, which are given at his own request. A familiar principle to the effect that no man may profit by his own wrong, would seem to be a sufficient answer to appellant's contention in this regard.

[2] The second alleged error of which appellant complains deals with the refusal of the court to give the following instruction:

> "It is not necessary for the defendant to establish his defense beyond a reasonable doubt, nor even to establish it by a preponderance of proof; it is sufficient for him to raise a reasonable doubt of his guilt, and in such a case it is your duty to return a verdict of acquittal."

The essential elements of this instruction, at least as far as defendant is to be benefited thereby, are amply covered by other instructions given by the court. But counsel contends that the instruction in question, while accurate in its statement of the law, conflicts with the first instruction which has already been noticed. If it may be considered as conflicting with any instruction which was offered by the defendant and given by the court, appellant is in no position to complain. He cannot even unintentionally (and the court absolves defendant's counsel from any intentional wrongdoing in the premises) set a trap in that manner for the court and assume that he may reap the benefit of the court falling into it. A litigant who presents to the court two instructions, and such that, if one of them be given, consistency demands that the other be refused, cannot be heard to complain of the action of the court in erroneously deciding between them. It is a sound principle, as well as a most salutary one, that a party cannot be heard to complain of an error which he himself has been instrumental in bringing about. Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Fox, 60 Neb. 531, 83 N. W. 744.

[3] Following the oral argument presented by counsel for appellant, the next alleged error consists in the giving of the following instruction, which was requested by the people:

> "The court instructs the jury that if you find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty, then you should so find, notwithstanding proof of his good general reputation for peace and quiet."

Appellant complains that there was no evidence offered affecting the reputation of defendant for peace and quiet; but the presumption of law is that his reputation for these traits is good, and until such presumption be overcome by credible evidence the jury is bound to so consider it—just the same as though without such presumption evidence has been introduced to that effect. Indeed, counsel for defendant presented an instruction, and which was given by the court, covering, among other things, the matter completely in the following words:

> "* * * And in this case defendant is presumed to be of good character for the traits involved, namely, for peace and quietness, until such presumption is overcome by credible evidence in the case."

In the circumstances it is difficult if not impossible, to conceive of any possible prejudice resulting to defendant from the giving of the instruction of which appellant complains.

[4] The last instruction given by the court at the request of the people and of which complaint is made by appellant, reads as follows:

> "You are instructed that the defendant in a criminal action is not required to take the stand and testify. His neglect or refusal to be a witness cannot in any manner prejudice him, nor be used against him on the trial or proceeding."

Section 1323 of the Penal Code provides, in part:

> "A defendant in a criminal action or proceeding cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself. * * * His neglect or refusal to be a witness cannot in any manner prejudice him nor be used against him on the trial or proceeding."

It will thus be seen that there is no practical difference between the instruction given and that part of the section of the Penal Code herein set forth. Counsel for appellant contends that defendant was prejudiced, in that the court thereby emphasized the fact that defendant did not testify, and further suggested at least that he had a right to be heard if he desired to do so, but that he was "not required to take the stand and testify." Ruling upon a similar objection in the case of State v. Fuller, 34 Mont. 12, 85 Pac. 369, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 762, 9 Ann. Cas. 648, the court, by Brantly, C. J., said:

> "The defendant was not sworn as a witness. This fact was apparent to the jury. The court was perhaps not bound to instruct the jury with reference to this fact. It was entirely proper, however, if the court chose to do so, to inform the jury as it did, that the fact that the defendant failed to testify could not be used to his prejudice. In any event, the instruction was favorable to the defendant, and for that reason he has no right to complain of it."

Within the presumption that every one knows the law may safely be included the knowledge on the part of the individual members of the jury that the defendant is a competent witness in his own behalf. All jurors do not know that it is optional with a defendant whether or not he take the witness stand; and certainly the average person, without any experience as a juror in criminal cases, does not know that the neglect of a defendant to be a witness cannot be used in any manner against him. Indeed, it is common knowledge that the everyday citizen, upon having his attention directed to the fact that a given defendant has failed to avail himself of an opportunity to take the witness stand, immediately construes such failure on the part of the defendant as an admission of guilt. The jury must take the law of the case from the court. The law containing the instruction on which error is predicated is clearly in favor of defendant. It suggests to the jury the danger to the defendant, and warns the jury not to construe against the defendant his failure to take the stand in his own behalf. The instruction is altogether salutary, for the benefit of the defendant, and of which he ought not to be heard to complain. See State v. De Witt, 186 Mo. 61, 84 S. W. 956; Lamb v. State, 69 Neb. 212, 95 N. W. 1050.

In order that the next alleged error may be better understood, it becomes necessary to make a somewhat lengthy review of the principal facts as shown by the evidence: An elderly man named Griffin, Mrs. Griffin (who was the daughter-in-law of Griffin), a Mrs. Leslie, and a man named Hicks left Los Angeles on or about April 1, 1922, in an automobile for the purpose of visiting some friends of theirs named Humphries, who lived in the town of Tujunga. They arrived at their destination at about 4 or 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and remained there until about 8:30 or 9 o'clock p. m. of the same day. While at the Humphries home the guests, together with the hosts and some others who were present, partook of a repast consisting of sandwiches and some sort of intoxicating liquor. On the return trip the automobile containing the party was driven by Mrs. Leslie until the city of Glendale was reached. None of the members of the party was familiar with the roads in that locality, and somewhere within the city of Glendale the auto was stopped for the purpose of ascertaining the road to Los Angeles, at which time defendant Goulding, who had been standing on the sidewalks, accompanied by two men named Allen and Brown, respectively, jumped onto the runing board of the automobile in which Mr. Griffin and his party were riding, and, after stating that he was the chief of police of Glendale and that his companions were officers, inquired, among other things, what was wanted. He stated that because of the actions of the party, the members thereof might be arrested, etc. Being informed they had lost their way, defendant offered to drive them to their home in Los Angeles, which was actually done by Brown (one of defendant's companions)—he taking Mrs. Leslie's place at the wheel alongside of Hicks, and Mrs. Leslie, together with defendant Goulding and Allen, riding in the tonneau of the automobile with Mr. Griffin and the young Mrs. Griffin. On arriving at their destination in Los Angeles at about 10:30 o'clock p. m., an alleged robbery by defendant Goulding of Mr. Griffin took place; Mr. Griffin and Mrs. Griffin testifying that defendant, by means of force, took from Griffin his pocketbook containing a $20 bill and a stickpin; that he then backed out of the auto and ran away; Mr. Griffin was calling out, "Stop that man; he robbed me"; and Mrs. Griffin, while the robbery was taking place, trying to hold defendant's arm and asking, "What are you doing that to that old man for?" No effort was made at the time to apprehend defendant, for the reason apparently that he was a much larger and stronger man than any of the others in the party. After the robbery had occurred and all but Mr. Griffin had gone into the house where they were living, it is in evidence that defendant returned to the scene and robbed Mr. Griffin the second time, on which occasion he secured a ladies' small gold hunting-case watch and a silver dollar. The second robbery took place between the house at which Mr. Griffin was stopping and another house about 12 feet distant, and the entire second robbery was witnessed by a Mrs. Holmes from her bedroom, which was directly opposite the scene of the second robbery. Her testimony is in clear corroboration of Griffin's testimony as to what occurred at that time, and her identification of defendant is clear and positive. Defendant was not the chief of police of Glendale, nor an officer at all, but two or three days after the robbery, when defendant was in the office of the real chief of police of Glendale, in the presence of the chief and two other officers, he denied that he was in the automobile with Griffin and his party, or with them at all. Defendant did not take the witness stand; neither did either Allen or Brown, the two men who were with defendant—the only evidence of any real importance introduced in defendant's behalf being that of Mrs. Leslie and Hicks. Mrs. Leslie, whose testimony is mainly negative, is contradicted in many details by disinterested witnesses. Both she and Hicks declared that they neither saw nor heard on the part of Griffin and Mrs. Griffin anything that would indicate that a robbery was taking place in the automobile, although Mrs. Leslie was in position where she might readily have seen all that was transpiring had it not been, according to her own testimony, for the attentions which she was receiving from Allen, consisting of her being hugged and kissed by him, which attentions on the part of Allen she said she generously divided between herself and Mrs. Griffin; also that she had had 8 or 10 more drinks of brandy while she was in the Humphries home. Her testimony also showed that she had considerable feeling against Mrs. Griffin at the time of the trial. Hicks had his back to the scene. He testified that when the auto stopped at Mrs. Leslie's home, there was some commotion in the back of the car; Goulding, the defendant, backed out first; did not see any robbery; could not see very well; it was dark there; there was no scream nor any blows struck that he knew of; didn't hear the remark ascribed to Mrs. Griffin: "What are you hitting him for?" Hicks said he wasn't drunk, but that he had had a couple of drinks of whisky and 4 or 5 drinks of wine. It was also shown that Hicks was very friendly with Mrs. Leslie when the trial took place.

[5, 6] The error complained of in connection with the trial of the case consists in the refusal of the court to admit certain evidence by which defendant offered to prove by one witnes that Allen (the man who was on the back seat with defendant Goulding, Mr. Griffin, and the two women) within a few days after the robbery had tried to sell a ladies' hunting-case gold watch to the witness, and by another witness that Allen had procured a loan from the witness on a watch of that description. In the circumstances the evidence of such facts would have had a tendency to establish either that Allen alone committed the robbery, or that the robbery was the result of a conspiracy, and that Allen was a confederate of or coconspirator with Goulding. Assuming that the jury might have taken the view that Allen was the person who perpetrated the crime, the offered evidence would have been very material to Goulding's defense; hence it should have been received. But in view of all the evidence in the case, it is apparent that, not only was Goulding's guilt shown beyond a reasonable doubt, but that the evidence very nearly approached a demonstration of his guilt. Assuming that there was nothing in the conduct or demeanor of any of the witnesses testifying for the people which would have militated against their good intentions and their desire to tell the truth, it would seem entirely improbable that any fair-minded jury, after listening to all the evidence, including therein the testimony of the witnesses called for the purpose of testifying to the two transactions in question, could have had a reasonable doubt, founded upon either the evidence or the lack of evidence in the case as to the guilt of the defendant. Section 4½ of article 6 of the California Constitution provides that—

> "No judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted, in any case, on the ground of misdirection of the jury, * * * or rejection of evidence, * * * unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

The court is of the opinion that neither the rejection of the evidence referred to, nor the giving of any instruction nor the refusal to give any instruction of which complaint is made by appellant, and upon which appellant bases his appeal herein, resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment of conviction and the order denying the motion for new trial are affirmed.

SMITH v. RIEDELE. (Civ. 3882.)

Work and labor 🔑28(3)—Evidence held insufficient to show implied promise to pay for services.

Evidence held insufficient to establish an implied promise to pay for services rendered during a period of eight or nine years by one occupying a position similar to that of a member of the family.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Edward Smith against Philip Riedele. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; MYERS, J., not participating.

C. E. Joslin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. In this action plaintiff sued to recover for personal services rendered to defendant, relying for a recovery upon an implied promise of defendant to pay. The services were varied in their nature, and many of them were performed about the house and grounds of respondent. Upon a motion for a nonsuit the trial court determined that plaintiff's evidence was barren of a showing of an implied promise. The motion for a nonsuit was granted and judgment went for defendant accordingly. Plaintiff appeals.

Appellant was the only witness at the trial. His testimony showed the rendition by him of various services for respondent, it is true, these items of performance on his part extending over a period between eight and nine years in extent; but respondent contends that under all the circumstances disclosed by the testimony the trial court was justified in determining that there was no implied promise to pay. In this view we are bound to concur. During the entire period mentioned, between eight and nine years, appellant resided in the household of respondent. Not only did he have a room in the family residence, but he ate his meals at the family table. When there were guests at table he usually sat with them. He made no payment whatever, during all of this period, for either room or board. On various occasions respondent furnished appellant with clothing. The two sometimes fished together, and when they did appellant used tackle bought by respondent. The latter paid for appellant's fishing license, on one occasion at least, and perhaps more, as the evidence on the subject is not clear. During these years respondent frequently gave money to appellant, the total sum so disbursed being over $400, but it was neither given nor received as compensation for any service, being a pure gratuity. Appellant had some money from other sources, as his testimony discloses that he was under at least one outside employment during the period of his residence with respondent. The evidence does not show how long this employment lasted, but it was with a corporation in which respondent was interested. At the end of the period which we have twice mentioned the relationship which had existed between the parties was terminated and appellant left respondent's home. The evidence discloses no reason for the severance, but it was then, for the first time, that appellant made claim that respondent was indebted to him for services.

The record before us reveals a situation which is concluded by a mass of decided cases all over the country, a number of which are found in the reports of our own state. A mention of two of these latter will suffice to dispose of the appeal. In a recent case in which a niece had long resided with her uncle, practically in the capacity of a daughter, and had brought suit against his personal representative to recover the value of services rendered, the Supreme Court approved the following language of a text-writer:

> "Ordinarily, where services are rendered and voluntarily accepted, the law will imply a promise upon the part of the recipient to pay for them; but where services are rendered by members of a family, living in one household, to each other, or necessaries are supplied by one near relation to another, the law will presume that they were gratuitous favors merely, prompted by friendship, kindness, and the relationship between them. And in such case, before the person rendering the service can recover, the express promise of the party served must be shown or such facts and circumstances as will authorize the jury to find that the services were rendered in the expectation by one of receiving, and by the other of making compensation therefor."

The court then cited authorities to the effect that the rule applies to children by adoption as well as to children by blood, and to orphans received into the family. Ruble v. Richardson (Cal. Sup.) 204 Pac. 572. In an earlier case of the same nature the Supreme Court used the following language:

> "It has been said many times that the question [of plaintiff's right to recover] is one that must be determined on the circumstances of the particular case, the question in each case being whether it can reasonably be inferred that pecuniary compensation was in the view of the parties at the time the services were rendered. * * * In the consideration of such circumstances, the degree of the relationship may strengthen or diminish the implication that the services are acts of gratuitous kindness and affection, according to its proximity or remoteness. * * * Our own decisions appear to support the doctrine that to authorize compensation in such cases the circumstances must be such as to warrant the inference that it was the expectation of both parties that compensation should be made." Crane v. Derrick, 157 Cal. 667, 109 Pac. 31.

While the stituation of appellant in respondent's family was perhaps a little different from that of the persons contemplated by the Supreme Court in its opinion in Ruble v. Richardson, we are convinced that his testimony brings his case within the broad doctrine of that case and of Crane v. Derrick, and that there is no evidence in the record which would have supported a finding of an implied promise by respondent to pay him for the services rendered. Therefore the motion for a nonsuit was properly granted.

Judgment affirmed.

DUNLAP v. CHATOM et al. (Civ. 2526.)

Joint adventures 🔑5(2) — Evidence held to show grain was not purchased by defendants on joint account with plaintiff.

Evidence held to show that the relations between plaintiff and defendants were not founded on a contract covering all the grain transactions of defendants, but that the parties were joint adventurers in some of these transactions as to which they made special agreements, and that there was no such agreement as to the transaction on which plaintiff bases suit for conversion of proceeds.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Action by S. C. Dunlap against A. G. Chatom and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James W. Bell, of Los Angeles, and L. J. Maddux, of Modesto, for appellant.

R. L. McWilliams, and James F. Peck, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an action for damages in the sum of $6,000, for the alleged conversion of 500 tons of barley. The complaint is cast in the usual form of an action in conversion, and alleges as follows:

> "That the plaintiff is informed and believes and, on such information and belief, alleges that the defendant T. W. Norcross has, since the time hereinafter alleged, been adjudged an incompetent, and one Cope Norcross is the duly authorized, qualified, and acting guardian of the person and estate of the said T. W. Norcross; that 'Corcoran Mill & Warehouse' is a fictitious name under which the defendants, during all the times herein mentioned, conducted a business of buying and selling grain at Corcoran, in the county of Kings, state of California; that on or about the 1st of June, 1919, the defendants, under the name Corcoran Mill & Warehouse, purchased of one O. C. Heck, and the said O. C. Heck delivered to the defendants under the name Corcoran Mill & Warehouse, in said county, 500 tons of barley on the joint account of plaintiff and Corcoran Mill & Warehouse, at an agreed price of $2 per hundredweight, under and pursuant to an oral agreement between plaintiff and Corcoran Mill & Warehouse to purchase grain on joint account and to sell only on joint agreement, and when so sold the proceeds thereof to be divided in the proportion of one-half to the plaintiff and one-half to the Corcoran Mill & Warehouse, and if a sale could not be made as aforesaid, then by said agreement the grain should be divided in like proportion between them. It was also a part of said agreement that said parties should share equally any losses arising out of any purchase made on joint account; that on or about the said 1st day of June, 1919, at Corcoran, in said county, the defendants then being in possession of said barley unlawfully converted and disposed of the same to their own use to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $6,000."

The defendants A. G. Chatom, Thomas H. Chatom, and Corcoran Mill & Warehouse filed separate answers, specifically denying the averments of the complaint. The cause was tried by the court, sitting without a jury.

A default was entered against the defendant T. W. Norcross, and the action dismissed as to the defendant J. C. Walsh. As to the other defendants, A. G. and Thomas H. Chatom and Corcoran Mill & Warehouse, the findings followed the denials of the answers, and the decision, therefore, was in their favor. Judgment for said defendants was accordingly entered. The appeal is by the plaintiff from said judgment.

The important contention of the plaintiff is that the findings are without sufficient probative support, but an examination of the evidence as it is presented here has convinced us that it is the contention and not the findings which the record does not support.

The following facts are extracted from the evidence as it was produced before the trial court: For some time prior to the date of the transaction on which this action is predicated, the defendants A. G. Chatom, T. W. Norcross, and J. C. Walsh were copartners, engaged in the buying and selling of grain under the firm name and style of "Corcoran Mill & Warehouse" at the town of Corcoran, in Kings county. During the period of time mentioned, the Corcoran Mill & Warehouse and the plaintiff did, on different occasions, enter into arrangements whereby they agreed to jointly purchase grain and likewise sell the same, equally sharing the profits of such transactions; or, as the witness A. G. Chatom explained it:

> "Those fellows, my partners down there (referring to Norcross and Walsh), whenever they had a deal that was too large for them to handle, why they would call Dunlap's assistance in for help—probably help finance it."

He further stated that the plaintiff was interested only in those deals with the defendants in which he and his partners thought it advantageous or convenient to allow him to participate. On or very near the 12th day of April, 1919, the defendant T. W. Norcross, presumably acting for the copartnership, entered into negotiations with one O. C. Heck, of Lemoore, Kings county, for the purchase of 500 tons of barley. Heck, testifying on behalf of the plaintiff, stated that he "sold him (Norcross) 500 tons of barley, to be delivered off of the first cutting; that is, the first that the machines cut." There was not made as to this transaction between Norcross and Heck any agreement or memorandum in writing, nor was any payment made to Heck thereon at the time of these negotiations. Heck further testified that either in the latter part of April or early part of May, 1919, he met, by appointment, A. G. Chatom, in the office of the Corcoran Mill & Warehouse in Lemoore. Asked what the conversation or substance thereof was between him and said Chatom, Heck testified:

> "He was there a couple of days, trying to get me to agree to deliver this 500 tons of barley and I told him I wouldn't do it. I told him why. Q. Well, just state what you told him. A. Well, I told him that I figured that Norcross and Walsh was out of it, and, if they were, those were the people that I was doing business with and I didn't owe anybody any 500 tons of barley."

Heck proceeded to say that Chatom insisted that his firm was entitled to the barley and threatened to sue Heck if he did not deliver the same. To this Heck replied:

> "Well, all right; if you think that I owe you 500 tons of barley, and think that I can't deliver it, or won't, I will show you that I will, and on that I delivered the 500 tons of barley. * * * He (A. G. Chatom) made out a little bit of an agreement which was signed by him and I. The next day I asked him for a check for $10,000; and he didn't want to give it to me but he did—his own personal check on this barley."

We return now to Norcross' activities with respect to his transaction. On the 24th day of April, 1919, he addressed to the plaintiff a letter which, among other statements, contained the following:

> "Our records here for joint account are as undernoted: 50,000 sack crop (est.) on 1,600 acres. This is a conservative estimate. 500 tons June barley. Both lots being purchased at $2.00 f. o. b. cars; the 50,000 sacks to be delivered at Corcoran and the 500 tons at Stratford."

It is most probable—in fact, counsel for the defendant so assume in their brief—that the "500 tons of June barley" mentioned in said letter was the Heck barley.

It appears from the evidence that the defendants were also, during all the times above referred to, transacting business with a concern known as the U. S. Trading Corporation. The dealings had with said corporation were always or generally conducted upon the same general terms as were the dealings between the plaintiff and the defendants; that is to say, whenever the U. S. Trading Corporation and the defendants had transactions together involving the purchase and sale of grain, they jointly shared the profits or returns on such transactions. On the 25th day of April, 1919 (the day following that on which he addressed the letter above referred to to Dunlap, and approximately 12 days subsequently to the negotiations he had with Heck), Norcross addressed a letter to the U. S. Trading Corporation, in which he said, among other things: "We beg to confirm sale of 500 tons of barley at $2.00 f. o. b. either Corcoran or Stratford." It should be noted that the letter addressed by Norcross to the plaintiff stating that he had purchased the Heck barley on the joint account with the plaintiff, and the letter addressed to the U. S. Trading Corporation offering it the 500 tons which Norcross evidently thought he had secured from Heck were written within a few hours of each other. And this brings us to a reference to the testimony tending to show that, at the time he was attempting to consummate a deal with Heck for the 500 tons of barley, Norcross was suffering more or less from the result of excessive alcoholic indulgences, and, inferably from the evidence, also from the inordinate use of some narcotic. It should be added here that he was subsequently committed to the insane asylum and that, during the period of time intervening the date on which he was engaged in negotiations with Heck and the date of his commitment to the insane asylum, he was in no mental condition to transact business in a reliable manner.

After Norcross had assured the U. S. Trading Corporation that he would transfer the Heck barley to it, the defendant A. G. Chatom, being of the belief that Norcross was incapable mentally of transacting business, sent a telegram to the Trading Corporation warning it against transacting any further business with Norcross, in so far as the copartnership was concerned, until said Chatom should give said corporation further notice. To this letter the Trading Corporation replied, under date of April 30, 1919, to the effect that when Norcross was in San Francisco he had sold the Heck barley to it. Thereupon said Chatom replied that he would endeavor to carry out any contract made by Norcross with the Trading Corporation with respect to the Heck barley. Chatom explained that the reason he expressed a willingness to let the Trading Corporation have the Heck barley was that said corporation had been one of the very best patrons or customers the Corcoran Mill & Warehouse had and, therefore, he desired to let said corporation have the Heck barley in order to keep its good will. Hunsucker, manager of the Corcoran Mill & Warehouse, and the plaintiff also testified that the Trading Corporation had been one of the best customers the defendant had during the years of the existence of the copartnership.

Said Chatom testified that, upon learning that Norcross had told the plaintiff that the Heck barley had been purchased on the joint account of the latter and the Corcoran Mill & Warehouse and had also about the same time agreed to sell said barley to the Trading Corporation, he communicated with the plaintiff, asking him to call at Corcoran for the purpose of discussing the matter. The plaintiff appeared at Corcoran on the 4th day of May, 1919, and a conference was held between him and A. G. Chatom, in the presence and hearing of Thomas H. Chatom, the son of said A. G. Chatom. At this time there was another deal on between the defendants and one Peterson for the purchase of the latter's barley, amounting to 1,500 tons. As to what occurred between the plaintiff and A. G. Chatom on the 4th day of May, when the former appeared at Corcoran for a conference with the latter with regard to the Heck barley, A. G. Chatom testified:

> "What, if anything, was said by Mr. Dunlap in regard to your letting the U. S. Trading Corporation have the Heck barley? A. Well, that is what he said. He says: 'Let them have it.' He says: 'That is all right.' He says: 'As long as you get the Peterson barley.' He says: 'That is good enough for me. There is ten or twelve thousand dollars in that.' Q. That is the Peterson barley, you mean? A. That was the Peterson barley. Q. Did you afterwards get the Peterson barley? A. Yes, sir; we made a brand new—we had to renew a contract; he telegraphed me from Los Angeles to make a different contract with Peterson, and I had to give Peterson $5 a ton more than the original contract that Norcross was supposed to have made."

A. G. Chatom further testified that on the same occasion the plaintiff said to him: "Go ahead and deliver the Heck barley, don't count me in this." Thomas H. Chatom, in a measure, corroborated the above testimony of his father.

On June 23, 1919, Dunlap rendered a statement to the Corcoran Mill & Warehouse, showing the several transactions occurring between him and the defendants involving the purchase and sale of grain, which covered a period from and including May 1st of the year named to and including June 13th of the same year. Therein no reference was made to the Heck barley. In fact, it was stipulated by counsel for the plaintiff that "there was no account at any time that contains any reference to any 500-ton barley purchased in the year 1919."

Nothing further was said between plaintiff and the defendants relative to the Heck barley until January 29, 1920, some eight or nine months after the purchase of said barley by Chatom, when the plaintiff addressed to the Corcoran Mill & Warehouse a letter, in which, among other things, he said:

> "It has just come to my knowledge to-day that O. C. Heck delivered 500 tons of barley in June at $2 cwt., f. o. b. cars which was joint account with me and I ask for the proper settlement of this lot or delivery of my half of the barley f. o. b. cars whichever is most convenient to you. You will note by letter from your people to me dated April 24 that you confirm 50,000 sacks of one lot and 500 tons in another lot for joint shipment at $2.00 f. o. b. cars."

In reply to this letter, under date of February 2, 1920, A. G. Chatom wrote, in part:

> "How well you knew you had no interest in the Heck 500 tons of barley sold by me to the U. S. Trading Corporation. That matter was fully thrashed out to your satisfaction last spring on your visit to Corcoran, and it was agreed in the presence of three witnesses beside ourselves the Norcross contract of necessity with you was not binding on us, and that was exactly my object in sending for you so as to have a clear understanding. You admitted yourself that Norcross was not responsible for his actions and you, your own self, instructed me to wire my connections to disregard all transactions made by Norcross. * * * Norcross had no writing on the Heck contract, but I signed up Heck myself and advanced him ten thousand dollars out of my personal account. But still I delivered you the Peterson barley and made you, as you call it, a ten thousand dollar Christmas present. * * * We never have continued doing business because the opportunity was never such that we needed to split our profits with any one, as I am plenty able to finance any small business like the Corcoran Mill & Warehouse."

The above comprehends a fair conspectus of the testimony which the defendants claim (and justly so) affords sufficient support to the findings. There was, as might well be expected, contradictory evidence. The plaintiff himself testified that the understanding was that he should have a joint interest in the transaction involving the purchase and sale of the Heck barley. He stated that before writing his letter to the defendants, dated January 29, 1920, he had had telephonic conversations with A. G. Chatom, in which he insisted upon his interest in said transaction; but this testimony was flatly contradicted both by A. G. Chatom and his son Thomas H. Chatom. Each testified positively that at no time over the telephone or otherwise did the plaintiff ever make any suggestion to him that he (plaintiff) claimed an interest in the Heck transaction after the conference between A. G. Chatom and the plaintiff the early part of May, 1919. Of course, it was entirely with the trial court, as the trior of the facts, to weigh the evidence and determine its probative effect. It was within its discretion to conclude that the statement made by the plaintiff to A. G. Chattom at the time of the conference above referred to, that he (plaintiff) could be "counted out" of the Heck transaction, meant that plaintiff himself understood that he was not to be considered as jointly interested in said transaction, and that such was the understanding between the parties. The fact that the plaintiff, after the conference mentioned, remained perfectly silent as to the Heck barley for a period of some eight or nine months, and the further fact that after that transaction he presented an account to the Corcoran Mill & Warehouse of the dealings then between them made no reference to the Heck barley, are circumstances tending strongly to support the conclusion of the trial court upon the proposition that the plaintiff did not consider himself and was not interested in the purchase of the Heck barley. Counsel for the plaintiff, however, besides maintaining that there is no evidence to support the findings, make the further point that the ground upon which the defendants seek to defeat recovery herein involves a question of waiver—that is, that the plaintiff waived his interest in the Heck transaction, and that, since relying upon that defense, it was incumbent upon the defendants to plead and prove such waiver, that no such allegation and proof having been made, the defense was not sustained.

We do not think there is a question of waiver involved in the case. It is merely a question of whether the parties made any agreement as to the Heck barley. As shown above, there is evidence to the effect that the relations between the plaintiff and the defendants were not founded upon a contract covering all the grain transactions of the defendants, but that the latter, whenever they found it more convenient to do so, or, as A. G. Chatom stated it, when they were unable themselves to handle a deal alone, they would enter into an agreement with the plaintiff whereby he was made an equal participant in the profits of the particular transaction. It was not a general partnership between the defendants and the plaintiff, but a mere joint adventure in those particular transactions as to which they did make such agreements.

MACKECHNIE BREAD CO. v. HUBER et al.

(Civ. 4025.)

Injunction 🔑56—Will lie to restrain bakery wagon driver from soliciting old customers for new company.

A bakery company, furnishing an automobile and guaranteeing certain returns to one who sells their products, and aiding him in building up their business in a particular district, acquires a property right in the list of customers procured in the district, which can be protected by injunction restraining the driver from soliciting orders for another company from dealers who have been purchasers through him of the first company.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Suit for injunction by the Mackechnie Bread Company against Gus Huber and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. F. Keogh and C. C. Mishler, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. R. Young, of Los Angeles (C. B. Penn, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

WORKS, J. For several years before the present action was instituted defendant Huber had been engaged in the sale of commodities in a certain district in the city of Los Angeles. He first sold milk in the territory, and he next engaged in the sale of bread therein for a baking company other than either of the corporation parties to this action. He then entered the employment of plaintiff for the purpose of selling its bread in the same district. His compensation for this service was arranged upon a percentage of sales made by him, although he was guaranteed a compensation of $18 a week. For the first few weeks his percentage compensation did not equal the guaranteed amount, and the guaranty was made good by plaintiff. Plaintiff furnished Huber an automobile by means of which to solicit business and make deliveries in the district, and it also provided him with samples of its bread for distribution among prospective customers. Huber's work in the territory was also aided from time to time by other solicitors and by demonstrators, all employed by plaintiff. In a given week, at about the time of Huber's employment by plaintiff, its sales in the district amounted to $83.64. During Huber's incumbency of his position with plaintiff, the sales steadily increased until the amount of weekly sales reached more than $500. They were maintained at this figure for several months, and until Huber left the employment of plaintiff.

Soon after his relationship with plaintiff was terminated, Huber entered the employment of defendant California French Baking Company in a similar capacity; his operations being conducted in the defined district which he had covered under his employment with the plaintiff. He immediately began to solicit the business of his old customers in the territory, on behalf of defendant corporation. Plaintiff's sales in the district at once fell off tremendously, so much so that during the second week of Huber's new employment the total amount of sales made by plaintiff therein was but $145.87. Plaintiff soon thereafter instituted this suit for an injunction. Judgment went in favor of defendant corporation, but Huber was enjoined from soliciting orders for bread in the district. The injunction was limited in its operation, however, to anticipated activities of Huber among those dealers who had become purchasers from plaintiff during his employment with it. Defendant Huber appeals.

It is contended by appellant that the findings, from which the above statement of facts is produced, do not support the conclusions of law and that the judgment is against law. One legal question only is presented by this contention: Did respondent possess such a property right in the list of customers procured in the district covered by appellant during his employment by it that the right could be protected by an injunction such as was issued against appellant? This question was before the Supreme Court in Empire Steam Laundry v. Lozier, 165 Cal. 95, 130 Pac. 1180, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 628, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1159; the effect of the court's opinion being syllabized by the official reporter thus:

> "An employee of a laundryman, whose duties were to drive a laundry wagon along a designated route in a city, to serve well the customers of his employer, to increase his business, to solicit new business, and keep a complete and confidential list of all the customers on the route, is engaged in an agency of trust and confidence, and such list, even though in part prepared by him, is the absolute, and a valuable part of the property of the employer."

Appellant attempts to distinguish the case cited from the present one. He says in his brief that in Empire Steam Laundry v. Lozier:

> "The information put to use was of a kind which concerned the habits, tastes, and niceties of men and women as to the cleanliness and tidiness of linens and apparel of a more or less intimate and private use and character. Such information was difficult to gather; it was to be searched out in a painstaking way from house to house; and when customers were obtained they were held ordinarily, not by the personal influence of drivers of wagons and solicitors, but by a satisfying personal service rendered by the laundry to its patrons."

Appellant then attempts from the facts in the present case to paint a different picture of his situation. We are convinced that no difference exists. The decision of the court in Empire Steam Laundry v. Lozier was very largely based upon the opinions in two New York cases—one dealing with the rights of a grocery company as against the activities of one of its former canvassing agents; the other with a controversy between a dealer in teas, coffees, and spices and one of its solicitors. Moreover, the Supreme Court has directly applied the doctrine of Empire Steam Laundry v. Lozier to a case exactly like the present. It is said in the opinion in the case we have in mind:

> "When consideration is paid to the undisputed facts that plaintiffs were actively engaged in increasing their own business; that they advertised to this end; that they made over the list of their customers to defendant, increasing the list as new patrons applied; that defendant was really employed as a sales agent on commission, and that it was to his interest, as well as to his principals' interest, to develop the business in every legitimate way; that his wagon was a Cornish's Bakery wagon; that he advertised and used only the products of the Cornish's Bakery—it makes the case too plain for the need of further discussion. The facts fit most aptly and appositely with those of Empire Steam Laundry v. Lozier, 165 Cal. 95." Cornish v. Dickey, 172 Cal. 120, 155 Pac. 629.

The facts here, in their general effect, fit as aptly and appositely with those of both the cases cited. See, also, New Method Laundry Co. v. MacCann, 174 Cal. 26, 161 Pac. 990, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 1022.

Judgment affirmed.

BURD v. DOWNING. (Civ. 3904.)

1. Judgment ⚷252(1)—Courts will grant either legal or equitable relief warranted by the facts and allow amendment of prayer.

Where the facts alleged in the complaint authorize either legal or equitable relief, the courts will administer the appropriate relief and will even allow amendments to be made to the prayer to justify the judgment; a plaintiff being sent out of court only when, upon his facts, he is not entitled to any relief either at law or in equity.

2. Judgment ⚷252(1)—Complaint and prayer held to authorize cancellation of mortgage.

A complaint alleging that defendant's intestate had executed a mortgage to secure the payment of the last month's rent to become due under a lease, that the lease was canceled and the lessee released from all obligations thereunder, and that all rent due had been paid, with a prayer for recovery of damages and for an order directing defendant to execute a release of the mortgage, was sufficient to authorize a judgment requiring the execution of the release of the mortgage.

3. Appeal and error ⚷1170(3)—Failure to state separately legal and equitable causes does not require reversal.

If it were necessary separately to state equitable and legal causes of action, defendant is not prejudiced by failure to do so where he was fully advised of the facts upon which plaintiff relied, so that there could have been no miscarriage of justice within Const. art. 6, § 4½.

4. Landlord and tenant ⚷184(1)—Releasing of lessee held sufficient to require cancellation of mortgage for last month's rent.

Where a lessee had given a mortgage to secure the payment of the last month's rent due under the lease, a release subsequently given him by the lessor after he had surrendered possession of the premises and delivered to the lessor the furniture therein, which released the lessee from all obligations of every kind and nature under the lease, and declared it to be canceled by mutual consent of the parties, entitled the lessee to have canceled the chattel mortgage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by Mattie E. Burd, administratrix of the estate of James Burd, deceased, against J. O. Downing, to compel release of a chattel mortgage and for damages. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Harry K. Smith and J. O. Downing, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. M. Rex, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. The judgment in this action was in favor of the plaintiff, and defendant has appealed.

The plaintiff, after showing her appointment as administratrix of the estate of James Burd, deceased, alleged that on the 21st day of January, 1914, the said Burd entered into a lease with the defendant covering certain real property in the city of Long Beach known as the Kensington Apartments; that at the same time the said James Burd and Mattie E. Burd executed to the defendant a mortgage for the sum of $325 to secure the payment of the last month's rent to become due under said lease; that on the 3d day of April, 1914, an agreement in writing was made between the said James Burd and defendant, whereby the said lease was canceled and the lessee released from all obligations thereunder; that the rent due had been paid, "including the last month of the term of said lease." It was further alleged that demand had been made by plaintiff administratrix upon defendant that he release the mortgage, which demand had been refused. By reason of such refusal it was alleged that the estate of James Burd had suffered damage in the sum of $500 and that said estate was entitled to collect a penalty of $100 in addition thereto. The prayer was for recovery of damages in the amounts stated and concluded with the following demand:

> "That an order may be made directing the defendant to execute a release of said mortgage, and for such other and further relief as the court may deem equitable."

There was a demurrer to the complaint, which assigned various grounds in addition to the general ground that a cause of action was not stated. Among the special grounds was that which assigned a misjoinder of causes of action in that "a cause of action sounding in damages and a cause of action in equity" had been misjoined, and that they had not been separately stated. The court made findings determining that all the allegations contained in plaintiff's complaint were true, and further specially found that the lease was canceled on the 3d of April, 1914, and that the debt for which the mortgage was given as security had not become due at that time. Notwithstanding the general findings determining all of the allegations of plaintiff's complaint to be true, the judgment allowed no damages to be recovered; but it was adjudged that the mortgage referred to had been satisfied and discharged.

[1-3] Appellant contends first that the action as framed was one solely for damages and that the judgment of the court, being of an equitable character, is not sustained by the cause of action pleaded. It is a settled rule of practice in this state that where the facts alleged in a complaint authorize either equitable or legal relief, the courts will administer the appropriate kind and will even allow amendments to be made to the prayer to justify the judgment. "Legal and equitable relief are administered in the same forum, and according to the same general plan. A party cannot be sent out of court, merely because his facts do not entitle him to relief at law, or merely because he is not entitled to relief in equity, as the case may be. He can be sent out of court only when, upon his facts, he is entitled to no relief, either at law or in equity." Grain v. Aldrich, 38 Cal. 514, 99 Am. Dec. 423. "An action does not now, as formerly, fail because the plaintiff has made a mistake as to the form of his remedy. If the case which he states entitles him to any remedy, either legal or equitable, his complaint is not to be dismissed because he has prayed for a judgment to which he is not entitled." Walsh v. McKeen, 75 Cal. 519, 17 Pac. 673. See, also, Angus v. Craven, 132 Cal. 691, 64 Pac. 1091. The complaint contained a statement of facts sufficient to support the judgment of the court. The prayer of the complaint was also sufficient to authorize the relief awarded. If it were to be conceded (and we do not mean to so hold) that the equitable and legal causes of action should have been separately stated, the answer to the contention of error in that behalf is that no prejudice has been suffered by the defendant, for he was fully advised of the facts upon which plaintiff relied. Under the provisions of section 4½ of article 6, there could not have been a miscarriage of justice.

[4] The judgment is amply supported upon the evidence. It was shown that the lease made by the plaintiff's intestate was executed on the 21st of January, 1914, and covered a term of three years; it provided that the rental should be at the rate of $275 per month payable in advance for the first year, and $325 per month in advance for each of the two succeeding years. It further appeared that the mortgage referred to was executed to secure payment of the rental for the last month of the term; that on the 3d day of April, 1914, a little over two months after the making of the lease, the parties mutually agreed to a rescission of lease, and defendant was restored to possession of the property. As part consideration for the release, defendant received the furniture in the apartment house subject to a chattel mortgage of about $1,100. The value of the equity, according to some of the testimony, was several thousand dollars in excess of that sum. The release was made in writing; it referred to the lease and referred to the mortgage made to secure the last month's rent and proceeded then with these statements:

> "Whereas said party of the second part is desirous of withdrawing from said lease and being relieved from all obligations thereunder: Now, therefore, said party of the first part does hereby release said party of the second part from any and all obligations of whatsoever kind and nature under said lease, and does hereby agree that said lease be and the same is hereby set aside, canceled and annulled by mutual consent of the parties thereto and hereto."

Under the express terms of the written release, the defendant as lessor abandoned and relinquished all demands and claims which would have arisen in his favor had the lessee continued to hold the property. Necessarily he relinquished the right to enforce any further demands for the payment of rental. The mortgage was given to secure payment of the rental for the last month of the term, and hence when the release was executed the mortgage debt was discharged. Upon the face of the writing deliberately made by the parties, this conclusion is inescapable.

WRIGHT v. PHILLIPS et al. (Civ. 4080.)

1. Receivers ⟹210—Can sue in foreign state only as a matter of comity.

A receiver has no authority to exercise his powers beyond the jurisdiction of the court appointing him, so that he may be permitted to sue in a foreign state as a matter of comity only.

2. Receivers ⟹210—Foreign receiver will be permitted to sue within state if domestic creditors are not thereby prejudiced.

The privilege of comity will be extended to a foreign receiver to permit him to sue within the state wherever the rights of local or domestic creditors are not prejudiced thereby.

3. Fraudulent conveyances ⟹255(4)—Husband to whom property was fraudulently conveyed is necessary party to suit to subject it to wife's debt.

Even though a husband is not a proper party to an action upon a judgment debt of his wife, he is a necessary party where the complaint alleges that the wife had voluntarily transferred her property to him in fraud of her creditors, and sought to have the conveyance set aside.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by E. E. Wright, receiver of the Washington Motor Sales Company, Incorporated, against Sarah A. Phillips and her husband. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with direction to overrule the demurrers to the complaint.

Thomas C. Ridgway, of Los Angeles, and Ward, Ward & Ward, of San Diego, for appellant.

Sweet, Stearns & Forward, of San Diego, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Separate demurrers of the defendants, interposed to the complaint of the plaintiff, were sustained, and the court refused leave to plaintiff to amend. The judgment of dismissal followed, from which plaintiff has taken his appeal.

Plaintiff alleged that on the 26th day of November, 1915, the Washington Motor Sales Company, a corporation, was by a judgment of the superior court of the state of Washington declared to be insolvent, and that an order was made appointing plaintiff as receiver, and that he duly qualified and has ever since been acting as such. The averment next appears that the receiver duly obtained leave to bring this action from the court appointing him. It was alleged that the defendants were husband and wife; that on or about the 3d day of April, 1918, defendant Sarah A. Phillips was indebted to the corporation mentioned on account of a stock subscription in the sum of $5,000; that on the 3d of April, 1918, plaintiff commenced an action in the superior court of the county of San Diego, state of California, against the said Sarah A. Phillips (who was at that time Sarah A. Donovan), which action was based upon the stock subscription contract, and that on the 29th of March, 1919, a judgment was in said case made, given, and entered in favor of the plaintiff and against said defendant. It was then alleged that on or about the 4th of June, 1918, after the suit last mentioned had been commenced, and "while defendant Sarah A. Donovan knew of the pendency of said action, and after she had been served with summons in said action," she by deed "attempted to convey" certain described real property to her husband, W. Sinclair Phillips. It was alleged that said conveyance was made without consideration and with intent to prevent plaintiff from levying upon the real property to satisfy the judgment which would be entered in the suit before mentioned, and that by the transferring of said property said Sarah A. Phillips became insolvent, and that she has not since possessed any property which would not be exempt from execution. By the prayer plaintiff requested a decree setting aside the conveyance aforesaid described.

[1, 2] The main ground of the demurrers was that the plaintiff lacked the capacity to sue in this state as receiver, and we must infer that the trial judge reached a conclusion favorable to the defendants on that issue of law. The proposition that a receiver appointed by a court of a particular state can have no authority to exercise his powers beyond the limits of the jurisdiction of the court appointing him appears plainly enough from the bare statement of the question. Receivers appointed under a jurisdiction other than that of the forum may be permitted to sue in a stranger state as a matter of comity only. That this privilege of comity will be extended, wherever the rights of local or domestic creditors are not prejudiced is now the general rule in the United States, notwithstanding that earlier decisions, notably that of Booth v. Clark, 17 How. 322, 15 L. Ed. 164, tended in their holding the other way. See High on Receivers (4th Ed.) § 47; Smith on Receivership (2d Ed.) p. 165; 23 R. C. L. p. 142; 5 Ann. Cas. p. 570. Each state, of course, establishes its own policy on the subject. The policy of this state conforms to the generally recognized rule under which the plaintiff properly claims the privilege of maintaining his action. Iowa & California Land Co. v. Hoag et al., 132 Cal. 627, 64 Pac. 1073. In other California cases, such as Lackmann v. Supreme Council, etc., et al., 142 Cal. 22, 75 Pac. 583, where persons claiming in a representative capacity under appointments made in other states were denied the right to become suitors in the courts of California, it will be found that there were local creditors whose interests were to be first protected. If, at any later stage in the course of this action, it should appear that there are creditors within the state of California whose rights would be prejudiced by allowing the receiver to succeed, the court upon so finding would refuse to award the plaintiff any relief.

Being clear in our minds that the rule of comity recognized by the courts of California requires that the plaintiff be admitted here as a proper party plaintiff, the second contention of appellant need not be given extended consideration. The case of Lewis v. Adams, 70 Cal. 403, 11 Pac. 833, 59 Am. Rep. 423, is cited by the latter to the point that, where a debt owing to an estate is reduced to judgment by an administrator, the judgment may be sued on even in another state by the administrator in his own name, and that any description of his representative capacity appearing in the complaint may be treated as surplusage. Under that authority it would appear that the judgment already obtained in this state as pleaded (which judgment on the allegations made in the complaint is attended by every presumption as to its regularity and validity) could be sued upon by the plaintiff in his own name. However, this is a separate action, not directly on the judgment, although in aid of its satisfaction, and we leave the question open as to whether the authority cited is applicable in such a situation.

[3] It is next argued that as to the husband the action should be dismissed because plaintiff in no event could have a judgment against that defendant's property. The court would not be authorized under the allegations of the complaint to give any judgment against the property of the husband. Being an alleged recipient of property transferred to him by the wife, without consideration, for the alleged fraudulent purposes, he would be a necessary party to the action.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the superior court to overrule the demurrers of the defendants as interposed to plaintiff's complaint.

BRKLJACA v. ROSS et al.

(Civ. 4398, S. F. 10142.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑706(5)—Evidence held to sustain finding automobile driver was not negligent.

Evidence that an automobile driver approached a street intersection on the right side of the street with his lights burning properly and after sounding his horn, and that he had slowed down to a speed of about three miles an hour before passing plaintiff and his companion, who had stopped in the middle of the street, when plaintiff suddenly started across in front of the automobile, held sufficient to sustain the jury's finding that defendant was not negligent.

2. Negligence 🔑117—Plea denying defendant's negligence and alleging plaintiff's negligence was sole cause is sufficient.

A plea denying any negligence on the part of defendant and alleging that plaintiff's negligence was the sole cause of his injury is sufficient, though it is not a plea of contributory negligence by way of confession and avoidance.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑706(8)—Evidence held not to require instruction on last clear chance to avoid striking pedestrian.

Where the evidence was practically undisputed that plaintiff left a safe position and rushed in front of defendant's automobile so close there was no opportunity to stop the car, so that defendant had no clear chance to avoid the collision, it was not error to refuse a requested instruction on the doctrine of last clear chance.

4. Negligence 🔑83—Instruction on last chance must include defendant's knowledge of plaintiff's danger and opportunity to avoid the accident.

Requested instruction embodying the doctrine of last clear chance, which did not require finding that defendant had knowledge of the dangerous position in which the plaintiff had placed himself in time to have prevented the accident by the exercise of reasonable care, omitted elements essential to the application of that doctrine.

5. Municipal corporations 🔑706(4)—Evidence that plaintiff was intoxicated is admissible on issue of care exercised by him.

Though a drunken man is as much entitled to a safe street as a sober one, evidence of plaintiff's intoxication is relevant on the issue as to whether he heedlessly exposed himself to injury from defendant's automobile, so that it was not error to admit evidence of his intoxication or to permit his companion to be impeached by asking whether he had not stated immediately after the accident that he and plaintiff had been drinking.

6. Negligence 🔑88—Instruction on intoxication of plaintiff held correct.

An instruction that, if the jury should find plaintiff was so intoxicated at the time of his injury as to prevent him from using ordinary care for his own protection, and that he did not use such ordinary care and his failure to do so contributed directly to the injury, he could not recover, was correct.

Opinion of Supreme Court Denying Hearing.

7. Appeal and error 🔑843(2)—Plaintiff's negligence in law not considered where defendant found negligent as a fact.

Where the plaintiff's negligence was determined adversely to him by the trial judge and by the jury, who considered both the law and the facts, it is unnecessary to determine on appeal whether he was negligent as a matter of law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by Stanko Brkljaca against J. S. Ross and another to recover damages for personal injuries. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Wessels, of Ukiah, for appellant.

J. A. Pettis, of Ft. Bragg, and Mannon & Mannon, of Ukiah, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in the defendants' favor in an action for damages for personal injuries alleged by the plaintiff to have been sustained by him by being struck by the automobile of the defendant Mendocino Lumber Company while the same was being operated by the defendant Ross, and that the accident occurred through the latter's careless and negligent operation of said automobile. The answers of the defendants, while admitting the accident, deny that same was caused, or that any injuries which the plaintiff may have sustained thereby were occasioned, through any carelessness or negligence on the part of the defendants, or either of them, in the operation of said automobile, or otherwise. They further deny that at the time of said accident the said machine was the property of the Mendocino Lumber Company, but, on the contrary, allege that the same was the property of the defendant Ross, and that the same was at said time being driven and operated by him solely for his own pleasure and not for or upon any business of the defendant corporation. They further allege that while the said defendant Ross was operating said machine in a careful and prudent manner and in accordance with the traffic regulations, both of the state and of the city of Fort Bragg, and was driving the same upon the right of the center of Redwood avenue in said city, and at a speed not in excess of 15 miles an hour, with the lamps and headlights fully lighted and with the horn or warning signal being sounded, the plaintiff while under the influence of intoxicating liquors, attempted to cross the street upon which said defendant was driving said car, and so carelessly and negligently conducted himself in so doing that he staggered and fell in front of the front wheel of the said automobile, and that whatever injuries and damages were sustained by him were occasioned solely and proximately by his own negligence. The cause was tried before a jury and was, at the conclusion of the plaintiff's case, dismissed as to the defendant Mendocino Lumber Company. Upon the submission of the cause the verdict of the jury was in favor of the defendant Ross. The judgment followed the verdict. A motion for a new trial was denied, whereupon plaintiff took and prosecutes this appeal.

The appellant in the body of his briefs in support of his appeal discusses learnedly, exhaustively, and with much citation of authority the respective rights and duties of pedestrians and of drivers of vehicles upon the public streets. With the law relative to this subject neither the respondent herein nor this court has in the main any quarrel. The difficulty is not with the law but with its application to the facts of the instant case. As to certain important features of the case the evidence is somewhat conflicting, but from a careful examination of the entire record we are satisfied that there is ample and substantial evidence sustaining the following summary of the facts of the case:

On the evening of November 23, 1919, the plaintiff, accompanied by a companion named Borcick, approached Redwood avenue, in the city of Fort Bragg, intending to cross the same toward the northeast corner of Redwood avenue and Franklin street. They were walking and the plaintiff was pushing a little cart or wagon and their course would take them diagonally across Redwood avenue in a northwesterly direction. When about to cross said avenue they observed an automobile approaching along it from the west and waited at the curb for said automobile to pass. They then proceeded on their way over and across Redwood avenue. While they were so doing, the defendant Ross, who was the owner of a seven-passenger Chandler touring car, fully equipped with foot clutch, foot brake, emergency hand brake, electric Klaxon horn, and headlights, all in good working order, drove his car, containing besides himself four other passengers, from McPherson street into Redwood avenue at a point approximately 200 feet easterly from the course which the plaintiff and his companion were pursuing in crossing said avenue. The street was otherwise unoccupied and unobstructed, and as the defendant's machine turned into said avenue the plaintiff and his companion came within the range of the lights of the car and were seen by the driver and the other occupants of the car in the act of crossing said avenue. The car, with its lights thus turned on, were equally visible to the plaintiff and his companion had they looked in that direction. The defendant Ross sounded his horn as he came on down the avenue and diminished his speed as he approached the course which the plaintiff was taking until, as he neared the line of the plaintiff's progress, he was proceeding at a speed not to exceed 3 miles an hour. He sounded his horn several times as he approached and up to the time he was within a few feet of the place plaintiff and his companion were walking toward the center of said avenue and apparently up to that time paying no attention to the approaching car with its lights and sounding horn. When the car was within 20 or 25 feet of where plaintiff and his companion were, the latter stopped his further progress and was in a place of safety. But the plaintiff went ahead and then turned back and then, and when too late for an impact to be avoided, went ahead again immediately in front of the car and was struck before the driver could stop the machine or avoid the impact. The occupants of the car all testified that the car was almost at a standstill when it struck the plaintiff and that it came to a stop immediately thereafter. The undisputed evidence shows that the defendant's car was at all times proceeding along said avenue on the right-hand of the center thereof and well over toward the curb, and that the impact with the plaintiff occurred when he was at a point in his progress across said avenue several feet past the center line thereof. The plaintiff, from the impact, sustained the injuries of which he complains. From the foregoing state of the facts it may not be questioned that as a matter of law it was the duty of the plaintiff as he was attempting to cross Redwood avenue, and particularly as he approached and passed the center line thereof, to have looked to the right and in the direction along the avenue from which danger could be expected from vehicles traveling westerly thereon. Sheldon v. James, 175 Cal. 474, 166 Pac. 8, 2 A. L. R. 1493; Moss v. Boynton Co., 44 Cal. App. 474, 186 Pac. 631. Had the plaintiff thus looked, as he was in duty bound to do, he must have seen the lights of the defendant's approaching car and been aware of its approach. He cannot, therefore, be heard to excuse himself for proceeding across the center line of the said avenue and into the space about to be rightfully traversed by said approaching car, upon the plea that he was not aware of its approach. His act in so doing was therefore, upon the undisputed facts of the case, negligence as a matter of law. Moss v. Boynton Co., supra.

[2] The appellant makes a number of contentions not involving the matter of conflicting evidence and which should be disposed of. He contends that the defendant has interposed no adequate plea of contributory negligence. In the sense that contributory negligence is a plea of confession and avoidance, this contention may be taken to be true, since the defendant nowhere admits any negligence on his own part to which the plaintiff's negligence contributed in causing the collision. The defendant, however, does affirmatively plead that the collision was solely and proximately caused by the plaintiff's negligence and without any fault on the defendant's part. This was a sufficient plea to put in issue the plaintiff's negligence as the sole cause of the accident from which his injuries arose.

[3, 4] The appellant further contends that he was entitled to an instruction upon the doctrine of "last clear chance," which the trial court refused, upon his request, to give. We are satisfied, however, that there was no moment of time to which the doctrine of last clear chance could have been given application in the instant case. Until the plaintiff left the place of safety where his companion was standing, he was obviously in no danger of being struck by the defendant's car. Nor was the defendant under any duty to stop the progress of his car while the plaintiff was in such place of safety. The practically undisputed evidence shows that between the moment when the plaintiff left that safe position to rush in front of the car and the moment of impact there was not sufficient time to stop the car. Under such conditions there was no clear chance open to the defendant to avoid the collision and hence no instant of opportunity to which the doctrine of the last clear chance could apply. The court was not requested to give an instruction upon a subject not embraced within the facts of the case. Furthermore, an examination of the instructions requested by plaintiff, as embodying the doctrine of last clear chance, omit the essential elements necessary to the application of this doctrine; such, for example, as the element that the defendant must have had knowledge of the dangerous position in which the plaintiff by his own negligence had placed himself, in time to have prevented the impact by the exercise of reasonable care. Cady v. Sanford (Cal. App.) 207 Pac. 45; Young v. S. P. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 210 Pac. 259.

[5, 6] The appellant further contends that the trial court was in error in permitting a certain physician, who was a witness for the defendant, to testify that the plaintiff, when seen by said witness immediately after the accident was in a state of intoxication. There is no merit in this contention, for while it is true that "a drunken man is as much entitled to a safe street as a sober one and more in need of it," it is also true that evidence of the plaintiff's physical and mental condition as to sobriety or intoxication would be relevant to the issue as to whether he had heedlessly and witlessly exposed himself to injury at the immediate moment of the accident. The ruling of the trial court was therefore correct in admitting this evidence. It was also correct in overruling the plaintiff's objection to the impeaching question asked of plaintiff's companion Borcick as to whether he had not stated, immediately after the accident, that he and the plaintiff had been drinking. A similar conclusion must be arrived at as to the instruction of the trial court to the effect that if the jury should find that plaintiff was so intoxicated at the time of his injury as to prevent him from using ordinary care for his own protection, and that he did not use such ordinary care, and that his failure so to do contributed directly to his injury, he would not be entitled to recover. This instruction, taken with the other very full instructions of the court, correctly states the law. 29 Cyc. 642.

We do not find that any of the other points urged by the appellant require separate consideration.

The judgment is affirmed.

I concur: TYLER, P. J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [7] In denying a hearing we wish to state that under the facts as detailed in the opinion the question of whether or not the plaintiff was negligent was a question determined adversely to him by the trial judge and by the jury, who considered both the law and the facts. It is therefore unnecessary for the opinion to be predicated upon the proposition that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence as a matter of law. The jury having found him guilty of negligence as a matter of fact he was not entitled to recover.

MITCHELL v. NORTH PAC. S. S. CO.

1. Evidence 🔑417(16)—Parol evidence that goods were packed according to direction of carrier's agent held admissible.

In a shipper's action against a carrier for damages to a shipment of postal cards claimed by defendant to have been improperly packed, evidence that prior to the shipment plaintiff consulted defendant's agent as to the method of packing, and the agent told him that the goods were properly packed except a small portion thereof, which was packed by defendant at plaintiff's expense, and that a rope sling would not be used to place the goods on the steamer, held properly admitted; the bill of lading being silent as to what constituted proper packing.

2. Carriers 🔑111—Liability of carrier for damages due to improper packing of goods shipped stated.

In view of Civ. Code, § 2175, forbidding a carrier to exempt itself from liability for damage by gross negligence, fraud, or willful wrong, if goods are improperly packed, and this fact is not apparent or known to the carrier, it is not liable for loss or injury due to such improper packing if it is itself free from negligence, but, if the carrier is guilty of negligence but for which the damage would not have occurred, it is liable, even though the improper packing was not apparent.

3. Carriers 🔑111—When carrier liable for damage to goods improperly packed stated.

If goods presented for carriage are not properly packed, and that fact is apparent to the carrier or his servants upon ordinary observation, the carrier may refuse to receive them in that condition, but, if it does accept them, it must handle the shipment with reference to such defective condition, and is liable for loss or injury thereto if negligent in respect thereof.

4. Carriers 🔑134—Finding as to damage to shipment of postal cards sustained.

In an action by a shipper against a carrier for damages to a shipment of postal cards alleged by defendant to have been improperly packed, evidence held to sustain a finding as to the extent of damage to the shipment.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Edward H. Mitchell against the North Pacific Steamship Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. W. Glensor and Glensor, Clewe & Van Dine, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. R. Pringle, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Defendant appeals from the judgment in the sum of $1,437.65 recovered by plaintiff against defendant in an action for damages to postal cards. Plaintiff is a publisher and dealer in postal cards. Defendant is a common carrier of goods and merchandise by water, owning and operating certain steamboats as such between the ports of San Francisco and San Pedro, Los Angeles county. On or about March 25, 1916, plaintiff delivered to defendant at San Pedro 3,907,850 postal cards for transportation to San Francisco, where they arrived in a damaged condition. The cards were packed for shipment in new double cardboard boxes. About 20 per cent. of these were inclosed in wooden cases. The balance were tied together with small rope, five boxes in a bundle. In all there were 60 wooden cases and 715 bundles. It was to the cards in the bundles that the damage occurred. Upon arrival of the shipment in San Francisco there was a large stack, between two and three feet high in the center, and about six or eight feet in diameter, consisting of loose cards, torn and dirty, with occasional packages of 100 as they had originally been packed, together with pieces of boxes and a large amount of dirt. Around the outer edge of this stack were the bundles of packages which still remained tied together in the manner originally prepared. The court found that the damage was occasioned by defendant carelessly and improperly conducting the loading and stowing of the post cards on the steamer. Supporting this finding there was evidence that the bundles were hoisted aboard the vessel upside down with a rope sling; that this sling broke the boxes on the outside edge of the sling and crushed them in such a manner that the top of the boxes would not cover the entire lower part, thus permitting the cards to fall out of the boxes, and through the mesh of the sling upon the wharf; that the witness watched 8 or 10 slingloads go aboard, and that the same thing happened in each instance; that an employee of the company picked the cards up which fell on the wharf and put them in a grain sack; that the steamship company had a specially prepared sling which, if used, would not have crushed the boxes. The bill of lading contained certain provisions purporting to release the carrier from liability if goods were improperly packed, to wit:

> "Carrier shall not be or be held liable for leakage or wastage of contents of any package nor for breakage of or damage to contents of any package unless shipper first show that such package was of proper strength and in good condition and that such contents were properly packed therein and in good order when delivered to carrier and that the package was, while in possession of carrier, so crushed or broken as to cause such loss or damage; and in no event be liable for loss of or damage to any such contents not specified herein, nor for loss from package or damage to property shipped in tierces, crates, sacks, bundles, bales, * * * unless it be first proven by shipper that such loss or damage was caused by or resulted from carrier's neglect or fault or failure in proper loading, stowage, custody, care or proper delivery of said packages. * * * All property packed in secondhand or weak cases, etc., shall at all times be at owner's risk; and neither fault nor failure nor improper loading nor bad stowage nor improper custody nor want of due care nor improper delivery of or by carrier shall be presumed, but same must if alleged be proven by shipper. * * * Carrier shall never be liable for any loss of or damage to said packages nor for any damage or loss suffered in connection therewith unless its negligence or willful default be shown to have been the sole cause of the same."

Other than this, there were no specifications as to what constituted proper packing. The defense was that the goods were improperly packed and that defendant was released from liability under the terms of the bill of lading. It bears a notation that the bundles and cases were poorly tied and contents part loose. The court found, in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, that said post cards were packed as directed by defendant, and were in good order and condition, and well packed, when received by defendant, except that a small number of said post cards upon delivery to defendant were not securely packed, but all said post cards not so securely packed upon delivery to defendant were by defendant, at plaintiff's cost and expense, well and securely packed, and were so packed before the loading thereof upon said steamer.

The trial court admitted evidence of conversations between plaintiff and defendant's agent occurring prior to delivery of the goods to defendant or issuance of bill of lading relating to the manner of packing these cards for shipment. This evidence shows that prior to shipment plaintiff consulted with defendant's agent in Los Angeles as to the method of packing, and that the cards were packed in bundles, and not inclosed in wooden cases, as above indicated, at the latter's suggestion and upon his assurance that the company could take them that way; also that he agreed not to use a rope sling, which, however, defendant did use, but promised to use a board sling, which he stated would not loosen the packages. As to this plaintiff testified:

> "He (defendant's agent) said: 'We don't use that (the rope sling) for packages that I have advised you to make. * * * We have another kind of sling with heavy boards on the bottom and ropes on the sides; * * * the transport would be the one to load these packages on that; that would drop them inside without loosening them;' and I said, 'Are you absolutely sure you can take these that way?' and he said 'Yes;' and I said, 'Very well, if you can do that.'"

Appellant urges:

That the admission of this evidence constituted reversible error, on the ground that it was an attempt to vary the terms of a written instrument by parol evidence. That "the written contract provides that the carrier shall not be held liable for leakages, wastage, or damage, unless shipper first show that such package was of proper strength and in good condition. That the evidence does not show that the packages were of proper strength, and that it was error for the court to reject defendant's offer to prove that the packages were not of proper strength or in good condition." That the evidence does not sustain certain findings, in particular that there is no evidence whatever to show to what extent the goods were damaged while in the possession of this carrier.

[1] The evidence objected to was properly admitted. The bill of lading was silent on the question of what constituted proper packing, and, under the well-established rule in such cases, parol evidence to this point was admissible. It was then competent to show that the goods were packed in accordance with the directions of appellant's agent. This operated as an estoppel and precluded appellant from introducing evidence for the purpose of showing that, nevertheless, such method of packing was improper. There is no merit in appellant's argument that it told respondent it would accept the goods packed in the manner detailed because by the terms of the bill of lading the goods were to be at shipper's, and not at carrier's, risk if not properly packed, and that such statements were not made for the purpose of indicating to respondent a proper method of packing them.

[2, 3] A carrier in this state cannot by any agreement made in anticipation thereof exempt itself from liability for damage occasioned by the gross negligence, fraud, or willful wrong of itself or its servants. Civ. Code, § 2175. If goods are improperly packed, and this fact is not apparent or known to the carrier, it is not liable for loss or injury due to such improper packing, if it is itself free from negligence. Conversely, if the carrier is guilty of negligence but for which the damage would not have occurred, the carrier is liable even though the improper packing is not apparent. If the goods presented for carriage are not properly packed, and that fact is apparent to the carrier or his servants upon ordinary observation, the carrier may refuse to receive them in that condition; but if it does accept them it must handle the shipment with reference to such defective condition and is liable for loss or injury thereto if negligent in respect thereof. Northwestern Marble & Tile Co. v. Williams, 128 Minn. 514, 151 N. W. 419, 420, L. R. A. 1915D, 1077, 1079; Ill. Central R. Co. v. Rogers & Thomas, 162 Ky. 535, 172 S. W. 948, 949, L. R. A. 1915C, 1220, 1225, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 1201, and cases cited; Duncan v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 17 N. D. 610, 118 N. W. 826, 828, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 952, 959; Union Express Co. v. Graham, 26 Ohio St. 595, 598; Atlantic Coast Line R. R. Co. v. Rice, 169 Ala. 265, 52 South. 918, 920, 29 L. R. . (N. S.) 1214, 1217, 1218, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 389.

Here appellant's negligence in loading the goods and the resulting damage were affirmatively shown. In addition, it was shown that the goods were packed as directed by appellant. The finding of the trial court as to this fact was amply supported by the evidence. The goods were carried in motor trucks from respondent's place of business in Los Angeles to San Pedro, and delivered to appellant at the steamer by the Pioneer Truck Company. It is urged by appellant that the evidence shows the cards were delivered to the truck company, an independent carrier acting as agent for the shipper, in good condition, but that it shows they were not delivered by it to appellant in good condition; that there was no evidence as to the extent of the damage to the shipment before its delivery to appellant; and that therefore, the finding as to the extent of the damage done by appellant is not supported by any evidence. But there was no evidence that the cards were damaged when delivered to appellant. The evidence relied upon by appellant is the notation on the bill of lading, "Bundles and cases poorly tied and contents part loose"; also the testimony of a witness that he saw part of the consignment on the wharf at San Predro near the steamer the next day; that there were some loose boxes lying around the dock which were not tied with rope or string at all; and that there were some cards lying on the dock loose around the boxes. But this same witness further testified:

> That, so far as he could observe, with a few exceptions, the cardboard boxes which he saw on the wharf were in the same condition as when placed on the trucks in Los Angeles; that they "were all tied the same as when they left Van Ornum's (where the trucks were loaded in Los Angeles) with the exception of one or two bundles which were lying loose. * * * There were some cards lying on the docks loose around the boxes. The cardboard boxes containing the post cards were not injured so far as I could see. I don't know how the post cards came to get out of the cardboard boxes onto the wharf. They were not more than a hundred or so lying loose. None of the covers were misplaced on any of the cardboard boxes. There were several cardboard boxes on the wharf which were not bound about with a cord or a rope."

The court found, as heretofore stated:

> "That a small number of said post cards upon delivery to defendant were not securely packed but all said post cards not so securely packed upon delivery as aforesaid to defendant were by defendant, at plaintiff's cost and expense, well and securely packed, and were so packed before loading thereof upon said steamer."

[4] The evidence is sufficient to support the finding of the trial court upon the issue as to the extent of the damage by appellant. As to the condition in which they were packed, the rule above stated applies here. If the goods were obviously poorly packed when delivered to it, appellant might have refused to accept them, but, having undertaken to carry them, it was not excused from liability for damage due to its negligence.

For the reasons stated the judgment is affirmed.

Wm. B. Himrod and S. A. McNeil, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. [1, 2] Plaintiff recovered judgment for personal injuries received by her while crossing Figueroa street at Eighteenth street in Los Angeles by reason of a collision with defendant's automobile. The defendant appeals, claiming that the evidence is insufficient to show that he was negligent, and that the evidence affirmatively established the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. Appellant's theory is that the plaintiff suddenly ran in front of his automobile while he was proceeding north on Figueroa at a speed of between 8 and 10 miles per hour, and that the plaintiff, crossing Figueroa street at Eighteenth from west to east, started through the line of traffic going south on Figueroa and ran in front of his machine before he had the opportunity to either observe her or stop his machine. There was evidence to support this view, but in considering the appeal we must take the evidence most favorable to the plaintiff. According to her testimony, the accident occurred about 5:30 p. m. December 10, 1920, when it was comparatively dark, and the headlights of the automobiles were lighted. She passed rapidly and successfully through the stream of traffic on the west side of Figueroa, proceeding south, which she states was an almost continuous procession, reached the center of the street where she stopped midway between the north and south bound tracks of the electric railway on Figueroa street, paused a few moments, and then stepped forward to a position between the rails of the north bound track. There, looking southward, she saw approaching her two automobiles with headlights lighted near the east curb of Figueroa street proceeding northward; that she was not in the line of their travel; that while she remained standing at this point she was struck by the defendant's automobile, which had apparently swerved over toward her from the position in which she first saw it. It is apparent from this statement that she was guilty of no contributory negligence, but that she was making the best of her way across the street through the very heavy traffic on the street at that time.

[3, 4] With reference to the appellant's contention that the evidence fails to show negligence on his part, it is sufficient to say that there was evidence from which the jury might have inferred negligence. On the plaintiff's testimony the jury was justified in inferring that defendant had suddenly swerved to the left, thus bringing the plaintiff in the line of his advance. Defendant testified that the glare of headlights from the automobiles going south affected his vision, and that he did not see the plaintiff until the moment of the impact. Under the evidence adduced, the question of whether or not either of the parties to the action was negligent was clearly a question for the jury, and we are bound by their verdict.

MYLES v. RUSSELL et al. (L. A. 7421.)

1. Evidence 🔑598(1)—Testimony of one witness entitled to credit sufficient to prove any fact in civil case.

The testimony of one witness, who is entitled to credit, is sufficient for proof of any fact in a civil case, even though that testimony be uncorroborated and be contradicted by the testimony of any number of other witnesses.

2. Master and servant 🔑80(9)—Finding on issue of amount of services sustained.

In an action by a motion picture director for services, a finding that plaintiff had furnished 14 complete written stories, instead of 6, as alleged by defendants, held sustained by evidence of plaintiff corroborated and not substantially contradicted.

3. Master and servant 🔑80(9)—Finding on issue of embezzlement sustained.

A finding against the defendants upon the issue that plaintiff had habitually embezzled defendants' money coming into his hands in the course of his employment so as to bar recovery of wages held sustained by the evidence.

4. Costs 🔑260(4)—When damages for frivolous appeal will be awarded stated.

Where an appeal is wholly devoid of merit and is made for delay only, and by its means defendants have succeeded in depriving plaintiff of the fruits of his judgment for nine months, and have subjected him to the additional expense of defending his judgment, damages as for a frivolous appeal will be awarded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by Norbert Myles against William D. Russell and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. E. Stivers, D. S. McCann, and Wm. B. Ogden, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Stephen Monteleone, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MYERS, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment for plaintiff in an action to recover a balance due upon an account for services rendered by him as a motion picture director, and for moneys expended by him in that connection for the benefit of defendants. One item of plaintiff's account, as found and allowed by the court, was the sum of $2,800 on account of 14 written stories and continuities at the agreed price of $200 each. Defendants contended that 6 only of the 14 stories had been delivered. The court found:

> "That plaintiff prepared, furnished, and delivered to defendants during said period of employment 14 complete written stories and written continuities to accompany the same, instead of 6 written stories, as alleged in defendants' answer."

This finding is claimed by appellants to be wholly unsupported by the evidence. Plaintiff testified that he had prepared the 14 stories, had typewritten an original and 2 carbon copies of each, had used each of the 14 originals in the direction and production of a picture therefrom for the defendants, and had left the 2 carbon copies of each at the studio of the defendants.

[1, 2] It is, of course, elementary that the testimony of one witness, who is entitled to credit, is sufficient for the proof of any fact in a civil case, even though that testimony be uncorroborated and be contradicted by the testimony of any number of other witnesses. It may be noted, however, that in this case plaintiff's testimony on this point was corroborated and was not substantially contradicted.

[3] Defendants alleged, by way of an affirmative defense, that the plaintiff was guilty of dishonesty in the discharge of his duties, amounting to unfaithful service, in that he had in the course of his employment misappropriated and converted to his own use divers sums of money belonging to the defendants, and that because thereof he was barred from recovering herein. Appellants' counsel claim that in support thereof it was shown upon the trial that the plaintiff had in one instance presented to the defendants a voucher for $25 on account of money expended by him, which he had not in fact expended. They do not print in their brief any evidence in support of this claim, nor do they refer to any place in the typewritten transcript where such evidence may be found. They also claim that plaintiff testified at the trial that he had expended $20 in one instance, wherein he had in fact expended only $1. Upon the basis of these two claimed instances of misconduct they assert that he is barred from any recovery herein, and cite a line of cases holding that where a servant has been habitually embezzling his master's money which came into his hands in the course of his employment, he is thereby barred from recovering any balance of the wages which may be due him. It is obvious that such a rule would not be applicable to the facts herein, even if they were as claimed by appellants. Appellants' contention, when analyzed, is in effect this: That because the plaintiff in suing to recover a balance of account running into thousands of dollars, claims two items aggregating $44, to which he is not justly entitled, the court should fine him more than $3,300, and make a gift of that sum to the defendants. If such were the law, this would indeed be a dreary world for creditors. It is, however, sufficient to say that the trial court found against the defendants upon this issue, and that its finding is amply supported by the evidence.

[4] This appeal is wholly devoid of merit, and it appears to us that it was made for delay. By means of the appeal the defendants have succeeded in depriving the plaintiff of the fruits of his just judgment for a period of nine months, and have subjected him to the additional expense of defending his judgment. This court is not disposed to encourage such conduct.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment appealed from be and it is hereby affirmed, and that there shall be added to the costs herein the sum of $250 as damages for this frivolous appeal.

PERKY v. PERKY. (S. F. 10356.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑965—Venue 🔑52(1)—Change of, for convenience of witnesses within court's discretion.

Allowing change of venue for convenience of witnesses is within court's discretion, and an order denying change can only be reversed for a manifest abuse of discretion.

2. Venue 🔑52(1)—Court may consider whole question, rather than any single issue in ruling on application for change of venue.

Where defendant, being sued for divorce, has secured a change of venue and set up a defense by desertion by plaintiff to defeat plaintiff's charge of cruelty, the court, in passing on plaintiff's effort to have the venue changed back for the convenience of witnesses, is not bound to consider primarily the convenience of the witnesses who were to testify to plaintiff's claim, it being but one of the issues, but can consider the whole case.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action for divorce by Emma L. Perky against William J. Perky. Defendant obtained a change of venue, and from an order denying a change back plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Perry F. Backus, of Los Angeles, and Everts, Ewing & Wild, of Fresno, for appellant.

B. W. Gearhart and Strother P. Walton, both of Fresno, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. [1, 2] This is an appeal from an order denying a change of venue. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant for divorce in Los Angeles county. The defendant resided in Fresno county, and secured a transfer of the case to that county. Plaintiff sought to have the case retransferred on the ground of the convenience of witnesses. It is conceded by her that her application, based upon the convenience of witnesses, was addressed to the sound discretion of the court and the order denying the change of venue can only be reversed for an abuse of such discretion. Plaintiff's application was opposed by affidavits on behalf of the defendant to the effect that the witnesses by which he expected to prove his allegations of desertion contained in his cross-complaint resided in Fresno. The plaintiff is of the opinion that, as her charge of extreme cruelty, if proved, would be a defense to the defendant's charge of desertion, the order of the court upon her application should have been based primarily upon the convenience of the witnesses who were to testify upon the subject of cruelty. It is a sufficient answer to this proposition to say that the court was not confined in its determination of the question of a transfer to any one of the issues, but had a right to consider the whole question. It is conceded that we are not justified in reversing the order unless there has been a manifest abuse of discretion. We find no such abuse.

RITZMAN v. RITZMAN. (L. A. 7427.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 28, 1923.)

1. Partition 🔑56—Law that defendant must set out interest in property held mandatory.

Code Civ. Proc. § 758, providing that a defendant in an action in partition of real property must set forth his estate or interest in the property, held mandatory.

2. Appeal and error 🔑151(2)—Defendant, disclaiming interest in land in action below, cannot complain on appeal of adjudicated interest.

Where defendant, in an action in partition, disclaimed any interest in the land sought partitioned, he cannot complain on appeal of the interest adjudicated in him, as aggrieved party.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by Sylvia E. Ritzman against J. W. Ritzman. From an interlocutory decree in partition, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. L. Brown, of El Centro, for appellant.

H. E. Gleason, of Madera, and C. A. Stice, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MYERS, J. Defendant appeals from an interlocutory decree in partition, which adjudges that the plaintiff and defendant are tenants in common of the real property involved, and that the plaintiff is the owner of an undivided $^{55}/_{100}$ thereof, and the defendant the owner of an undivided $^{45}/_{100}$ thereof. The grounds alleged by defendant in support of his appeal have been variously stated, but, when analyzed, they all resolve themselves into the single contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the trial court to the effect that the plaintiff is the owner of an undivided $^{55}/_{100}$ interest in the property. Respondent in her answering brief discusses all of the contentions presented by appellant, and, in addition thereto, makes the point that appellant is not entitled to the consideration by this court of any of his contentions, for the reason that he is not a party aggrieved by the judgment appealed from. Section 758 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides, among other things, that a defendant in an action for partition of real property "must set forth his estate or interest in the property."

[1] A consideration of the legislative history of this section, from its enactment as section 270 of the Practice Act to and including the amendment of 1907, together with the Code Commissioner's note in connection therewith, leads to the conclusion that this Code requirement was intended by the Legislature to be mandatory. This conclusion is supported by the decision in Miller v. Sharp, 48 Cal. 394, so holding, in effect, with respect to the corresponding provision in section 753, Code of Civil Procedure, which provided:

> "The interests of all persons in the property, whether such persons are known or unknown, must be set forth in the complaint, as far as known to the plaintiff."

The court there said:

> "The statute concerning partition (section 759) provides that the rights of the several parties, plaintiff as well as defendants, may be put in issue, tried and determined, but it does not provide that rights such as these may be tried or determined without being put in issue."

[2] The plaintiff in her complaint herein alleged that she and the defendant were owners, as tenants in common, of the described land, and that she was the owner of an undivided $^{4}/_{7}$ interest therein, and the defendant owner of an undivided $^{3}/_{7}$ interest therein. The defendant, in his amended answer, not only failed to set forth his estate or interest in the property, but affirmatively alleged, in effect, that he had no estate or interest therein. That this was not due to oversight or inadvertence appears from the circumstance that by his original answer he claimed ownership in himself of the whole interest in the land in question, a claim which he expressly repudiated by his amended answer. We are thus confronted with the situation of an appellant who in the court below expressly disclaimed any interest in the land, and now complains to this court because he was awarded only a $^{45}/_{100}$ interest therein. The decree appealed from relates to the property only, and awards no personal judgment or relief of any kind as against the defendant personally. Under these circumstances we are unable to conceive of any process of reasoning by which the defendant can justly claim to have been aggrieved thereby.

We find no authority in this state expressly in point upon this situation, but in Flannigan v. Towle, 8 Cal. App. 229, 96 Pac. 507, a suit to quiet title, wherein several tax deeds were under attack by plaintiffs, and plaintiffs admitted at the trial that they could show no title to the land described in any of these deeds except one, it was held that they were not aggrieved parties so far as the judgment related to the other tracts. See, also, Mono County Irr. Co. v. State, 32 Cal. App. 184, 167 Pac. 199; 2 Cal. Juris. 212, 217, §§ 54 to 57; Estate of Piper, 147 Cal. 606, 82 Pac. 246; Blythe v. Ayres, 102 Cal. 254, 36 Pac. 522; Myers v. Mahoney, 43 Neb. 208, 61 N. W. 580; Palmer v. Merrill, 70 Iowa, 227, 30 N. W. 494; Hinton v. Winsor, 2 Wyo. 206, 3 C. J. 628.

Appellant has suggested no answer to the point thus raised by respondent, and, finding none ourselves, we are constrained to the conclusion that it is well taken.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Death ⚷18(1)—Action maintainable for pecuniary loss.

The only damages recoverable by heirs under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, are compensatory damages for pecuniary loss to them by reason of the death of the ancestor.

2. Death ⚷18(3)—Action maintainable by widow deserted by deceased.

The legal liability of a husband for the support of his wife may be the basis of assessing damages for his death, although he has deserted her, and although she knows nothing of his whereabouts.

3. Evidence ⚷364—Mortality tables admissible to ascertain expectancy of life.

Mortality tables are admissible for the purpose of ascertaining the decedent's expectancy of life, in an action for death by wrongful act.

4. Death ⚷99(4)—$3,600 damages to widow held not excessive.

$3,600 general damages to widow living apart from her husband who was 48 years of age, able-bodied, and with a life expectancy of 20 years, held not excessive.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by Annie Powers and another against the Sutherland Auto Stage Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. Thomas and B. P. Gibbs, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Joseph Scott and A. G. Ritter, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LENNON, J. This is an action for the pecuniary loss suffered by reason of the death of Frank Powers, brought by Annie Powers, his surviving widow, and Marguerite Powers, his daughter, against the defendant automobile stage company. The death of Frank Powers was caused by the overturning of an auto stage bus owned and operated by the defendant company, which accident it is undisputed was due to the negligence of the defendant. At the trial it was conceded by counsel for plaintiff that the daughter, although joined in the action upon the assumption that she was a proper party under section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure, was not entitled to any portion of the damages awarded, for the reason that she was over the age of majority at the time of the death of the deceased and was not entitled to support from him.

The case was tried by the court, sitting without a jury, and an award was made of $3,600 as general damages and $330 for funeral expenses and other expenses incurred as the result of the death of the deceased. The item of $330 allowed for funeral expenses is not disputed, and the appeal is from the judgment for $3,600 as general damages. The sole question involved is whether or not the damages awarded by the trial court were excessive.

It is an admitted fact that the deceased and his wife had been living separate and apart, although not legally separated or divorced, for over 13 years, and that during that time she had received no support from her husband, with the exception of several small checks for $5 or $10 which he had sent to her at infrequent intervals, previous to 1915. Since that time she had heard nothing from him nor knew of his whereabouts. During the three or four years just prior to his death he had been living in illicit relations with and supporting another woman. From these facts it is argued that the widow had suffered no damages by reason of his death. And the argument is made that any damages at all allowed to a widow for the death of her husband from whom she had been receiving no support would be excessive. This position is, we think, untenable.

[1, 2] It is well settled in California that the only damages recoverable by heirs under section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure are compensatory damages "for the pecuniary loss to them by reason of his death." Estate of Riccomi, 185 Cal. 458, 461, 197 Pac. 97, 14 A. L. R. 509. The pecuniary loss suffered by the wife in the instant case is the loss by the death of her husband of her legally enforceable right of support. Despite the fact that the husband had left his wife, had for a long time past contributed nothing to her support, and perhaps may have intended never to return to her, yet so long as the marriage relation existed she was entitled to support from him, in the absence of any evidence that she had forfeited the right by her own wrong. This was a right which she could at any time during his life have legally enforced. It was a right created by the marriage relation, and would exist so long as the marriage relation itself existed. By the negligent act of the defendant, the relation was terminated, and the plaintiff was deprived of the right to support to which she was legally entitled. The defendant having negligently caused the death of her husband cannot deprive her of damages by the plea that her husband had not been fulfilling the duties he owed to her.

The recent case of Shebley v. Peters, 200 Pac. 364, which was an action in damages for the death of a husband and father, while not directly in point, tends to sustain this conclusion. In that case this court, in denying a hearing after judgment in the District Court of Appeal, held that evidence that the widow and children of decedent were dependent upon him for support was inadmissible for the reason that—

> "their loss is the same, regardless of their dependence upon him for support. * * * Such support is the right of every wife and minor child to receive from the husband and father, even if they are not dependent upon him at all, but have ample means of their own. * * * They are entitled to support from him in any event, even if they do not get it."

This same conclusion, viz. that the legal liability of a husband for the support of his wife may be the basis of assessing damages against one who has negligently caused his death, although he has deserted her and although she knows nothing of his whereabouts, has been reached practically without exception in every other state where this point has been presented. Ingersoll v. Detroit & Mackinac Railway Co., 163 Mich. 268, 128 N. W. 227, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 362; Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Murray (Tex. Civ. App.) 99 S. W. 144; Dunbar v. Charleston & W. C. Ry. Co. (C. C.) 186 Fed. 175; Taylor v. San Antonio Gas & Electric Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 93 S. W. 674; De Garcia v. San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 77 S. W. 275; Dallas & W. R. Co. v. Spicker, 61 Tex. 427, 48 Am. Rep. 297; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, 81 Md. 371, 32 Atl. 201; Austin v. Metropolitan St. R. Co., 108 App. Div. 249, 95 N. Y. S. 740. See, also, Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Delaney, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 427, 55 S. W. 538; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Culpepper, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 182, 46 S. W. 922.

The cases of Estate of Riccomi, 185 Cal. 458, 197 Pac. 97, 14 A. L. R. 509, and Burk v. Arcata & Mad River Ry. Co., 125 Cal. 364, 57 Pac. 1065, 73 Am. St. Rep. 52, and kindred cases, cited and relied upon by defendant, were founded upon causes of actions by collateral heirs to whom the deceased owed no duty of support. They have, of course, no application to an action brought by a wife or minor children for whose support deceased was legally liable.

[3, 4] The deceased at the time of his death was an able-bodied man, 48 years of age. Mortality tables were admissible for the purpose of ascertaining his expectancy of life. Dickinson v. S. P. Ry. Co., 172 Cal. 727, 158 Pac. 183. According to those tables the deceased had a life expectancy of over 20 years. The amount of damages awarded the widow was, therefore, only equivalent to a payment of $15 per month to the support of the wife. In view of the fact that the plaintiff and deceased had been living apart, nothing could have been awarded to the plaintiff for the loss of the society, comfort, and protection of the deceased. The amount awarded is solely attributable, therefore, to the loss by the death of the husband of the legally enforceable right of support against him. The amount awarded is not so excessive, in our opinion, as to "shock the moral sense" or to "suggest at first blush passion or prejudice," nor to show a clear abuse of the trial court's discretion when passing upon the motion for a new trial. Lee v. S. P. Co., 101 Cal. 118, 35 Pac. 572.

1. Constitutional law 🔑55—Act providing for declaratory relief not invalid as conferring nonjudicial power on court.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1060–1062, as added by St. 1921, p. 689, providing for declaratory relief, is not unconstitutional as attempting to confer nonjudicial powers upon the court.

2. Lis pendens 🔑2—Act providing for declaratory relief not invalid for failing to provide for lis pendens.

That Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1060–1062, as added by St. 1921, p. 689, providing for declaratory relief, fail to provide for a lis pendens, does not invalidate it, in view of section 409, providing in what cases a lis pendens may be filed.

3. Pleading 🔑225(1)—Complaint in action for declaratory relief under statute held not so insufficient as to warrant sustaining demurrer without leave to amend.

In an action under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1060–1062, as added by St. 1921, p. 689, providing for declaratory relief, a complaint alleging that plaintiff entered defendants' employment to conduct certain patent litigation for a one-third contingent fee, that he recovered judgment, and an accounting under such judgment was pending before a master in chancery, and that the original agreement for fees had been superseded by a contract to perform the services for a much smaller sum, which had been tendered and refused, held not so insufficient as to justify the trial court in sustaining a demurrer for uncertainty, ambiguity, and unintelligibility, without leave to amend.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Raymond Ives Blakeslee against Elihu C. Wilson and another. Judgment for defendants on demurrer, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Louis J. Euler, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

F. A. Stephenson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WASTE, J. The plaintiff brought this action for a declaration of his rights under certain contracts of employment entered into with the defendants. A general and special demurrer to the complaint was interposed, and was sustained without leave to amend. Judgment was thereupon entered dismissing the action and for defendants' costs. Hence this appeal, which squarely presents for our consideration the constitutionality of sections 1060, 1061, and 1062 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing for declaratory relief in this state. Stats. 1921, c. 463, p. 689. Incidental to the main question—whether or not such an action may be maintained in this jurisdiction—is an examination into the sufficiency of the complaint to determine if it states facts amounting to "a case of actual controversy relating to the legal rights and duties of the respective parties"; for only in such an event may the action be maintained. It is provided in section 1060, supra, that—

> "Any person interested under a deed, will or other written instrument, or under a contract, or who desires a declaration of his rights or duties with respect to another, or in respect to, in, over or upon property, or with respect to the location of the natural channel of a water course, may, in cases of actual controversy relating to the legal rights and duties of the respective parties, bring an action in the superior court for a declaration of his rights and duties in the premises, including a determination of any question of construction or validity arising under such instrument or contract. He may ask for a declaration of rights or duties, either alone or with other relief; and the court may make a binding declaration of such rights or duties, whether or not further relief is or could be claimed at the time. The declaration may be either affirmative or negative in form and effect, and such declaration shall have the force of a final judgment. Such declaration may be had before there has been any breach of the obligation in respect to which said declaration is sought."

The succeeding sections provide that the court may refuse to exercise the power thus granted in any case where its declaration or determination is not necessary or proper at the time, under all the circumstances, and that the remedies so provided are cumulative and shall not be construed as restricting any remedy provided by law. With the provisions of the law in mind, it will be easier to understand the theory of the complaint and the facts on which plaintiff relies for a declaration of his rights and duties in the premises.

It is alleged that plaintiff is an attorney at law. He entered into an agreement in writing with the defendants, by which he was employed to represent defendants in the prosecution of certain patent litigation pending in the United States courts, which actions appear to have been consolidated. He was successful in the prosecution of said causes, and secured for the defendants findings and a decree upholding their rights, and "that the defendants were entitled to an injunction and accounting and for the profits made by their opponents in said cause of action and for their costs." The injunction was issued and, according to the allegations of the complaint, the accounting is now being had before the master in chancery appointed by the federal court, and has not yet been completed. Plaintiff alleges the defendants were to receive as profits and damages for the infringement upon their patent rights approximately $1,000,000. As compensation for his services in prosecuting and conducting the litigation for defendants, plaintiff, so he avers, was to receive certain nominal fees and "a one-third (⅓) contingent interest in any and all recoveries, damages, and profits which might be or were made or moneys which might be received by defendants in said cases." Relying upon that agreement, plaintiff performed the service agreed upon, and prosecuted and defended the actions to judgment, as already stated.

It is further alleged that, subsequent to the commencement by plaintiff of the services for defendants, and prior to the final hearings in said causes, plaintiff proposed to the defendants that they purchase outright plaintiff's contingent one-third interest in the consolidated causes. Defendants refused to do this, but submitted a counter proposition depending upon certain conditions, all of which are set out in the complaint. Plaintiff did not accept this arrangement, but secured the decree for the defendants under the prior agreement for a one-third interest.

Coming to that portion of the complaint which purports to make this a "case of actual controversy," plaintiff alleges that the defendants have admitted in writing the agreement to employ him on the basis of a one-third contingent interest in any recoveries made by them, but now contend that one of the stipulations contained in their counter proposition for the employment of the plaintiff, to wit, to pay plaintiff the sum of $3,500 in full for his services, superseded the original agreement, and is the actual contract under which the employment was rendered by plaintiff. On this basis defendants have offered to pay plaintiff in full, but plaintiff has refused to settle upon those terms, and no part of the recoveries, profits, and proceeds accruing to the defendants under the patent litigation has been paid or received by him.

The sections supra providing for declaratory relief were added to the Code of Civil Procedure by the Legislature at its session in 1921. This is the first time their consideration and construction has engaged the attention of this court.

It is first strongly urged by the respondents that the sections of the Code referred to impose nonjudicial duties upon the courts, thereby rendering the act unconstitutional. It is further contended that a mere declaration of a right and duty, and the determination of any question of construction or validity arising under written instruments and contracts, do not have the effect of a judgment, and are but the invoking of the authority of the court in the performance of an idle act where no dispute or controversy exists. The objection is also made that there is nothing in the act giving the declaration of the court the effect of a lis pendens. None of these objections are sound. The subject of what proceedings are considered judicial in this state was so thoroughly considered and determined in a case involving the construction of "an act to provide for the establishment and quieting of title to real property in case of the loss or destruction of public records" (Stats. Ex. Sess. 1906, p. 78) that it were idle to do more than to refer to Title, etc., Restoration Co. v. Kerrigan, 150 Cal. 289, 318, et seq., 88 Pac. 356, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 682, 119 Am. St. Rep. 199.

The contention that judicial power should not be exercised except in settling actual disputes and controversies was also disposed of in a case involving "an act for the certification of land titles and the simplification of the transfers of real estate," commonly known as the "Torrens Law" (Stats. 1897, p. 138). Robinson v. Kerrigan, 151 Cal. 40, 47, 48, 90 Pac. 129, 121 Am. St. Rep. 90, 12 Ann. Cas. 829.

While, as previously stated, the particular statute in question has not before engaged the attention of this court, its subject-matter has been considered by the highest court in two other jurisdictions. The Michigan Legislature passed an act to authorize courts of record to make binding declarations of rights. Act 150 of the Public Acts of 1919. That act appears to be more comprehensive than the California statute, but does not provide that its provisions may be invoked only in cases of actual controversy, as is the case in this state. In a proceeding not based on an actual controversy the Supreme Court of Michigan declared that—

> "While the advocates of this measure insist that the proceedings authorized by the act do not constitute a moot case, and while the proceedings may not square in all particulars with the technical definition of a moot case, they are such in every essential. * * * This act confers power not judicial and requires performance of acts nonjudicial in character."

For these reasons it declared the act void in its entirety. Anway v. Grand Rapids Ry. Co., 211 Mich. 592, 179 N. W. 350, 12 A. L. R. 26. Much that is said by the Michigan court is satisfactorily answered by the decisions in Robinson v. Kerrigan, supra, Title Restoration Co. v. Kerrigan, supra, and Hoffman v. Superior Court, 151 Cal. 386, 393, 90 Pac. 939. It therefore seems unnecessary for us to further consider the decision of that court.

[1] In 1921 the Legislature of the state of Kansas also passed a statute authorizing the rendition of declaratory judgments. Laws 1921, c. 168, § 6. It is almost like our own, and its provisions may be invoked only "in cases of actual controversy." Shortly after its enactment its constitutionality was challenged. The objections that were urged against the validity of the Michigan statute, and which are renewed here, were considered by the Supreme Court of Kansas. The court held that the statute was not unconstitutional on the ground of attempting to confer nonjudicial powers upon the court, and further declared that judgments rendered under its provisions might be classed as judicial acts, although rendered in actions admittedly brought before a right had been invaded, and although no consequential relief be given or sought. State ex rel. Hopkins v. Grove, 109 Kan. 619, 201 Pac. 82, 19 A. L. R. 1116. The decision in this case is so readily accessible that we do not need to repeat the argument of the court or to make extracts therefrom. What is there said is applicable to and determinative of the question presented for our own consideration on this appeal. A very exhaustive and scholarly treatise upon the subject of declaratory judgments, particularly with reference to the California legislation of 1921, providing for such relief, will be found in two articles by Professor Maurice E. Harrison, of Hastings College of Law, appearing in the issues of the "California Law Review" for March, 1920, and July, 1921. Other valuable treatises on the same subject are referred to in the decision of the Kansas court, supra. See, also, Board of Education v. Van Zandt, 119 Misc. Rep. 124, 195 N. Y. Supp. 297–300.

[2] The objection that the act makes no provision for anything in the nature of a lis pendens does not warrant further consideration. The Code of Civil Procedure (section 409) provides in what cases a lis pendens may be filed, and we know of no reason for holding that, because the filing of such an instrument is not required in actions or proceedings brought to obtain declaratory relief, or because the statute does not in terms give to the judgments of a court in such proceedings the effect of a lis pendens, the act is thereby rendered unconstitutional. Respondents advance no sufficient reason in support of the contention.

[3] Coming to a consideration of the last contention of the respondents, that the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer upon the ground of uncertainty, ambiguity, and unintelligibility was warranted by the pleadings, it suffices to say that it very rarely happens upon an initial attempt to state a cause of action that the court is justified in sustaining a demurrer upon those grounds, without leave to amend. Such action is ordinarily altogether too drastic upon a pleader's first attempt to present his cause. Furthermore, in this instance it does not appear to us that the points of the special demurrer are well taken.

The judgment of the lower court is reversed.

1. Newspapers 🔑1(3)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that newspaper one of general circulation.

In a petition to have a newspaper designated by law as a newspaper of general circulation, evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding for petitioner.

2. Newspapers 🔑1(3)—Fact that newspaper devoted to particular class will not exclude it from classification as "newspaper of general circulation," if in addition it also publishes news of general character.

The fact that a newspaper is devoted to the interests of a particular class of persons, as for instance those engaged in the same business or calling, and specializes on news and intelligence primarily of interest to that class, will not exclude it from classification as a "newspaper of general circulation," if in addition to such special news it also publishes news of a general character.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Newspaper of General Circulation.]

In Bank.

Petition by John K. Tibbitts to have the Labor Journal, a newspaper designated as a "newspaper of general circulation," opposed by H. S. Webster, for himself and the Sun Company, a copartnership. From an order granting the petition, the contestant appeals. Affirmed.

John A. Hadaller, of San Bernardino, for petitioner.

Leonard, Surr & Hellyer, of San Bernardino, for contestant.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from an order granting the petition of one John K. Tibbitts that the "Labor Journal," a weekly newspaper published in the city of San Bernardino, be adjudged to be a "newspaper of general circulation" as that term is defined by section 4460 of the Political Code.

Notice of the time and place set for the hearing of such petition having been duly published, H. S. Webster, for himself and for the Sun Company, a copartnership, appeared and filed an answer to said petition in opposition to the granting thereof. In said answer it was alleged that said Labor Journal is not a newspaper of general circulation, for the reason that it is devoted to the interest of a particular class, and therefore comes within the description contained in said section 4460, Political Code, of what is not a newspaper of general circulation, reading as follows:

> "A newspaper devoted to the interests, or published for the entertainment or instruction of a particular class, profession, trade, calling, race, or denomination, or for any number of such classes, professions, trades, callings, races or denominations, when the avowed purpose is to entertain or instruct such classes, is not a newspaper of general circulation."

A hearing having been had, in which evidence was introduced both by the petitioner and the contestant, the court found as facts that ever since the 21st day of November, 1919, and for more than one year prior to the filing of said petition, the Labor Journal has been and now is an established weekly newspaper, printed and published in the city of San Bernardino; that it publishes news of local and general interest and also telegraphic news and intelligence pertaining to affairs throughout the United States; also advertisements of a mercantile and professional nature and of mechanical matters; that it has a bona fide list of more than 1,200 subscribers, over 300 of whom have no affiliation with any labor organization; that said newspaper is on file in many public places for the enlightenment and benefit of the public at large; that the said journal is devoted, not to the interest, nor is it published for the entertainment and instruction, of a particular class, profession, trade, calling, race, or denomination, but that the purpose of the publisher thereof is to have the journal circulate among as many different classes of people as possible.

The contestant appeals from the judgment entered in conformity with these findings, and urges that the essential parts thereof are not supported by the evidence.

A reading of the evidence satisfies us that they are sustained thereby. Briefly, it is as follows: The petitioner, who is the business manager of said newspaper, testified:

> "It (the Labor Journal) is published for all classes. The object of the Labor Journal is to acquaint the people with facts pertaining to general news, local news, and the industrial news, that is, a combination of general news. That is the purpose of it. We do not aim to cater to any particular class or profession or trade or calling."

Another witness testified:

> "I am the editor of the Labor Journal, and have been for approximately two months. During that time we have been publishing news of a local general interest to the people. * * * About 75 per cent. of the news of the Labor Journal in the last two months has been of a local general character. * * * The Labor Journal publishes telegraphic news. * * * I have no instructions from my employers as to how much news I should publish. We ordinarily publish about four columns of telegraphic relay news. That is information of a general character. We print athletic news, society news, club news, and news concerning the municipal affairs of the city of San Bernardino, and also of the county of San Bernardino."

On cross-examination this same witness testified:

> "I would hardly say the chief news we print pertains to organized or union labor. We print some news of the happenings of organized labor, as we consider it news of general interest. It is not a matter of fact that the paper is largely compiled with news that will interest organized labor. I would say that it would interest organized labor but not organized labor alone or only."

Copies of two issues of the paper were admitted in evidence, and a reading of these to some extent confirms the testimony of these witnesses.

[1] While it cannot be denied that a review of all the evidence discloses that the newspaper is devoted primarily to the interest of the labor unions and to the dissemination of union labor news, and that its circulation is principally among members of such unions in the county of San Bernardino, yet it also establishes that it publishes local and telegraphic news of a general character and of interest to the public generally, and that at least one-quarter of its subscribers are persons not affiliated with organized labor.

[2] It is not easy to determine with precision where the line of demarcation should be drawn between a newspaper in the legal and ordinary acceptation of the term and the numerous periodicals devoted to some special purpose, circulating among a particular class, and which are for that reason disqualified from accepting advertisements required by some statutory provision to be published in a newspaper of general circulation. Many publications, such as literary, scientific, religious, medical, or legal, which are obviously aimed to reach a particular and limited class of people, are not newspapers within either the legal or ordinary meaning of the word. But the fact that a newspaper is devoted to the interest of a particular class of persons, as for instance, those engaged in the same business or calling, and specializes on news and intelligence primarily of interest to that class, will not exclude it from classification as a newspaper of general circulation, if, in addition to such special news, it also publishes news of a general character. 20 R. C. L. 201; In re Green, 21 Cal. App. 138, 142, 131 Pac. 91; Lynch v. Judge of Probate Court, 101 Mich. 171, 59 N. W. 409. As is said in the case of Lynn v. Allen, 145 Ind. 584, 44 N. E. 646, 33 L. R. A. 779, 57 Am. St. Rep. 223:

> "As a matter of fact, every newspaper is, in greater or less degree, devoted to some special interest. No one, however, would claim that because a newspaper should, for example, be the organ of a certain political party, and especially devoted to the interests of such party, it would not therefore be a newspaper of general circulation. Yet such a newspaper is, to a large extent, read only by the members of the political party whose doctrines are advocated and expounded in its columns."

There is no substantial merit in the other point urged by the appellant, namely, that the trial court erred in the rejection of certain evidence offered by it. If admissible at all, it was only by reason of the inference it afforded that the Labor Journal was published in the interests of a class only. Such evidence would have been cumulative of what already appeared directly from the copies of the journal which were admitted, but which, nevertheless, the court held to be overcome by the other evidence in the case. No substantial injury, therefore, can be predicated upon the rejection of the testimony in question.

KEESE et al. v. BEARDSLEY et al.

Rehearing Denied March 26, 1923.)

1. Mortgages 🔑109—Evidence held to show mortgage not intended to secure purchases after certain date.

In action to foreclose as a mortgage an absolute deed to secure purchases from plaintiffs, evidence held to show that the deed was not intended to secure purchases after a certain date.

2. Mortgages 🔑178—Agreement enlarging terms of security held subject to rights in prior contract of purchase.

Where absolute deed was intended as a mortgage to secure purchases only until a certain date, subsequent agreements between the parties making the conveyance security for subsequent purchases would not be binding upon purchasers under a contract made and recorded prior to such subsequent agreement.

3. Evidence 🔑230(1)—Declarations of owner of fee not binding on prior purchasers of equitable interest.

Declarations by the owner of the fee as to debts secured by mortgage thereon, while binding upon successors, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1849, would not bind purchasers claiming under an agreement which had theretofore vested the equitable title in them.

4. Trial 🔑404(1)—Finding that an agreement was recorded held implied finding that it was acknowledged.

If acknowledgment was essential to the recordation of an agreement, held that a finding that it was in fact recorded was an implied finding that it was acknowledged.

5. Vendor and purchaser 🔑231(15)—Recordation of contract of sale not notice to persons claiming under vendor unless acknowledged by him.

Under Civ. Code, § 1161, as to acknowledgment as condition precedent to recording, recordation of a contract of sale is not constructive notice thereof to grantees and mortgagees of the vendor, unless acknowledged by him, and acknowledgment by the vendees is insufficient.

6. Vendor and purchaser 🔑231(6)—Contract of sale properly recorded in book of deeds and not in miscellaneous records.

To be notice, a contract of sale is properly recorded in the book of deeds, rather than in the miscellaneous records.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Samuel J. Keese and others against Volney S. Beardsley and others, in which defendants Linnie L. Truth and another cross-complained. From judgment for plaintiffs, cross-complainants appeal. Reversed.

Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg and Alex W. Davis, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Shelton & Levy, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WILBUR, C. J. On May 12, 1915, the defendants Volney S. Beardsley and wife executed a deed to the plaintiff Samuel J. Keese. This deed was given to secure to the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Company, hereinafter referred to as the "Westinghouse Company," the amount of the purchase price of certain electric motors thereafter to be purchased by the Beardsley Electric Company from the Westinghouse Company. Plaintiffs, treating said deed as a mortgage, brought this action to foreclose the mortgage, making Linnie L. Truth and Francis Truth parties defendant by reason of the fact that subsequent to the execution of the deed, in September, 1915, these defendants entered into an agreement with Volney S. Beardsley and wife for the purchase of the land described in the deed. Judgment was rendered foreclosing the mortgage and decreeing that the claims of the defendants Truth were subject to the lien of the mortgage. From this decree the defendants Truth appeal. They will hereafter be referred to as the appellants. The amount claimed by the plaintiffs to be secured by the mortgage is the amount coming to them as damages by reason of the breach of a contract of purchase of 25 electric motors, entered into between the Beardsley Electric Company and the Westinghouse Company on April 10, 1916.

[1] The first question for determination is whether or not the deed was intended to secure the Westinghouse Company for the purchase price of motors after March 30, 1916. The doubt upon this question arises in the first instance because of the fact that, although the deed is dated May 12, 1915, the letter of the grantor Volney S. Beardsley, in which he declares that the purpose of the deed was to secure the Westinghouse Company, stated that the deed was to secure purchases within "one year from date." This letter was dated March 30, 1915. The respondents contend, however, that as the deed was executed and delivered May 12, 1915, it must be assumed that the letter was also delivered on that date, and that the year runs, not from the date of the letter, but from the date of the deed. Inasmuch as there was no direct evidence as to the date of the delivery of the letter, it cannot be assumed that it was delivered at a date later than March 30, 1915, nor could the fact of such delivery at a later date overcome the plain declaration in the letter itself that it was to secure obligations incurred "within one year from date." This, however, does not solve the difficulty, for the reason that there were offered and received in evidence two letters written by plaintiff Keese, grantee in the deed, in which he declares that the purpose of the deed is to secure the Westinghouse Company for purchases made within one year after May 12, 1915. One of these letters is directed to the defendant Beardsley and the other to the Westinghouse Company. The respondents contend that these letters are in effect a declaration of trust, coming as they do from a grantee in the deed, and that they are therefore binding upon all the parties to the transaction. The answer to this proposition is that the deed was not a deed of trust, but was under our statute merely a mortgage, and that the agreement as to the indebtedness which it was to secure was the agreement between the mortgagor and mortgagee. If these letters dated May 12, 1915, had been received by the parties to whom they were addressed and acquiesced in by them, there is no doubt that such acquiescence would have constituted a binding contract. In dealing with a deed absolute given as security, we are not bound by the rule that writings cannot be contradicted by parol, and it is therefore permissible to establish the agreement of the grantor by his acquiescence in a statement made by or on behalf of the persons for whose security the obligation is given. Civ. Code, §§ 2924, 2925. The difficulty in this case is that there is no evidence whatever that the letter to the grantor Beardsley was received by him. The copies of these letters were produced by the plaintiffs from the files of the Westinghouse Company, and therefore it may be properly inferred they were received by the Westinghouse Company, but there is no inference that they were received by the grantor. It follows, then, that the original agreement for security was one securing the Westinghouse Company for purchases made prior to March 30, 1916. The purchases in question were made on April 10, 1916, while the contract of purchase of the land entered into by the appellants was recorded April 3, 1916. The appellants contend that any agreement made between Beardsley and the Westinghouse Company after they had taken possession of the premises in September, 1915, and particularly after the recordation of their contract, April 3, 1916, is not binding upon them.

In view of the fact that the trial court found that, although the appellants had entered into possession of the premises in September, 1915, and had erected a residence and outbuildings thereon valued at about $6,000, they had left the premises, and did not occupy it at the time of the transactions next hereafter to be considered, we will first consider the question of the relative rights of the parties growing out of the recordation of the contract on April 3, 1916. While the respondents attack the sufficiency of such recordation, we will first assume that the recordation was proper, and gave constructive notice of the rights of the appellants.

[2] The first claim advanced by the respondents is that, inasmuch as the obligations secured thereby were secured by a deed purporting to convey the entire fee, the conveyance of the fee was notice of any subsequent right or lien less than a fee. This position cannot be maintained, for the reason that the transaction under our statute was in legal effect a mere mortgage, and that the terms of the mortgage are to be shown by parol. Subsequent purchasers were required to take notice only of the existence of the deed and the rights thereby secured, and, having ascertained the extent of these rights, we have ascertained the question of priority and the extent thereof. It follows that, if under the original agreement between the mortgagor and mortgagee the indebtedness secured was only that accruing before March 30, 1916, subsequent agreements, enlarging the terms of the security, would not be binding against the appellants whose rights were derived prior thereto, and notice of which was given by the recordation of their contract.

Respondents insist that, inasmuch as the agreement was to secure future advances, those advances could be made at any time prior to actual notice of the intervening rights of the appellants. This rule does not apply to a case where the original agreement definitely restricted further advances to those made before a definite date. Any purchases or advancements made after that date were not made under the original contract, but only under the supplemental and subsequent agreement. Respondents' next contention is that the agreement for the additional advance was made on March 29, 1916, and that, therefore, although the contract of purchase or advance was actually made after the expiration of a year, the extension of the security to cover this purchase was made within the year. With reference to this proposition it is sufficient to say that the evidence does not sustain the contention that there was an agreement of extension entered into between the parties before the 30th of March. Beardsley simply stated that he was willing to enter into a renewal of the security to cover the contemplated contract of purchase. He did not then and there agree that the deed theretofore given should be treated as such security. It follows, then, from what has been said that the agreement that the deed of May 12, 1915, should be considered as security for the contract of purchase made April 10, 1915, cannot be sustained unless by reason of other evidence not yet considered.

[3] Respondents advance the proposition that a contract made in September, 1916, by which Beardsley expressly agreed that the deed should be considered as security for the contract of April 10, 1916, and in which it was expressly stated that the deed was originally given to secure indebtedness incurred within one year after May 12, 1915, while not binding upon the appellants' interest in the real property, when considered as a new and independent or supplemental contract, was at least a declaration of Beardsley as to the nature and effect of the original agreement, and therefore was evidence of such agreement admissible against his vendees, the appellants. This declaration, it is true, was made by Beardsley during the period that he still owned the fee in the property, and would therefore be binding upon his successor (section 1849, Code Civ. Proc.), but the appellants, who claim under an agreement which had theretofore vested the equitable title in them, were not bound by such declarations, and they cannot be considered as evidence against appellants in determining their rights, being mere hearsay.

Having thus determined that the appellants were protected by the recordation of their contract against the future agreements entered into by their vendor, and that the arrangements made between that vendor and the respondents were of that character, it is necessary to consider the objections of the respondents to the sufficiency of the recordation of the contract. The first objection made is that the contract of purchase was acknowledged by the vendees, and not by the vendors, and hence was not notice to the plaintiffs of the sale of the premises to the appellants.

[4] It is sufficient in answer to this point to say that it is alleged in the appellants' cross-complaint that the agreement of purchase was "recorded in the office of the county recorder of the county of Los Angeles, state of California, book 6187, page 198." This allegation is not denied in plaintiffs' answer to the appellants' cross-complaint, and the court found the fact to be that—

> "On April 3, 1916, said agreement was recorded in the office of the county recorder of the county of Los Angeles, state of California, in Book 6187 of Deeds, at page 198."

The agreement attached to the cross-complaint as an exhibit has annexed thereto the acknowledgment of the purchaser only, but non constat the agreement was not acknowledged by the seller as well. If the acknowlment of the seller is essential to the recordation of the agreement the finding that it was in fact recorded is an implied finding that it was so acknowledged. This finding being in favor of the appellants is, of course, not attacked by them, and cannot be by the respondents.

[5] Inasmuch, however, as a new trial must be had, it should be said for the benefit of the parties on such retrial that the acknowledgment by the vendees alone was an insufficient acknowledgment to give the successors of the vendor the constructive notice which would otherwise have resulted from its recordation after proper acknowledgment by the vendor. In this regard section 1161 of the Civil Code provides that—

> "Before an instrument can be recorded, * * * its execution must be acknowledged by the person executing it. * * *"

It is true in a sense that when acknowledged by any one of several persons executing it, the conveyance is acknowledged by "the person executing it." On the other hand, it is also true that under our Code (Civ. Code, § 14) the singular includes the plural, and hence section 1161, Civil Code, might be construed as requiring all persons executing an instrument to acknowledge it, but the provisions concerning the recording of instruments must be contrued in the light of their purpose, that is, to give notice to subsequent claimants of the acts of prior owners, alienating or incumbering the title. An acknowledged instrument carries with it the proof of its due execution by the person who so acknowledges it. It is therefore necessary that it be acknowledged by the person whose rights in the property are alienated or incumbered thereby, such as the grantor, or mortgagor, or vendor. It was held in Spect v. Gregg, 51 Cal. 198, that the acknowledgment of a power of attorney by one of four persons jointly executing the same entitled the deed from such attorney executed on behalf of the four joining in the power of attorney to be recorded, and that such record was notice to purchasers from the person who acknowledged the power of attorney. In Fresno Canal, etc., Co. v. Rowell, 80 Cal. 114, 117, 22 Pac. 53, 13 Am. St. Rep. 112, it was held a sufficient record to give constructive notice where the owner of property, who executed an agreement which created a lien on his property to pay water rates, acknowledged the instrument, and it was thereupon recorded, although the other party failed to acknowledge it.

The question is discussed and all the authorities carefully reviewed in the recent case of Bell v. Sage, 212 Pac. 404, by the Third District Court of Appeal, in which case a transfer to this court was denied. This fact renders unnecessary an extensive discussion by us. The case of People ex rel. Oaklawn Corp. v. Donegan, 226 N. Y. 84, 123 N. E. 71, a recent New York decision (March 18, 1919) on mandamus, deals with the duty of a registrar where one of four grantors in a deed failed to acknowledge it in a proper manner. The law of that state with reference to recordation is substantially the same as of this state. Section 1161, Civ. Code. The New York statute provides that—

> "A conveyance of real property within the state, on being duly acknowledged by the person executing the same * * * may be recorded in the office of the clerk of the county where such real property is situated." Real Property Law, § 291.

The Court of Appeals of New York held that it was the duty of the registrar to record the instrument, but not to index it in the name of the grantor, who failed to acknowledge it. In short, that it should be treated for the purpose of recordation as the act only of those persons who acknowledged it. This decision is in accord with our own decision (Fresno Canal, etc., Co. v. Rowell, supra), and leads us to the conclusion that the recordation of the agreement of sale in the case at bar would not be constructive notice of its existence against the grantees or mortgagees of Beardsley, the vendor in the contract, unless acknowledged by him.

[6] It is next contended that the contract should have been recorded in the miscellaneous records and not in the book of deeds. The Supreme Court of Washington in Bernard v. Benson, 58 Wash. 191, 108 Pac. 439, 137 Am. St. Rep. 1051, under statutes similar to ours with reference to recordation, held that a contract for the sale of real estate was included within the meaning of the words used in the statute, "deeds, grants and transfers of real property," and therefore that such conveyance could be properly recorded in the Book of Deeds. In Jackson v. Torrence, 83 Cal. 521, 23 Pac. 695, it was held that an executory contract to convey real estate was a "conveyance" of real estate within the meaning of section 1093 of the Civil Code, and as such required to be acknowledged as a grant. Inasmuch as the effect of the contract was to convey or transfer the equitable title to the land, it clearly comes within the meaning of a "conveyance" or "transfer" as used in the statute with reference to the recordation of such instrument. There is nothing in the cases of Kent v. Williams, 146 Cal. 3, 79 Pac. 527, and Stanislaus Water Co. v. Bachman, 152 Cal. 716, 93 Pac. 858, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 359, inconsistent with this view.

In view of a new trial something should also be said in reference to the effect of possession as notice, in the event that it should appear on the new trial that the record of the contract did not give constructive notice of the rights of the plaintiffs. The cross-complaint alleges that immediately upon the execution of the contract of purchase the appellants entered into the possession of the premises and erected a dwelling house and other improvements thereon, and ever since have been in the open, notorious, and exclusive possession of the real property involved in this action. The plaintiffs denied such possession, and the court in its findings of fact found that on September 27, 1915, the appellants entered into possession of the premises, and built several permanent buildings thereon, and occupied the same until March 1, 1916, and found:

> "That said defendants then ceased to occupy said premises and continued out of such occupancy until subsequent to January 26, 1918."

There is no express finding upon the ultimate fact of which possession is evidence, that is, notice of the claims of the possessor. Fair v. Stevenot, 29 Cal. 486; Hellman v. Levy et al., 55 Cal. 117, 119. If the vendee was temporarily absent from the premises, it was for the trial court to determine whether the possession was of such character as to give notice of the rights of the vendee or put him upon inquiry with reference thereto (Hellman v. Levy, supra) and to determine the ultimate fact of notice (see, also, Randall v. Allen, 180 Cal. 298, 180 Pac. 941; Bessho v. General Petroleum Corpn., 186 Cal. 133, 199 Pac. 22; Gibbons v. Yosemite Lumber Co. [Cal. Sup.] 211 Pac. 4).

We conclude that the original agreement did not secure to the Westinghouse Company the performance of the agreement of April 10, 1916, as found by the trial court, and that the subsequent agreements entered into between Beardsley and the Westinghouse Company by which it was agreed that the deed should be considered security for the performance of the contract of April 10, 1916, were subordinate, under the facts found at the trial, to the rights of the appellants under their contract of purchase entered into September, 1915, and recorded April 3, 1916, before the supplemental agreement between the Westinghouse Company and Beardsley was entered into. The finding to the contrary not being supported by the evidence, the judgment was erroneous.

Judgment reversed.

In re TAGGART'S ESTATE.

BOLAND v. TAGGART et al.

1. Estoppel 🔑95—Failure of person having custody of another's child to inform her that she was not legally adopted held not ground for estoppel in pais.

Where decedent and his wife agreed with the father of an infant daughter to maintain, provide for, and educate such child, and that in case of the death of decedent's wife the father might repossess himself of the child upon reimbursing decedent for expenses, and that in case of the father's death decedent was to legally adopt the child, and decedent and his wife cared for such child until she attained her majority and was married, that decedent had failed to inform her that she had not been legally adopted did not constitute an estoppel in pais in a proceeding by her for a decree distributing decedent's entire property to her, decedent having complied with his agreement, and a legal adoption during petitioner's minority having been impossible without the father's consent.

2. Adoption 🔑1—Unknown to common law.

The adoption of one person by another was unknown to the common law.

3. Adoption 🔑1—Every essential requirement of adoption statute must be complied with.

The right to adopt a child and the right of a person to be adopted as the child of another are wholly statutory, and he who claims that an act of adoption has been accomplished must show that every essential requirement has been complied with.

4. Equity 🔑57—Maxim that what ought to be done will be regarded as done held inapplicable to adoption proceedings.

Where decedent had the custody and care of a minor daughter of a third person, but failed to legally adopt her, and made no provision for her in his will, the equity maxim that that which ought to have been done must be treated as done had no application where a legal adoption would have been impossible without the consent of the father of the minor.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

Petition by Edna Taggart Boland in the matter of the estate of Francis S. Taggart, deceased, to have distributed to her the whole of decedent's estate, contested by Anna Belle Taggart and William H. Taggart, executor. From an order directing distribution adversely to petitioner's claims, she appeals. Affirmed.

James S. Bennett, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Carnahan & Clark, of Los Angeles, and James W. Hyde, of Chicago, Ill., for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. Petitioner, Edna Taggart Boland, sought to have distributed to her by the probate court of Los Angeles county the whole of decedent's estate, inventoried at the sum of $45,426, under the provisions of section 1307 of the Civil Code, claiming said estate as an adopted daughter and only heir at law of Francis S. Taggart, deceased, who unintentionally omitted her in his will. The court decided adversely to petitioner, and its decision is here for review.

The court's findings are that Francis S. Taggart died on the 3d day of December, 1919, leaving a will, which was duly admitted to probate. Anna Belle Taggart, a sister of decedent, was made the sole legatee and devisee under said will. William Herbert Taggart, a brother of decedent, was named sole executor. At the time he executed said will, and thereafter until his death, decedent was a resident of the county of Los Angeles, state of California.

Petitioner, Edna Taggart Boland, was born on the 19th day of March, 1876, the only issue of the marriage of Benjamin F. Jordan and Harriett Loretta Jordan, residents of the state of Illinois. Said Harriett Loretta Jordan died in the state of her residence in 1880. Thereafter, and on the 11th day of July, 1881, said Benjamin F. Jordan and Francis S. Taggart and Minerva Taggart, his wife, joined in the execution of an agreement by the terms of which Benjamin F. Jordan committed to Francis S. Taggart and his wife, Minerva, the legal custody and care of said child, Edna Lucinda Jordan, who was the only child of said Benjamin F. Jordan, and said Taggart and his wife agreed with the father of said minor that they would nurture, maintain, provide for and educate said child according to their ability, means, standing, and position in life. It was further provided that, in the case of the death of said Taggart's wife, the father, Benjamin F. Jordan, should have the right to "retake and repossess to himself" his said child upon reimbursing said Francis S. Taggart for moneys expended by him for all reasonable costs, charges, and expenses incurred in and for the care, custody, maintenance and education of said child, if he should upon the happening of this contingency retake said mentioned child into his custody and charge. It was also further agreed that, in case of the death of Benjamin F. Jordan, that the said Francis S. Taggart and his wife, or the survivor of either, would forthwith proceed according to the laws of the state of Illinois to adopt said child as their own, or, if one should be dead, as the child of the survivor. It is also a part of the findings that said Francis S. Taggart and Minerva Taggart, his wife, expressed a desire to adopt petitioner, and that petitioner, being then of the age of about four years, went to live with said Taggart and his wife, and was given and assumed their name, became a member of the family, was entered in the public schools and Sunday schools of the family church as their daughter, and was supported, maintained, and educated by them as their daughter from the time of the agreement until the death of Minerva Taggart, which occurred on January 2, 1900. After her death the relation between petitioner and Francis S. Taggart continued as it had existed in the past until petitioner's marriage, which was solemnized December 11, 1901, with the sanction of said Francis S. Taggart. It is also related that after said marriage petitioner and her husband made their home for a time with said Taggart, at the latter's request.

It is an admitted fact that said Francis S. Taggart and his wife treated petitioner in all respects as a parent should treat a natural child, and in turn she rendered unto each of them the affection, society, and services attending that relationship. Some time after her reception into the Taggart family, and during the life of Francis S. Taggart and his wife, petitioner was informed by them and believed that she was their legally adopted daughter, and did not know until after the demise of Francis S. Taggart that she had not been legally adopted as their child. Benjamin F. Jordan, the father of petitioner, died in Chicago, state of Illinois, on May 1, 1903, about two years after his daughter's marriage. The court also found that under the laws of the state of Illinois a female person ceased to be a minor and attained her majority upon attaining the age of 18 years, and that neither said Francis S. Taggart nor his wife, nor the said Francis S. Taggart after his wife's death, proceeded to or attempted to adopt petitioner as their child in accordance with the statutory law of said state or of any state. It further found the last will and testament of said decedent, Francis S. Taggart, failed to provide for said petitioner or to name her therein, and that there was not at any of the times mentioned in the petition any statute or law in the state of Illinois providing that a person omitted from the last will of his or her natural or adopted parent was entitled to that portion of such parent's estate which he or she would have inherited had such parent died intestate, and that the laws of Illinois permitted a testator to disinherit a child of the blood or an adopted child by omitting to mention or provide for such child in his last will or testament. By its findings the court decreed that the testator left surviving neither wife nor issue of his blood, nor any adopted child, nor any descendant of such issue or of any adopted child. As a conclusion of law from the foregoing facts the court found that petitioner, Edna Taggart Boland, is not an heir at law of Francis S. Taggart, deceased, and therefore not entitled to any portion of his said estate as an heir at law or as a pretermitted child of said decedent, and thereupon denied her petition. Judgment was entered accordingly.

The contract upon which the action has its inception was made in the state of Illinois, where the parties then resided, and where they continued to reside until about the year 1901, when the principal actors removed to this state.

[1] It is the admission of petitioner that no formal statutory adoption exists in her favor. Her claim seems to be that an estoppel in pais should be invoked in her favor on the untenable theory that petitioner has been misled by the declarations and conduct of the Taggarts, or that some species of fraud has been committed against her by them jointly or separately. No dispute exists as to the facts of the case, and we feel satisfied that the authorities cited by petitioner have no application to the statement of facts as related in the record. No question arises in the instant case of a promise or agreement broken to execute a will in another's favor or in fact a violated promise to adopt a child, or a promise to convey property for the benefit of another upon condition that the promisee would change his or her situation or station in life for the benefit of the promisor, nor are there any facts present in this case such as undoubtedly controlled the decisions in the cases cited of the character of Rogers v. Schlotterback, 167 Cal. 37, 138 Pac. 728, and others involving questions of fraud, mistake, and kindred questions. The rights of the parties in the instant case are defined and limited by the clear terms of a written contract about which no doubt can exist as to the intent of the parties. Undoubtedly it was the wish and hope of Francis S. Taggart and his wife to have fully adopted the petitioner while she was in her minority. The father Benjamin F. Jordan, however, having recently lost his wife by death, was attempting to restore as far as humanly possible the motherly love, care, and protection that every right-feeling man would wish his infant daughter to enjoy or possess. Clearly, it was no mercenary thought as to future financial benefits or inheritable possibilities that moved the father to place the custody of his daughter with the Taggarts, but rather it was his desire that she might enjoy the advantages of a wholesome home life which he was not in a situation to supply. He seems in this respect to have been guided by a high and commendable purpose, and, true to paternal instinct, he was not willing to surrender absolutely all possible control of his only child so long as he should live. He was not willing that another should in a full sense be substituted in his place. By his contract he reserved the right at any time upon the death of Minerva Taggart to resume the care, custody, and control of his child by paying to Francis S. Taggart all reasonable charges and expenses incurred by him in the care and maintenance of said child. This provision shows very clearly that he desired for his daughter, without losing the right to regard her as such, the influence and direction of a woman to take the place of a mother, but at no time did he consent to the adoption of his child while he was in life.

[2, 3] Petitioner has invoked the familiar maxim that equity will treat as done that which ought to have been done; but there is nothing presented by the case at bar upon which the well-known and favored rule may operate. There is nothing of fraud, deceit, or mistake in the case. What is there that should have been done or could have been done that was not done? Surely Francis S. Taggart could not have ruled the fates of men. Only upon the death of Jordan during the period of Edna's minority would it have been legally possible for the Taggarts to have adopted her. The adoption of one person by another was unknown to the common law. The right to adopt a child and the right of a person to be adopted as a child of another are wholly statutory. He who claims that an act of adoption has been accomplished must show that every essential requirement has been complied with. Estate of Sharon, 179 Cal. 447, 177 Pac. 283; Estate of McCombs, 174 Cal. 211, 162 Pac. 897; Ex parte Clark, 87 Cal. 641, 25 Pac. 967; Estate of Johnson, 98 Cal. 531, 33 Pac. 460, 21 L. R. A. 380; In re Stevens, 83 Cal. 331, 23 Pac. 379, 17 Am. St. Rep. 252. The right being entirely a creature of the statute, we must necessarily look to the statute alone for the authority to adopt, and if not expressed it cannot legally exist.

[4] The statute of California provides only for the adoption of a minor child, and no provision is to be found for the adoption of one adult by another. Section 221 et seq. Civ. Code. Neither is there to be found authority in the laws of Illinois permitting the adoption of adults. Bartholow v. Davies, 276 Ill. 505, 114 N. E. 1017. Thus it will be seen that at no time after the execution of the contract giving the custody of petitioner to the Taggarts was it legally possible for Taggart to have adopted petitioner. At the time Minerva Taggart died petitioner had passed the age of 23 years. Petitioner was of the age of 27 years at the time Benjamin F. Jordan, her father, died. Her age at the time of her marriage was 25 years. So it will be seen that there was no time when an adoption was possible. The father at no time gave his consent, and surely it will not be contended that under the terms of the agreement petitioner could have been regarded as an abandoned child under the statute of this state or by the laws of any other state of which we are advised.

The cases relied upon by petitioner, as observed earlier in this opinion, are not in point. Thomas v. Maloney, 142 Mo. App. 193, 126 S. W. 522, presents a question of the enforcement of an oral contract of adoption. Barney v. Hutchinson, 25 N. M. 82, 177 Pac. 890, is an action to enforce a similar promise or agreement. In the latter case the adoptive parent agreed upon receiving the child into his custody to immediately adopt it. This was not done. Rogers v. Schlotterback supra, was an action to specifically enforce an oral contract made by the promisor in favor of the promisee to the effect that the former would make the latter an heir to share in his estate equally with his own issue. Estate of McCombs, supra, reaffirms well-established legal principles governing the law of adoption and inheritance, but offers nothing specially favorable to petitioner's claim. Steinberger v. Young, 175 Cal. 81, 165 Pac. 432, announces the doctrine that a contract to dispose of property upon death in a particular way may under proper conditions be specifically enforced. The legal principles recited in these cases cannot be combated. They have, however, no application to the facts of the present case.

We are unable to understand how petitioner could have been prejudiced by the agreement made by her father with the Taggarts. It has been suggested that she should have been informed by the Taggarts that she was not their adopted child, and it is also stated, as though the fact had some significance, that, had she known she was not the adopted child of the Taggarts, she would have been able to have named her guardian upon arriving at the age of 14 years. Just what advantage may have accrued to her from such knowledge is not made clear. Her father was her natural guardian, and surely no one would have been permitted to adopt her without his consent. It has not been suggested that he was an improper person to have the care, custody, and control of his natural daughter. From aught that appears in the record it must be presumed that he possessed the requisite qualifications. Whether petitioner knew her father and was advised by him is not shown by the record. In this respect we are only told that she had been informed that she was the adopted daughter of the Taggarts, no further reference being made as to her relations with or knowledge of her said father. She was, however, past 27 years of age at the time of his demise.

In a review of the whole situation we are satisfied that Francis S. Taggart discharged every legal and moral obligation that rested upon him and there can be no imputation that he violated any duty or promise made either to the father of petitioner or to petitioner herself. If as a fact he led her to believe that he and his wife were her adopted parents, it was doubtless done that discipline might be more complete and mutual respect and domestic tranquility be better preserved.

Our conclusion being that the petitioner is not the adopted child of Francis S. Taggart and his wife, Minerva, or either, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the question as to whether the testator had petitioner in mind when he omitted to provide for her in his will, and that such omission was intentional.

The decree is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by J. C. Jackson against J. B. Clover. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

William B. Ogden, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Donald Barker and Wm. H. Neblett, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. This was an action on four promissory notes aggregating the sum of $964.60. Three of the notes were made payable to plaintiff, and the fourth note, amounting to the sum of $100, was assigned to plaintiff before the action was commenced. The defendant has interposed three defenses: First, that plaintiff was employed by defendant as superintendent of certain construction work; that he was unfaithful in the discharge of his duties as such superintendent and had made false reports in connection with his said duties, and thereby obtained from defendant the sum of $120; also, that at the time of the execution of the notes sued upon, plaintiff was indebted to defendant in the sum of $800, which he falsely concealed, and by reason of said facts there was no consideration for said notes. Secondly, that while plaintiff was so employed as a superintendent, as an inducement to the execution of the notes sued on, plaintiff had promised and agreed to remain upon the work until a certain date and to care for and to preserve the property of defendant, and upon closing the work for the season was to collect and store the property of defendant at a certain place; that thereafter plaintiff reported to defendant that he had so collected and stored said property, when in fact he had not done so, and thereby obtained from defendant an additional sum of $214.55 to defendant's damage in said sum. Thirdly, that plaintiff on a certain date was possessed of certain property of defendant of the value of $500 which plaintiff converted to his own use to the damage of defendant in the sum of $500.

The court found, first, that all the allegations of the complaint were true, and secondly, that all the allegations of the answer were untrue; and entered judgment for plaintiff as prayed in the complaint.

[1, 2] As is stated in appellant's brief, this appeal is based solely on the proposition that the second finding is not supported by the evidence. Various questions of law, all arising out of the several defenses or counterclaims interposed by defendant, have been presented in the briefs on file herein; but while counsel for respondent has answered each point in turn, he has also urged that where substantial conflict exists in the evidence upon which a given finding is based, the appellate court will not disturb such finding. The rule which counsel invokes is one which is sustained by a host of California and other authorities. It is so well and so generally understood to be the law of this state that it is only where there is no evidence in the record in support of the findings that the decision of the trial court will be reversed upon the ground that it is unsupported by the evidence (Syl., Heinlen v. Heilbron, 97 Cal. 101, 31 Pac. 838), that it would seem to be a waste of labor to set forth the various reasons for the existence of the rule. Suffice it to say that of the credibility of the witnesses the court below was the sole judge. To set aside his finding because this court might have disagreed with him would be to substitute the conclusion of this court for the judgment of the learned judge of the trial court upon purely a question of fact. It was exclusively the province of the judge of the trial court to weigh the testimony of the witnesses, together with the other evidence in the case. Preponderance does not necessarily mean the testimony of the greater number of witnesses. So much depends upon things that are not open to one reviewing the testimony or the evidence generally from a mere inspection of the cold record—for instance, the manner of the witness, his apparent feeling in the case, his hostility, his willingness, evasiveness, the expression on his face or the flash of an eye, his hesitancy in answering questions, or his promptness and apparent frankness and good intentions, even when mistaken or in the wrong, or the opposite of any of these qualities—in other words, his manner or his bearing or his interest or his general appearance as a witness may have as much or even more to do with his credibility as his oral words or his written expressions.

[3] This court cannot consider the evidence offered relating to the several defenses, except for the purpose of ascertaining whether the evidence presented a substantial conflict. An examination of the reporter's transcript on appeal discloses the fact that as to each of the defenses such conflict exists. It therefore follows that the finding that all the allegations of the answer were untrue cannot be disturbed.

WILLIAMS v. WILLIAMS et al. (Civ. 4074.)

1. Judgment 🔑17(1) — Personal judgment cannot be rendered on a constructive service where defendant was present only as a witness.

A personal judgment cannot be rendered against a defendant who was served only by constructive service, and who made no appearance as defendant in the case, though she was present at the trial and testified as a witness.

2. Trusts 🔑103(1)—Recipients of loan of funds withdrawn in breach of confidence are liable to owner therefor.

Where one permitted his fiancée before marriage to withdraw money from his bank account for her own purposes, her withdrawal of such money to loan to a son and daughter-in-law was a breach of trust by her, and the son and daughter-in-law are liable for the amount received under those circumstances.

3. Trusts 🔑81(1) — Voluntary grantees of property subject to resulting trust are liable for amount received by sale.

Where plaintiff had permitted his fiancée to draw money from his bank account, and she withdrew a sum to purchase a tract of land which he had instructed her not to purchase, taking title in her own name, a trust as to such land resulted in his favor, and her son and daughter-in-law, who sold the land after she had conveyed it to them without consideration, must account to plaintiff for the proceeds.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by Edward Williams against Elizabeth Jane Williams and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Judgment modified, and as modified affirmed.

Jarrott & Jarrott, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Fred E. Peterson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. By its judgment the court declared null and void two deeds, the first being a deed whereby the defendant Williams (then Elizabeth Jane Cole) conveyed to the defendant Walter M. Cole lot 114 of the Crestmore tract, in the county of Los Angeles, and the second being a deed whereby the defendant Williams conveyed to the defendants Cole the same property. The judgment further provides that the plaintiff shall thereby have and recover from defendant Williams a stated sum of money, of which amount the sum of $675.28 is declared to be a lien on said lot 114. It is further provided that the plaintiff recover from the defendants Cole the sum of $1,375 and costs, and that, if said sum of $1,375 be paid by either of the defendants, the judgment against defendant Williams is to be reduced and satisfied pro tanto. The defendants appeal from the judgment, and the record consists of the judgment roll.

As appears from the findings, the said sum of $675.28 is not a part of the judgment rendered against defendants Cole. It is made a lien upon lot 114, solely because of certain facts which the court deemed to be in equity sufficient to create a lien therefor upon said lot 114 by reason of the circumstances under which said sum of $675.28 was expended for the benefit of that lot by the defendant Williams out of funds belonging to the plaintiff. The decree attempting to establish said lien and declaring void the said deeds is therefore wholly dependent upon the validity of the personal judgment rendered against the defendant Williams.

[1] The judgment against the defendant Williams is a default judgment based upon constructive service of process against the said defendant. Upon affidavits showing that Mrs. Williams was then residing in the state of Washington, the court made an order for publication of summons against her. Upon proof of publication of the summons and of mailing of copy of the summons and complaint, the default of said defendant was duly entered. She has never made any appearance in the action, although the findings state that she was present at the trial and testified therein. The case was being tried upon the complaint and the answer of the defendants Cole. The facts thus found and shown by the record were not sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to render a personal judgment against said defendant.

The plaintiff and the defendant Williams were married on the 23d day of December, 1918, and ever since have been husband and wife. Prior to their marriage, the plaintiff consented and arranged that the defendant Williams, then Elizabeth Jane Cole, might draw checks upon his bank account. The said sum of $675.28 is made up of sums drawn out by the defendant Williams under the authority thus obtained by her. On October 11, 1917 (which, it will be noted, was prior to the marriage), said defendant withdrew $400 and paid it on account of a mortgage on said lot 114, Crestmore tract, which she then claimed to own. The remainder of said $675.28 the court finds was thereafter withdrawn from plaintiff's separate funds and applied in part to pay taxes on said lot and in part to pay interest on said mortgage. The court finds:

> "That defendant Elizabeth Jane Williams advised plaintiff that by reason of their marriage relations plaintiff had an interest in said lot 114, Crestmore tract, and that the said payments were being made for the benefit of plaintiff and defendant Elizabeth Jane Williams."

But the court finds that it is not true, as alleged in the complaint, that Mrs. Williams proposed or agreed to transfer to plaintiff an undivided one-half interest in said lot. It may well be doubted whether, under these circumstances, the loan thus made by the plaintiff to said defendant, unaccompanied as it was by any mortgage, would have been sufficient to impose a lien on the lot. At all events, the decree attempting to give force to such lien is void for the reasons heretofore stated.

[2] Turning now to the judgment against the defendants Cole, $175 thereof consisted of money withdrawn from said bank account by Mrs. Williams and by her loaned to said defendants Cole. In view of the fact that, on account of his confidence and trust in the defendant Mrs. Williams, she had been given the above-stated authority to withdraw funds from plaintiff's account, the court was justified in finding that it was a breach of trust for her to withdraw such funds and lend them to her son and daughter-in-law. The defendants Cole, having received the money of the plaintiff under these circumstances, are properly held liable to him therefor.

[3] This leaves for consideration only the further award to the plaintiff of judgment against the defendants Cole in the sum of $1,200. As found by the court, the facts are that the plaintiff and the defendant Williams, prior to their marriage, negotiated for the purchase of a certain lot 136 of the Miramonte tract in the county of Los Angeles: that the plaintiff however, instructed the defendant not to purchase said property until further advised by him; nevertheless that the defendant, without the knowledge of the plaintiff, withdrew from the funds of plaintiff in the bank the sum of $400 to pay as first payment on said lot and negotiated to purchase the property, taking the title thereto in her own name. Thereafter defendant Williams, with intent to defraud the plaintiff of his rights in said property, transferred the same to the defendant Hattie M. Cole, who sold the property for the sum of $3,200, being a net profit of $1,200 on the purchase price. The conveyance by defendant Williams to Mrs. Cole was without consideration, and the defendants Cole received the money which she obtained by selling said lot. The money so received was part of the purchase price thereof, less a mortgage of $1,500, which was assumed by the purchaser. The circumstances attending the purchase of this property, according to the facts as found by the court, were such as to create a resulting trust in favor of the plaintiff as against the defendant Williams. The defendants Cole having acquired the title without consideration, it was subject to that trust. Having by these transactions acquired the proceeds of the misapplied funds of the plaintiff, they were chargeable with the sum thus obtained.

The judgment is modified by striking therefrom that part thereof which reads as follows:

> "That the deed from Elizabeth Jane Cole to Walter M. Cole, dated August 3, 1916, for the property described as lot 114 of the Crestmore tract, as per map recorded in Book 7, page 72, of Maps, Records of Los Angeles county, Cal., is, and the same is hereby declared to be, null and void and of no effect; that the deed from Elizabeth Jane Williams to Walter M. Cole and Hattie M. Cole, dated January 23, 1920, for the property described as lot 114, Crestmore tract, as per map recorded in Book 7, page 72, of Maps, Records of Los Angeles county, Cal., is, and the same is hereby declared to be, null and void and of no effect; that the plaintiff do have and recover from the defendant Elizabeth Jane Williams the sum of $2,481.79 and costs, $79.90, herein incurred, or which sum the sum of $675.28 is hereby declared to be and made a lien upon the property described as lot 114 of the Crestmore tract, as per map recorded in Book 7, page 72, of Maps, Records of Los Angeles county, Cal."

The judgment is further modified by striking therefrom that part thereof reading as follows:

> "And, if said sum of $1,375 is paid by or made out of either defendants herein, the judgment against defendant Williams is to be decreased and reduced and satisfied pro tanto."

This leaves in effect all other parts of the judgment, including that part of the last paragraph thereof, reading as follows:

"That the plaintiff do have and recover from the defendants Walter M. Cole and Hattie M. Cole the sum of $1,375 and costs, $79.90, herein incurred."

As thus modified, the judgment is affirmed. Appellants are awarded their costs of this appeal.

The question as to which of two competitive appointees for the office of superintendent of schools is the legally constituted superintendent can be determined only in quo warranto proceedings, and not in mandamus by one of them to compel the judge of the superior court to act upon his bond as superintendent.

2. Schools and school districts 🔑48(2)—Fact that there are two contestants for office held no objection to approval of bond of superintendent.

In proceedings by the judge of the superior court to approve the bond of one appointed as superintendent of schools in the county operating under a special charter conferred by St. 1917, p. 1791, a prima facie showing of title to the office is all that is demanded, and the fact that there are two contestants for the office is no valid objection to the approval of the bond.

3. Schools and school districts 🔑48(2)—Superintendent whose bond was approved held not prejudiced by failure to approve second bond after attempted ratification of appointment.

A superintendent of schools whose bond has been approved is not prejudiced by failure of the judge of the superior court to approve a second bond after an attempted ratification of his prior appointment.

Application by C. H. Nielsen for a writ of mandate directed to H. D. Gregory, Judge of the Superior Court of Butte County. Denied, and proceedings dismissed.

John R. Robinson, of Chico, for petitioner.
W. E. Duncan, Jr., of Oroville, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. An original application was made in this court for a writ of mandate to require respondent to act upon the bond of petitioner, as county superintendent of schools for Butte county, and either approve or disapprove the same. The alternative writ was issued, and upon the return day Irvin Passmore was permitted to become a party to the action, and file an answer and petition, setting up his claim as the legally constituted county superintendent of schools of said county and praying that respondent be directed to approve or disapprove the bond which had been tendered to him by said Passmore as such superintendent. The whole difficulty arises from the question as to the authority of the board of trustees which made the appointment of superintendent of schools. The county of Butte is operating under a special charter ratified at a general election held November 7, 1916, and approved by the Legislature on January 27, 1917 (Stats. of 1917, p. 1791). In article 7, §§ 1, 2, and 3, of said charter, are found all the provisions in reference to the appointment of a superintendent of schools as follows:

"Section 1. There is hereby created a board of county school trustees, which shall consist of one member from each supervisorial district of the county, to be elected at the same time, for the same term and in the same manner as the members of the board of supervisors, except as hereinafter provided, to serve without compensation, but the members thereof shall receive actual and necessary expenses while attending to the duties of their office, including board and lodging.

"Sec. 2. Said board shall meet in the office of the county superintendent of schools on the first Monday after the first day in December succeeding their election, and as often thereafter as may be necessary, on the written call of the chairman of said board or of a majority of the members thereof. The first election of county school trustees shall be held at the general election in November, 1918, and the members of the board elected at that time shall take office on the first Monday after the first day of December, 1918, to serve for two years and thereafter said trustees shall be elected for the same term and be classified as to time of election in the same manner as the member of the board of supervisors from the supervisorial district in which they are elected. They shall elect one of their number chairman, and a majority of their number shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, provided no act of the board shall be binding unless three members concur therein. In the event that the chairman shall not be present at any meeting, one of the members shall be chosen to act as chairman pro tempore, and an order to that effect shall be entered in the minutes.

"Sec. 3. It shall be the duty of said board of county school trustees:

"(a) To appoint a county superintendent of schools. This officer must be a certificated teacher, having a regular elementary or high school certificate of the state of California, who has had not less than five years experience as a teacher or educational administrator, or both;

two years of which shall have been in the five years immediately preceding his appointment. He need not be an elector of Butte county, but must reside in the county during his term of office. The term of office of the superintendent of schools shall be two years for the first appointment, unless sooner removed or recalled, and if reappointed the superintendent shall hold office for four years, unless sooner removed or recalled."

Prior to the 4th day of December, 1922, George W. Jones, Fred M. Turner, John Moreland, C. A. Tripp, and P. F. Bullington were the duly elected, qualified and acting members of the board of trustees of said county. At the general election held on November 7, 1922, N. T. Enloe and W. F. Matthews were regularly elected members of the board to succeed said Tripp and Bullington. A serious question arises whether, under the provisions of the charter, their term began on the first Monday of December, which was the 4th day of December, 1922, or on the first Monday after the 1st day of January, 1923; but it is immaterial as far as this proceeding is concerned, and an expression of an opinion thereon would be of no binding force upon the litigants. On November 18, 1922, the board of trustees, as then constituted, appointed Mr. Passmore, who had been superintendent of schools for several years and whose time was about to expire, superintendent for the term of four years. On December 4th the same board ratified the appointment made as before stated, but it is manifest that this ratification could add nothing to the force of the action taken on November 18th. On said 4th day of December the said George W. Jones, Fred M. Turner, John Moreland, N. T. Enloe, and W. F. Matthews, assuming to be and to act as the duly elected and qualified members of the board, met in the office of the county superintendent of schools, and after organizing as such board appointed petitioner, C. H. Nielsen, county superintendent of schools of said Butte county "for the term beginning at noon on the first Monday after the 1st day of January, 1923, and as successor to the said Irvin Passmore, whose term of such county school superintendent would expire at said time." As to Mr. Nielsen, it may be stated that he has abandoned this proceeding for the reason that the "new" board reappointed him on January 8th of this year and thereafter he presented a new bond to the judge of the superior court, which was approved by him and was thereafter filed as provided by law. As to Nielsen, therefore, the refusal of the judge to act upon his first bond is of no further consequence. Passmore, however, insists that the "old" board had authority to appoint him for a period extending nearly four years beyond the end of their term and that he is the legally appointed county superintendent of schools.

[1] It is apparent, though, that we cannot in this proceeding finally determine the title to this office; in other words, which of the two competitive appointees is the legally constituted superintendent of schools of said county. It is conceded that such question can be determined only in quo warranto proceedings. Satterlee v. San Francisco, 23 Cal. 314; Buckner v. Veuve, 63 Cal. 304; 32 Cyc. 1415. We understand that steps have been taken to so determine it, and it would be idle to attempt to forestall the result of such proceeding.

[2] It may be admitted that the existence of contesting claimants of the office is no valid objection to the approval of a bond. In such proceeding a prima facie showing of title is all that is demanded of one who presents the bond for approval. We do not mean to say that the judge would be required to approve the bond if it appeared to him from an examination of the law that the appointment or election of the applicant was entirely illegal, but that it is not his province in such proceeding to determine disputable questions of title as would be proper in quo warranto.

[3] But this consideration is really beside the mark, because Mr. Passmore by the following allegation of his answer has shown that the judge did approve his bond:

> "That after said appointment on November 18, 1922, official notice having been received thereof, the said Irvin Passmore immediately accepted the position, and within the time allowed by law, filed his oath of office and his bond conditioned for the faithful performance of his duty as such county superintendent of schools, and which bond was duly approved by the judge of the superior court of the county of Butte and thereafter duly filed and recorded."

It is of no moment that after said attempted ratification of Mr. Passmore's appointment made on December 4th as aforesaid, he presented another bond which the judge declined to act upon. It is not claimed that the first bond was defective, and no reason appears why the approval of the second bond would have aided Mr. Passmore in any way. The judge may have assigned an erroneous reason for his action, but Mr. Passmore has not been prejudiced by the failure to approve the second bond.

The petition is denied and the proceedings dismissed.

JOHNSON et al. v. BRIDGE et al.
(Civ. 4408.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 30, 1923.)

1. Specific performance 🔑119—Plaintiff must show fair and just contract.

In suits for specific performance, it must be affirmatively shown that the contract is fair and just, and that it is not inequitable to enforce it.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑134(1)—Encroachment of house on adjoining land held "incumbrance" on title.

Where a land sale contract described a lot by metes and bounds and provided that on full performance vendor would execute a deed conveying it clear from incumbrances, an overlapping of the house two feet on the adjoining lot constituted an incumbrance against which vendor agreed to hold purchaser harmless and was an objection to title, the burden of which was on vendor to remove.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Incumbrance (On Title).]

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑144(1)—Purchaser as equitable owner not liable for expense in moving house overlapping adjoining lot; "incumbrance."

Where a lot was purchased under land sale contract whereby, on performance by purchaser of her agreement, vendor would execute a deed conveying free and clear of incumbrances, an overlap and encroachment of the house two feet on the adjoining lot was an incumbrance, and the expense of moving the house could not be equitably charged against purchaser.

4. Vendor and purchaser 🔑134(1)—"Incumbrance" may include whatever impairs use or impedes transfer.

As applied to an estate in land, an incumbrance may include whatever charges, burdens, obstructs, or impairs its use or impedes its transfer.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by Bertha Johnson and another against Carrie E. Bridge and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hubbard & Johnson and T. W. Hubbard, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Frank E. Powers, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. This is an action to specifically enforce a contract for the sale of certain real property. Judgment went for plaintiffs, and it directed that defendants execute a deed conveying the property in question upon payment to them of the sum of $79.25, an amount admitted to be due. This is an appeal from such judgment.

It appears from the record that on April 20, 1912, Carrie E. Bridge, as vendor, and Bertha Johnson, as vendee, entered into a written contract for the purchase and sale of a certain house and lot situated in San Francisco. A small deposit was made by the vendee, and the balance of the purchase price was to be paid in monthly installments, the vendor to retain title to the premises until full payment was had.

Plaintiff with regularity made her payments pursuant to the terms of the contract. Following the execution thereof and in the year 1916 the building was partially destroyed by fire, and the vendor collected the insurance, amounting to the sum of $700. At that time both parties to said contract learned for the first time that the house as it had been originally erected overlapped the lot of the contiguous owner. Notwithstanding this fact, the building was reconstructed by the vendor as it originally stood, the sum collected as insurance thereon being used for such purpose. Upon the completion of the building, plaintiff Bertha Johnson entered into the actual possession of the property, and has ever since been and now is in such actual possession. After the defendant vendor had reconstructed the building the adjoining lot owner instituted a suit against her, and judgment was rendered requiring the removal of the structure. In conformity with the terms of the judgment, the building was removed to the proper lines, and it is here sought by the vendor to recover from said plaintiff the various items of expense incident thereto before being required to execute the deed in conformity with her original agreement. There is evidence to show that the vendee, after she discovered the overlapping and before the reconstruction of the house suggested to her vendor that the structure be moved the necessary distance to take it off the adjoining lot. Plaintiff Bertha Johnson also testified that defendant vendor refused to do so, and told said plaintiff not to bother about the matter, as the adjoining owner could do nothing in the premises and that the question was one which did not concern her. The defendant, on the other hand, denied that any such request for removal had ever been made. Under these circumstances it is the claim of appellants that the evidence does not show a case for specific performance as granted, inasmuch as it is inequitable to make such a decree against them without basing it upon the condition that the money expended in removing the house and the costs incurred in the ejectment suit and certain other incidental expenses be returned to them. It is further claimed that said plaintiff, from the time she entered into possession of the property, has been the equitable owner thereof, and all expenses incurred by reason of the fact that the house was built across the line should be borne by her.

[1, 2] It is undoubtedly true that the rule is well established that in suits for specific performance it must be affirmatively shown that the contract is fair and just, and that it is not inequitable to enforce it. A court of equity will not lend its aid to enforce a contract which is in any respect unfair or which savors of oppression. In the instant case, however, no such condition exists. Plaintiff made her purchase under a contract which specifically described the property by metes and bounds. The contract also provided that upon full performance by her of all the terms of her agreement the vendor would execute and deliver to her a good and sufficient deed conveying the premises free and clear of all incumbrances. It is conceded that plaintiff Bertha Johnson punctually observed and performed all conditions required of her. Here the overlap and encroachment upon the adjoining lot amounted to some two feet, and this certainly constituted an incumbrance against which defendant Carrie E. Bridge by her contract agreed to hold the vendee harmless. The encroachment constituted a substantial objection to the vendor's title, the burden of which it was incumbent upon her to remove. 39 Cyc. p. 1506.

[3, 4] Equally untenable is the claim that as equitable owner of the property the plaintiff must bear the burden of the expense growing out of the overlap. What has been said with reference to appellants' first contention applies with equal force to this one. Plaintiff received no benefit under the contract that she was not entitled to. It called for certain definite property described therein, clear of all incumbrances. The overlapping of the house in the manner indicated upon the adjoining owner was certainly a substantial incumbrance upon the property contracted for and one which the said defendant had agreed by her contract to insure against. The expense of doing the work could not therefore be equitably charged against the vendee. As applied to an estate in land, an incumbrance may include whatever charges, burdens, obstructs, or impairs its use or impedes its transfer. 20 C. J. 1252.

From what we have said it follows that the judgment should be, and it is hereby affirmed.

I concur: RICHARDS, J.

PEOPLE v. MAGEE. (Cr. 922.)

1. Criminal law 🔑144(7)—Consent to continuances presumed in absence of objection.

Though it appears that continuances were allowed after expiration of the time prescribed by statute during which accused had the right to be brought to trial, in the absence of any showing defendant objected to the continuances, his consent will be presumed.

2. Indictment and information 🔑144—Motion to dismiss as to one count too late after plea of not guilty.

A motion to dismiss as to one count of an information made after entry of a plea of not guilty comes too late and is properly denied.

3. Assault and battery 🔑88—Criminal law 🔑1169(12)—Admission of testimony of threats made by accused held error, though not reversible.

In a prosecution for assault, where the prosecuting witness testified that just after he was struck he saw on defendant's hand an instrument called "knuckles," the admission of testimony by another that more than a year before he had seen accused in possession of "brass knuckles," and that accused then stated "he had got one man with them, and would get others," held error, though not reversible, in view of all the evidence; the testimony of previous possession of the "knuckles" being admissible, though its probative value would be lessened because of remoteness.

4. Criminal law 🔑1130(5)—Denial of instruction not reviewed in absence of reasons or citations.

Mere suggestions that the court erred in denial of instructions without any statement of the reasons or citations of authorities connected therewith does not present a question for review.

5. Criminal law 🔑1174(5)—Conversation of juror with witness held not alone grounds for reversal.

The fact that a juror held some conversation with the prosecuting witness during a prosecution for assault, though imprudent, held insufficient grounds for reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

L. L. Magee was convicted of assault by means likely to produce great bodily injury, and he appeals from judgment and order denying new trial. Affirmed.

Chas. I. Rosin, and Harry J. Keeley, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. In this action the information was filed on the 10th day of February, 1922, and the case brought to trial on the following 12th of July. The defendant was convicted of the crime of assault by means likely to produce great bodily injury, a felony, as charged in count 2 of the information. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Section 1382 of the Penal Code provides that—

> be dismissed in the following cases: * * * 2. If a defendant, whose trial has not been postponed upon his application, is not brought to trial within sixty days after the finding of the indictment, or filing of the information."

At the beginning of the trial appellant moved that the action be dismissed for the reason that the defendant was not brought to trial within the period prescribed by law, and that all the continuances of the case were made without the consent of the defendant. He now contends that the court erred in denying this motion.

From the clerk's transcript it appears that on February 17, 1922, the defendant entered his plea of not guilty, and the trial of the action was set for April 7, 1922. Thereafter continuances were ordered as follows: On April 7, 1922, to May 2, 1922; on May 2, 1922, to July 12, 1922. The minutes show that each of these continuances was ordered "at the request of the district attorney." The clerk's transcript is silent as to the causes for these continuances. There is no other record of what actually occurred when the continuances were ordered, except that, in the discussion of the motion, as shown by the reporter's transcript, conflicting statements were made by the district attorney and by the defendant's attorney concerning the question whether the defendant did or did not consent to any continuance beyond the 60-day period. Immediately prior to the pronouncing of judgment the defendant presented a motion in arrest of judgment, which was denied, and a motion for a new trial, which was also denied. These motions rested in part upon the ground that the court was without jurisdiction to try the defendant, for the reason that the defendant, not having waived his right to be brought to trial within the time prescribed by law, was not brought to trial within said time, "there being departments of this court, within the time prescribed by law in which the defendant had a right to be brought to trial, that were not engaged in trying criminal matters." During the discussion of the motion in arrest of judgment, as shown by the reporter's transcript, the judge stated:

> "From his own knowledge and experience, that there were no other departments of the superior court engaged in the trial of criminal cases in which this defendant could have been tried," following this with a statement of conditions existing in three other departments of the court. "The court now holds that every time this case was continued, there was a case of greater urgency then being tried by the court because it had equal priority, and in many instances the case actually having been continued from a day or two previous at the time of the case of People against Magee * * * being continued."

[1] From the foregoing statement of facts it is seen that the case was set down to be tried at a date within 60 days after the filing of the information. Thereafter two continuances were ordered to dates beyond the expiration of the said period of 60 days. The record fails to show any objection made by the defendant to either of these continuances. Consent will therefore be presumed. People v. Rongo, 169 Cal. 71, 145 Pac. 1017; People v. Douglass, 100 Cal. 1, at page 4, 34 Pac. 490. On these authorities our conclusion is that the court did not err in refusing to dismiss the action.

[2] Following his motion for dismissal of action on the 12th day of July, as above stated, and the denial thereof, the defendant moved that count 2 of the information be dismissed for the reason that the defendant had not been committed by a magistrate for the offense charged in that count, and for the further reason that count 2 stated the same offense as that stated in count 1, though in different language. He now claims that the court erred in denying that motion. The motion, having been made after entry of the plea of not guilty, came too late, and it was properly denied. People v. Ronsse, 26 Cal. App. 100, 104, 146 Pac. 65; Pen. Code, §§ 990, 996.

might affect the weight of the evidence, but not its admissibility. The several decisions referred to by counsel for appellant in support of this objection do not in any instance apply to the point stated.

[4] Appellant suggests that the court erred in refusing certain instructions requested by the defendant. Since he has stated no reason for the suggestion, and cited no authorities upon any proposition connected therewith, the point is not so presented that it may now be considered.

[5] The fact that one of the jurors, during the time while the case was on trial, and during the recess of the court, held some conversation with the complaining witness, is not alone sufficient to justify a reversal of the judgment. Unquestionably the conduct of the juror was imprudent. But when the matter was brought to the attention of the court, he testified that said conversation had no relation to this case. Said conversation related only to trivial matters wholly unrelated to this case. There is no evidence to the contrary.

CATTERLIN v. PETERSON et al.
(Civ. 3907.)

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑335—Defaulting vendee cannot recover payments from vendor.

A vendee cannot, after being in default without legal excuse, recover from the vendor the amount paid by the vendee on a contract, when the vendor was not in default, where there has been no mutual rescission or abandonment of the contract.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑101—Vendor held not required to notify defaulting vendee of termination of latter's rights.

Unless the contract specifies otherwise, on a default by a vendee without legal excuse, whether by waiver on the part of the vendor or otherwise, the vendor is under no obligation to give notice to the vendee of his termination of his rights under the contract.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑335—Notices sent by vendor to defaulting vendee of termination of latter's interest in property held not abandonment of contract or rescission, entitling defaulting vendee to recover payments.

A vendor's notice to a defaulting vendee under an installment contract stated the vendor would not permit vendee to take possession of premises until satisfactory arrangements were made with vendor, and that in future vendor would insist upon strict compliance with clause making time essence of contract, and a subsequent notice declared that, because of vendee's default, his interest in the property was terminated under the terms of the contract. Held not to constitute a rescission or abandonment of the contract by the vendor, so as to entitle vendee to recover payments made notwithstanding vendee's default.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Action by S. E. Catterlin against Ora A. Peterson and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

William R. Barnes, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Jones & Weller, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. The parties entered into a contract on the 5th day of August, 1920, by the terms of which defendant Ora A. Peterson agreed to purchase from the plaintiff a house and lot in the city of Los Angeles for the sum of $4,500, payable $500 in cash on the execution of the agreement and $60 each month thereafter until the balance of the purchase price was paid. The vendee paid on account $676.66, and thereafter, having failed to make payments promptly as provided by the terms of the contract, on January 31, 1921, the vendor served upon the vendee the following notice:

"Ora A. Peterson, 212 Center Street, Venice, California: With reference to our contract dated August 5, 1920, this is to notify you that on account of your failure to comply with the terms thereof, you will not be permitted to take possession of the premises therein described until such time as satisfactory arrangements have been made with me. And you are further notified that in the future I shall insist upon strict compliance with that provision of the contract which makes time of its essence, and that payments shall be made promptly as the same fall due. Dated this 31st day of January, 1921. S. E. Catterlin, by Dana R. Weller, Atty., 500 Union League Bldg., L. A."

On April 6, 1921, the vendor served on the vendee another notice, copy of which is as follows:

"Ora A. Peterson, 212 Center Street, Venice, Calif.: You are hereby notified that on account of your failure to pay installments in accordance with the terms of your contract dated August 5, 1920, for the purchase of lot 210, Chesterfield Square, in the city of Los Angeles, I have elected to and do hereby declare all your interest in said property terminated, in accordance with the terms of said contract. Dated this 6th day of April, 1921. S. E. Catterlin, by Dana R. Weller, His Atty."

Shortly thereafter action was brought by plaintiff against both defendants to quiet title. Defendants answered and, in addition thereto, filed a cross-complaint by which they sought to recover from plaintiff all moneys paid by them to plaintiff on account of the purchase price of the property contracted to be sold to them.

The court finds, among other things:

> "That the defendant did not keep or perform all of the obligations of said agreement on her part to be performed. That the plaintiff did keep and perform the obligations on his part to be performed by the terms of said agreement. That said defendant Ora A. Peterson did not perform each and all of the covenants in said agreement contained, and was not at all times mentioned in her cross-complaint ready and willing to perform each and every covenant therein contained. That the plaintiff has not failed or refused to comply with the conditions of said agreement, and was not required by the terms thereof to permit said defendant to take possession of said premises or to collect the rent thereof. That the plaintiff did not, on the 6th day of April, 1921, or at any other time, rescind or abandon said agreement or retake possession of the premises therein described, and did not notify said defendants that the contract was abandoned or determined, but that plaintiff did notify said defendant O. A. Peterson that her interest in said property was terminated by reason of her failure to comply with the terms of said agreement. That the installments of the purchase price, as required by the terms of said contract, were not paid by the defendant Ora A. Peterson in accordance with the terms thereof."

[1] Counsel for appellant very pointedly states in his brief that the only question for determination is whether the purchase agreement was abandoned by either of the parties. The cases are so numerous as to require no citation to the effect that a vendee cannot, after being in default without legal excuse therefor, recover from the vendor the amount paid by the vendee on the contract when the vendor was in no wise in default on his part of the contract, except where there has been a mutual rescission or an abandonment of the contract by the parties thereto. After the vendee's breach, the vendor may agree to a mutual abandonment and rescission, in which case only there may be a recovery. Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17; Skookum Oil Co. v. Thomas, 162 Cal. 539. 123 Pac. 363. It is conceded by counsel for respondent that had the contract been rescinded or had it been abandoned, the vendee would be entitled to recover the payments made. So much being settled, at least by agreement of counsel, if not by the decisions of this state, the only question to determine is, Do the two notices served by plaintiff on defendant Ora A. Peterson show an abandonment or a rescission of the contract? In Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., supra, where a similar contract was involved, the court, in pointing out what are the several rights of a vendor of real estate in such circumstances, said that one of his remedies was to rest upon his contract, remain inactive, yet retain to his own use the moneys paid by the vendee, and as an incidental matter call the "vendee into a court of equity and compel him to show why all his rights under the contract should not be held to be at an end. The vendor, when he prosecutes such an action, does so to cut off the possibility of any future claim by the vendee to equitable relief, which might embarrass or cloud his title." That is what respondent contends he did in this case.

[2] The law appears to be well settled that, in the absence of an express provision in the contract of the parties to the contrary, on a default by the vendee, without legal excuse for such default whether by waiver on the part of the vendor or otherwise, the vendor is under no obligation to give notice to the vendee of his termination of his rights under the contract. Commercial Bank v. Weldon, 148 Cal. 608, 84 Pac. 171; Champion Gold Mining Co. v. Champion Mines, 164 Cal. 205, 128 Pac. 315; Schwerin Estate Realty Co. v. Slye, 173 Cal. 172, 159 Pac. 420; Newhall L. & F. Co. v. Burns, 31 Cal. App. 549, 161 Pac. 14.

> But "if the vendee, in fact, has been in default, a notice that the contract was terminated would have been proper, and the vendors would be no longer bound, either to convey the land or refund the purchase money. Such notice would have been in strict accord with the contract. (Citing cases.) Lemle v. Barry, 181 Cal. 10, 183 Pac. 150.

The case of Oursler v. Thacher, 152 Cal. 739, 93 Pac. 1007, is exactly in point herein. It shows a contract of sale on installments, default by vendees, a notice by vendor to vendees containing, among other things, the following:

> "Wherefore we, the undersigned, A. R. Oursler and Clemente Salazar, parties of the first part in said bond, do hereby declare said bond to be forfeited and all of your interest in the property therein and hereinafter described to be terminated."

The vendor brought an action to quiet title; the vendees answered and filed a cross-complaint for moneys paid by them to vendor under the terms of the contract. In the course of the decision the court said:

> "The stipulated facts here warrant no inference but the one that plaintiffs have done no more than to insist that under the terms of the contract defendants had no further rights under such contract, but had forfeited all such rights. Their notice of forfeiture and demand for possession of the mining property were strictly in line with this claim, and were in no sense a repudiation or abandonment of the contract or a consent to a rescission thereof. * * * The bringing of the action to quiet title was an act of the same character. Practically, it amounted to no more than the calling of the defaulting vendees into court to show why it should not be decreed that under the terms of the contract all their rights thereunder were at an end. In the absence of some sufficient equitable showing to excuse their failure to comply with the terms of the contract, plaintiffs, while standing on their contract, were entitled to such a decree, so as to cut off the possibility of any future claim by the vendee to equitable relief, which might embarrass or cloud his title."

The case of Champion Gold Mining Co. v. Champion Mines, supra, also involved a principle of law similar to that in this case. There a mining property had been sold on the same plan pursued in this case; that is, on the installment plan. The vendee had breached the contract by not making the payments agreed upon and, after some negotiations, as here, the vendor, a corporation, at a regular meeting of the board of directors thereof, adopted a resolution containing, in part, the following:

> "Now, therefore, it is hereby resolved, that said agreement be, and it is hereby terminated and canceled, and B. W. Shoecraft, secretary of this corporation, be and he is hereby authorized and directed for and on behalf of this corporation, and as its act and deed, to immediately take possession of all the properties of this corporation covered by said contract."

A certified copy of the resolution referred to was delivered to the vendee. Some subsequent attempt to adjust conditions between the parties proved unsuccessful, and the vendee instituted an action to recover possession of the property and damages for the detention thereof. In holding that plaintiff (the vendee) could not recover, the court said, in part:

> "We do not understand that any notice was essential to terminate plaintiff's rights under the contract. Its default, unexcused and not waived, ipso facto terminated those rights, and practically the only effect of the resolution was to express the determination of defendant corporation not to waive such default and that the contract was, by reason of the default, terminated, and to authorize the designated officer for and in its name to retake possession."

[3] It is a general rule that there is no presumption in favor of an abandonment and that clear proof thereof will be required. Appellant has made no argument, either in his brief or orally, to sustain his claim that the language contained in either or both of the notices herein set forth will bear the construction for which he contends. All that the first notice contains is a statement to the effect that, because of failure on the part of the defendant to comply with the terms of the contract, she would not be permitted to take possession of the premises until such time as satisfactory arrangements had been made with plaintiff; also that thereafter plaintiff would insist on strict compliance with that provision of the contract which made time its essence, etc. Surely there can be nothing so far which in any manner could be construed as an abandonment of the contract on the part of plaintiff. On the contrary, it would appear that plaintiff, far from suggesting or even contemplating an abandonment, is insisting or enforcing the provision of the contract so that "payments shall be made promptly as the same fall due." The substance of the second notice is that, by reason of the fact that defendant Ora A. Peterson has failed to pay installments, plaintiff declares that Ora A. Peterson's interest in said property is terminated in accordance with the terms of the contract. It will be noticed that plaintiff did not say that he rescinded or abandoned or canceled the contract or that the contract was at an end. He rather contented himself with notifying defendant that her interest in the property was terminated, just as was done in the case of Oursler v. Thacher, supra, where the vendors, by their notice to vendees, declared "said bond to be forfeited, and all your interest in the property therein and hereinafter described to be terminated." There is nothing which would indicate that the contract was to be canceled, or that it was rescinded; but there is a clear intimation that plaintiff considered defendant's rights in the property itself had been forfeited by reason of her breach of the contract. In the opinion of the court, there was no rescission or abandonment of the contract by plaintiff. He stood squarely and firmly on the terms of his written contract; he was not in default at any time with reference to anything by him to be done or performed. On the other hand, the vendees were in default; they showed no inclination to abide by the terms of their obligation to plaintiff. There was no legal excuse for their conduct because of waiver on the part of plaintiff or otherwise; consequently they are in no position to recover any moneys paid to plaintiff on account of the purchase price.

The judgment is affirmed.

CALIFORNIA PEAR GROWERS' ASS'N v. HERSPRING. (Civ. 2552.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 22, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 22, 1923.)

1. Sales 🔑181(12)—Evidence held to show windfall pears merchantable when delivered to drier.

Evidence held sufficient to establish that windfall pears were delivered to a drier in merchantable condition, and that subsequent loss occurred through inability of the purchaser to care for the fruit quickly enough.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1) — Appellate court bound by findings of fact below supported by evidence.

Appellate court bound by findings of fact below supported by evidence.

3. Sales 🔑365—Finding that pears were merchantable held sufficient regardless of when delivery deemed made.

Findings that windfall pears were in a merchantable condition when delivered to the purchaser held broad enough to apply, whether delivery be deemed to have been made at piers or at the purchaser's drier, to which they were subsequently transported.

4. Sales 🔑168(2), 176(4)—Inspection must be within reasonable time; failure to inspect within reasonable time is waiver of right.

Where the purchaser of goods reserves the right to inspect, a reasonable time therefor is allowed, and a failure to inspect within the time allowed by the contract or by law is a waiver of the right.

5. Sales 🔑202(1)—Pear grower's contract with drier held such that payment was unnecessary to pass title to seller.

A contract between a pear growers' association and a purchaser of windfall pears held an executory agreement to sell certain goods for a certain price, so that, when they were delivered and accepted or the right to reject waived, the sale was executed and the purchaser liable for the price; it being unnecessary that payment be made in order to pass title.

6. Sales 🔑51—Action for price is ratification of sale.

An action to recover the purchase price is a ratification of a sale.

7. Sales 🔑384(3) — Contract price measure of damages for failure to accept windfall pears pursuant to contract.

In an action to recover damages for a purchaser's failure to accept windfall pears pursuant to contract, where the pears had become valueless, the damages, under Civ. Code, §§ 3311 and 3353, would be measurable by the contract price.

8. Account stated 🔑19(3)—Evidence held insufficient to establish an account stated and accepted.

Evidence held insufficient to establish an account stated and accepted between a pear growers' association and a purchaser of windfall pears.

9. Estoppel 🔑52—Essentials stated.

In order to give rise to estoppel, the party to be estopped must be apprised of the true facts, must speak or act with intent to deceive or with careless and culpable negligence, and the party asserting the estoppel must be destitute of knowledge of the facts or means of acquiring it and must rely on the conduct or statement of the other under circumstances such that he will be injured by allowing its truth to be disputed.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1058(1)—Exclusion of evidence as to merchantability of pears at drier held not prejudicial.

In an action for a balance due on pears, exclusion of the county horticultural inspector's report as to the merchantability of the pears at a drier held not reversible error, where he himself testified fully as to the condition as he found them.

11. Evidence 🔑244(2)—Report of one acting without the scope of his authority as to condition of fruit held properly rejected in action for purchase price.

A report made by one who was directed by an incorporated growers' association to inspect windfall pears at a wharf from which they were being shipped to a drier, relative to the condition of the fruit at the drier and based on another's report to him, held properly rejected in an action for a balance due on the purchase price, since he did not follow instructions and his report was not within the scope of his authority and based on another's report to him as to conditions at the drier which were not in controversy.

12. Evidence 🔑448—Introduction of extrinsic evidence to aid in construction of contract to purchase windfall pears held unwarranted.

Introduction of extrinsic evidence consisting of conversations between a purchaser of windfall pears and directors of a growers' association, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1856 and 1860, as circumstances surrounding the execution of a contract to aid in proper construction thereof, held unwarranted.

13. Trial 🔑46(1)—Purpose of proposed testimony should be stated when its relevancy does not appear.

Where the materiality of proposed testimony is not apparent, what is sought to be proven should be stated so that the court may be fully advised in ruling thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by the California Pear Growers' Association, a corporation, against Joseph Herspring. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, and Robert H. Schwab, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Aaron Sapiro and Milton D. Sapiro, both of San Francisco, and Downey & Downey, of Sacramento, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for the balance of the purchase price of pears sold by the plaintiff to the defendant, and plaintiff had judgment, from which defendant has appealed. The contract between the parties was in writing, executed on July 17, 1919, and we may quote the following provisions:

> "1. Subject to delivery by growers under the standard pear crop agreement of the seller, the seller agrees to sell and the buyer agrees to accept and buy from the seller 1,000 tons, more or less, windfall pears, at the price of thirty-five dollars ($35.00) per ton, f. o. b. river bank, Sacramento river, during the season of 1919. 2. Said pears, up to the said quantity of 1,000 tons, more or less, shall be delivered from any of the following grower-members of the seller, namely, as per list attached, all of whom are known to the parties hereto and the location of whose ranches and points of delivery are also known to the parties hereto. 3. Deliveries hereunder shall not begin prior to July 25th unless by mutual agreement or by consent, at the suggestion of the buyer. * * * 5. The pears shall be two inches and up, free from sunburn and immature pears and from pears which have begun to rot. * * * 6. The buyer shall inspect all fruit at the time of delivery and shall accept or reject the pears at the drier. No rejection shall be made except on notice to the grower and for defects herein specified. * * * 8. The fruit shall be weighed at the drier. If there are no facilities there for weighing, the seller will accept the weights at drier on tested scales or at the nearest public weigher and a certificate of weights shall be signed by the buyer and delivered immediately to the seller. * * * 9. The buyer further agrees to pay for all the pears delivered hereunder immediately upon delivery. 10. It is expressly agreed that all of the pears delivered hereunder shall be used by the buyer for drying only and shall not be sold or delivered directly or indirectly to any canner under any circumstances without the written consent of the California Pear Growers' Association, and only upon such terms and conditions as the said association may specify in writing."

The plaintiff is a nonprofit, co-operative marketing association whose members are growers of pears, and the fruit was to be furnished by those whose names appeared on said list attached to the contract. The ranches upon which the pears were produced are located upon the Sacramento river, and defendant's drying plant is just outside the city of Sacramento. After the execution of the contract, defendant made arrangements for the transportation of the pears from the river bank by the Southern Pacific steamers to Sacramento and thence by the Northern Electric Railroad to his said plant. The fruit was of an inferior grade, shaken from the trees by the wind, of an extremely perishable nature, and requiring prompt shipment and speedy attention for drying. Not only by reason of the character of the pears, but also of the excessive heat of the summer and the lack of refrigeration, was there necessity for economy of time in the shipment and the preparation of said fruit for drying. Prompt and expeditious carriage was furnished by said transportation companies, and the fruit arrived in good season at the drier. As to this there seems to be no dispute between the parties, but there is a vital disagreement as to the quality and condition of a large part of the fruit when it was delivered, and this controversy is the cause of the litigation. That much of the fruit was discarded and destroyed because it was unfit for drying or indeed for any use is shown without conflict and is not denied by respondent; but the association's claim is that—

> "Mr. Herspring's plant was entirely inadequate to accommodate the quantity of fruit purchased under this contract. As a consequence, the pears arrived at the drier and were there compelled to stand unloaded for days. Deterioration was inevitable. When the fruit was eventually removed from the cars, a large quantity had become unfit. With each day the congestion became heavier and the period of delay longer. Hence the quantity of spoiled fruit constantly increased."

Appellant's position, stated generally, is that such condition was not due to any fault on his part, but that such fruit was defective when received, and therefore the loss should fall upon the association. The trial court took the view that the pears complied with the terms of the contract and would have continued of such quality if they had been unloaded and dried within a reasonable time; that the delay, which caused their deterioration, was a circumstance for which respondent was not responsible, and hence the loss should be borne by appellant. This characteristic and determinative factor in the case appealed to the learned trial judge as follows:

> "The fruit season does not wait on anybody. You ship your fruit when it falls, when it accumulates; it does not keep. You can't hold it back to meet the necessities of anybody. It has got to be handled during that time, and anybody who buys that sort of fruit buys it with knowledge that it is a touch and go proposition; that it is a work of days and hours to preserve it, or it is lost; and Mr. Herspring undertook the purchase of a short-lived fruit, the picking of which could not be regulated by its owners; it had to be shipped as it fell during the season when it was available; and without the experience that the business required, without an established plant, without a worked out system, without efficient help—one who had had experience in those enterprises could see how such an enterprise would fail that was so loosely associated together, and the inevitable result happened. I have no doubt that Mr. Herspring did the very best he could under the circumstances, but his plant does not seem to have been qualified to handle such a large amount of fruit as came to him under the terms of his contract."

[1] That this theory thus announced clearly implying, if not expressly stating, that the failure in the character of the fruit was chargeable to the fault of appellant and not to that of respondent, finds support in the evidence, cannot for a moment be doubted.

First, as to the quality of the pears when shipped, we find the growers testifying without contradiction that the fruit answered and fulfilled every requirement of the contract. This testimony showed further that the condition of the pears was such that it would continue unimpaired for from 4 to 10 days after shipment. As an illustration of this testimony, we may quote Albert A. Brown as follows:

> "I am a member of the California Pear Growers' Association and shipped windfall pears to Jos. Herspring & Co. for the association. I personally inspected the pears shipped by me. There were none less than two inches, free from worms, no withered or rotten pears among them. There were no sunburned pears."

He further testified that they would have remained in good condition "about three, four or five days at the ranch easily enough." Since the pears were shipped promptly and were only one or two days in transit, it is a fair inference from the testimony of these witnesses that the fruit was in good condition when received by appellant and would have answered the purpose if it had been promptly attended to. There was much other testimony to strengthen and confirm the inference. Mr. Fred C. Brosius, the county horticultural commissioner, testified as follows:

> "Q. Did you see the pears consigned to Mr. Herspring at the docks at Sacramento? A. I saw them occasionally. Q. What was the condition of the fruit? A. July 29th, because the telegram designated that I should examine them there on arrival, all the pears on that day consigned to Mr. Herspring's drying yards were in my opinion very good quality windfall pears.
> "The Court: Did you look on any other occasion? A. Yes, later on. I had occasion to visit the dock every morning to examine all Eastern and cannery goods for the mealy bug, if for no other reason, and thus at various times I examined them, and they were in fair condition; of course, some of it was in better condition than others.
> "The Court: They were merchantable? A. Absolutely."

Mr. C. A. Wilkins, county horticultural inspector, testified also that he examined the fruit on the dock, and, while he found some of it was pretty ripe, "I can't say that I found any signs of decay or leakage at that time." The witness, though, discovered a very different condition when he made an inspection in the drying yards. Then "the fruit was in all stages of maturity and possible decay," but he did not know how long it had been since the fruit arrived. He did add, however:

> "I think there were manifests showing some cars leaving Sacramento on the 27th or 28th of July and inspected on the 10th of August; those were the last cars."

He further testified that he found four or five carloads of the fruit stacked in the yards "out in the sun," where it was quite hot, and that there were not enough trays to handle the fruit. Indeed, as to the inability of the appellant to dispose of the fruit promptly, the testimony of Mr. David Franklin Herspring is convincing. He was the manager of the drying plant during the months of June, July, August, and September, 1919, although he had no prior experience in such business, having been a veterinary dentist and before that engaged in the candy business. He testified that they had labor troubles at the plant with the first foreman; that he had trouble with laborers in the field because of the foreman; "that the foreman, on the day he resigned, went out in the field and induced the men to quit work, telling them that he would take them on a fishing excursion and would treat them royally; that a majority of the men left and that evening at 4 o'clock he picked up fourteen of the men and persuaded them to go back; that he put them to work in the sulphur houses; there were some boys working back there where these men left all this fruit piled up under the sheds; * * * that he could not handle the pears as they came in; that if there was a place for the men and capacity to handle the fruit, they could have handled it, but that they lacked capacity for getting a spur and capacity for the men to do the work; they lacked the number of acres to handle the tonnage delivered; that the failure to handle those pears resulted from a lack of capacity and from lack of space; that they could not possibly unload every car the day it was delivered, because at times they would not have four men."

We consider further quotation unnecessary, but deem it sufficient to say that, if it be conceded that a conclusion favorable to appellant might have been reached by the trial court, there can be no doubt that the finding in favor of respondent is abundantly supported.

This result is not affected by the question as to when the title to the pears passed to defendant. There may be ground for a difference of opinion whether under the contract title vested when the pears were delivered at the river bank to defendant's agent, the transportation company, or whether they remained the property of respondent until a reasonable time elapsed after their arrival at Mr. Herspring's drier. Many conflicting decisions are cited involving similar contracts, but we shall not review them, as the judgment must be upheld upon either theory. It is true that the trial judge expressed his opinion that complete delivery was made at the river bank, but he declared also that the failure in the quality of the fruit was imputable to appellant's delay.

[2, 3] However, we are controlled by the findings, and therein no specific limitation as to the delivery is made. It was found:

> "That under and pursuant to said contract, said plaintiff delivered pears to the value of $10,147.74 of the kind and quality as called for by the said contract, which said sum has been paid to said plaintiff by said defendant.
> "That said plaintiff offered for delivery and acceptance and delivered to said defendant certain other pears under and pursuant to said contract, being the same pears alleged in said complaint as not having been paid for."

Then follow specific findings that these pears complied with the terms of the contract, and furthermore:

> "That it is not true that any pears offered for delivery and acceptance by the plaintiff were rejected by the defendant because of the fact that they were not free from sunburn, or were immature, or had begun to rot prior to their being offered for delivery and acceptance by the said plaintiff. * * * That it is true that plaintiff offered for delivery and delivered to said defendant certain pears, some of which were accepted by defendant, and others of which were rejected by the defendant as not meeting the requirements of said contracts, but that all of said pears so rejected by said defendant did meet the requirements of said contract, and that said attempted rejections by said defendant were improper and did not constitute rejection of the pears so delivered."

These findings are broad enough to embrace either of the suggested theories as to delivery, and in view of the evidence the trial court was not required to be more specific.

[4] It is true that the court did not explicitly find that the delay of appellant in the inspection of the pears was unreasonable, but it is clearly implied in the findings which were made and which covered all the material issues of the pleadings. It is not disputed that where time is given for inspection before title passes, a reasonable time is allowed, having regard to all the circumstances in the case, and "a failure to inspect or test within the time permitted by the contract or the law is a waiver of the condition qualifying the buyer's obligation to become owner of the goods or to pay for them, or of a condition subsequent authorizing return of the goods." Williston on Sales, § 476; Potter v. Holmes, 87 Minn. 477, 92 N. W. 411; White v. Harvey, 85 Me. 212, 27 Atl. 106. Of course, an instance like this demands an almost immediate inspection after delivery. A delay of even 24 hours under the conditions to which we have referred might entail a loss of the right, and render the sale absolute, if we regard the vesting of the title as subject to the right of inspection.

[5] We can see no merit in the claim that the payment of the price was a condition precedent to the passing of title. No doubt there are many such cases wherein the vendor is permitted to retain the title until paid, although he may have delivered possession to the vendee. There is nothing in the contract herein, however, to give countenance to such view. We construe the contract as an executory agreement to sell certain goods for a certain price, and when they were delivered and accepted by defendant, or he had waived his right to reject them, the sale was executed and defendant became liable for the price.

[8] One of the main contentions of appellant is that there was an "account stated" between the parties. The source of this claim is found in the fact that itemized statements containing reductions for the rejected pears were sent by defendant to plaintiff, together with checks for payment, and it is urged that they were accepted without objection and therefore became binding upon the parties. The requisites of such account are not in dispute and need not be specifically considered. As to this claim the trial court found:

> "That after the delivery of pears to said defendant by said plaintiff, defendant made a written statement of the quantity of the pears accepted and of the quantity of pears claimed to have been rejected, which said statement was delivered to said plaintiff, together with the check of said defendant in payment for the number of pears so accepted; that four such statements were rendered by said defendant to said plaintiff during the months of July and August, 1919; that such statements were not made and delivered by defendant to said plaintiff immediately after the acceptance or rejection of any pears offered for delivery or delivered by said plaintiff, but four of such statements were made during the months of July and August, 1919.
> "That it is not true that plaintiff did not advise defendant that any rejections made by said defendant were not proper, or were not in accordance with the terms of said contract until after the last delivery of the statement following the last delivery of pears.
> "That plaintiff made objections to statements furnished by said defendant within a reasonable time after obtaining knowledge of the facts concerning the delivery of pears to said defendant, and the attempted rejection of pears by said defendant."

F. E. Borton, of Bakersfield, for petitioner.
J. R. Dorsey, Dist. Atty., and E. F. Brittan, both of Bakersfield, and M. G. Brittan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. This is a petition for writ of habeas corpus. The complaint, in so far as it is material here, reads as follows:

> "Personally appeared before me this 11th day of August, 1922, George Hudson, of Bakersfield, in the county of Kern, state of California, who, being first duly sworn, complains and accuses M. J. Bergen of the crime of misdemeanor, to wit, carrying concealed weapon, committed as follows: That said M. J. Bergen, on or about the 10th day of August, 1922, within the corporate limits of the said city of Bakersfield, county of Kern, state of California, did then and there willfully and unlawfully conceal upon his person one Iver-Johnson .38 pistol, without a license to carry such firearm."

Petitioner contends that this complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense. The language of the section of the statute (St. 1917, p. 221) under which the charge is made reads as follows:

> "Sec. 3. Carrying Firearms Without License, Misdemeanor. Every person who carries in any city, city and county, town or municipal corporation of this state, any pistol, revolver, or other firearm concealed upon his person without having a license to carry such firearm as hereinafter provided in section six of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

Section 1426 of the Penal Code requires that the complaint through which an action for a public offense is begun must set forth "the offense charged, with such particulars of time, place, person, and property as to enable the defendant to understand distinctly the character of the offense complained of, and to answer the complaint."

It seems apparent that in any accusation the name given the offense by the pleader is separate from the charging part of the instrument. This was held to be the rule in People v. Cuddihi, 54 Cal. 53. In that case the prosecution was by way of indictment, but the same reason is equally applicable to a complaint. A person of ordinary understanding who reads a formal accusation of crime, and finds himself charged with an "assault with intent to commit murder," "committed as follows," would know that he must look to what follows to discover the alleged facts, and, if they were to the effect that he had administered to some one a large quantity of a certain deadly poison with intent to murder such person, he would understand the offense charged to be that named in section 216 of the Penal Code, and he would pay no further attention to the name erroneously applied to the alleged offense by the pleader. Likewise, one reading the complaint in the instant proceeding passes on from the designation of the offense. There is no suggestion that the name is intended to be part of the charge, but, on the contrary, upon its face it purports to be nothing more than a name. When the complaint says, "committed as follows," we look to that which follows to see what it is alleged that Bergen did to commit an act violative of the law. There we find it said that he did "willfully and unlawfully conceal upon his person" a certain pistol "without a license to carry such firearm." Two facts are contained in this charge: First, that he concealed the pistol on his person; and, second, that he had no license to carry the same. But the act under which the prosecution is brought does not make it an offense to conceal a weapon upon one's person without a license to carry it, unless the concealment is joined with the carrying of the same. Without doubt, the purpose of the Legislature in enacting this law was to prevent citizens going armed in such fashion as to constitute a danger to the public; we think it was not designed to prohibit the concealment of a weapon upon one's person on his own premises or in his own home.

The technical meaning of the word "carry" seems not to have been given extended consideration in the cases involving this class of public offense. Webster's dictionary defines it as "to act as bearer; to convey anything; as to fetch and carry. To have or exert propulsive power." At common law the offense of carrying concealed weapons involved riding or going about, and not merely holding or possessing a weapon. State v. Huntly, 25 N. C. 418, 40 Am. Dec. 416.

The use of the word "carry" in an indictment conveys to a defendant the thought of going about armed, as well as the further proposition that he is charged with transporting the weapon with intent to use it as such. State v. Larkin, 24 Mo. App. 410; State v. Murray, 39 Mo. App. 127; State v. Gilbert, 87 N. C. 527, 42 Am. Rep. 518; Mangun v. State, 15 Tex. App. 362. The absence of an allegation of "carrying" leaves the accusation defective, not merely in form, but in substance; the complaint is lacking in an essential allegation, and therefore cannot confer jurisdiction upon any court to require the defendant to submit himself to processes in connection with any proceeding based upon it.

But it is said that, from the fact that the complaint alleges that petitioner was without a license "to carry" such firearm, it might be understood that the pleader intended to charge the defendant with having carried as well as concealed the pistol. This would be overstraining even the "squint" doctrine announced in Re Avdalas, 10 Cal. App. 507, 102 Pac. 674.

The complaint in the Matter of the Application of Winston, 160 Cal. 18, 116 Pac. 390, contained every element of the statute. As the opinion points out, it clearly charged a simple [12] Claiming that they were a part of the circumstances surrounding the execution of the contract and admissible under sections 1856 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, appellant sought to introduce evidence of various conversations; but respondent's objection thereto was sustained. One of these questions, relating to a change that was made in the written contract providing that the fruit should be weighed "at the drier" instead of "on the river bank," was as follows: "At that time, Mr. Herspring, did you have any conversation with Mr. Edinger about that change?" Upon answering, "I did," he was asked the following question, to which an objection was sustained: "What was that conversation?" He sought also unsuccessfully to introduce evidence of a conversation which he had with one of the directors of plaintiff after the execution of said contract with reference to the quantity of fruit which he could handle. These conversations were not admissible, of course, to vary the terms of the written instrument, and they could be received as evidence of the surrounding circumstances only to aid in the proper construction of the written contract (section 1860, Code Civ. Proc.) if there were any uncertainty therein. We think the situation was not such as to admit of this extrinsic evidence.

[13] Moreover, since the materiality of the proposed evidence was not apparent, appellant should have stated what he proposed to prove in order that the court might be fully advised of his position. We may add that there was and is no contention that any mistake was made in the written contract, that any fraud was practiced in its execution, or that a different contract was afterward substituted for it. To the suggestion that all fruit should have been delivered as appellant was able to take care of it, it is sufficient to answer that, if he so desired, he should have so provided in the contract. No advantage was taken of him in its terms, and, if he suffered loss through his misfortune, plaintiff was not responsible. Besides, it is clear that there could be no appreciable delay in the delivery as the pears demanded immediate attention. It is worthy of observation also that since the transportation from the river bank was under the direction and control of appellant, he could regulate the receipt of the fruit at the drier as far as its condition would permit.

We may not have noticed specifically all the points made in the able and exhaustive brief of appellant, but from a careful examination of the record we are convinced that we are not authorized to interfere with the decision of the trial court.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

60 Cal. App. 581

AROCENA v. SAWYER. (Civ. 4026.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑105, 110—Orders denying nonsuit and new trial not appealable.

Neither an order denying a motion for nonsuit nor one denying a motion for a new trial is appealable.

2. Partnership 🔑258(6, 7) — Surviving partner may be sued on claim against partnership without joining personal representatives of deceased partner.

In actions upon claims against the partnership, the surviving partner may be sued alone, without joining the executors or administrators of the deceased partner or alleging the presentation of any claim against his estate.

3. Payment 🔑57—Complaint for services held not demurrable as failing to allege nonpayment.

In an action against a surviving partner upon claims for services rendered which had been assigned to plaintiff, that the complaint alleged that a certain sum was due, owing, and wholly unpaid "from defendant to the plaintiff herein," held not to make it demurrable on the ground that it failed to negative the possibility that the claim might have been paid by the partnership or by the deceased partner; the complaint containing another allegation that no part of the sum "has been paid."

4. Evidence 🔑354(24)—Books of partnership kept by plaintiff as defendant's agent held admissible in action for wages.

In an action on assigned claims for services brought against a surviving partner by the foreman of the partnership, books of account containing statements of amounts due for such services, kept by plaintiff as defendant's agent, were admissible as admissions against interest.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1052(6)—Admission of evidence, if error, harmless where adverse judgment not rendered.

Where, in an action for services brought by a foreman, the books of the employer kept by the foreman as defendant's agent were introduced as admissions of the employer against interest, if error, the error was harmless to defendant appellant, since judgment went against plaintiff on the particular claim.

6. Evidence 🔑354(24)—Account books kept by plaintiff as defendant's agent held admissible in evidence in suit for wages.

Where claims for services against a partnership were assigned to plaintiff, who had been defendant's foreman and who had kept defendant's books, such books were admissible in evidence as documents kept by the partnership, and as admissions against interest.

7. Limitation of actions 🔑183(3)—Statute of limitations held insufficiently pleaded.

Where in an action for wages, the answer failed to allege that the cause of action accrued more than the statutory period of time prior to the filing of the original complaint, plea being couched in language speaking not from the date of the original complaint, but from the time of the filing of the answer, held insufficient to set up the bar of the statute of limitations, either as an attempt to plead facts constituting the bar or as an attempt to plead in the manner permitted by Code Civ. Proc. § 458.

8. Limitation of actions 🔑197(1)—Evidence held to disclose existence of "mutual account" not barred by four-year statute.

In a suit on assigned claims for services rendered by ranch hands for a partnership, evidence as to credits for merchandise sold by defendant to plaintiff's assignors and as to cash payments made by the employer to them held to disclose the existence of a mutual, open, and current account not barred by Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 2, and section 344, providing that suit must be brought on such an account within four years from the date of the last item; an account being "mutual" if there be a mutual credit founded on a subsisting debt on the other side, or if there be an agreement, express or implied, for a set-off of mutual debts.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Mutual Accounts.]

9. Appeal and error 🔑1071(6)—Failure to find on issues not necessary for judgment entered held not reversible error.

Where the court has made fact findings upon all the issues necessary to sustain the judgment as entered, that no findings were made upon entirely separate and distinct issues which might have been the basis of another and different judgment, but, which, if found upon, could not have affected the judgment actually rendered, cannot justify a reversal.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence cannot be disturbed.

A decision of the trial court based upon conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

11. Limitation of actions 🔑94—Bar as to one partner held not a bar as to another partner who has been absent from state.

That one of two partners continues to reside in the state until a right of action against him on the partnership debt is barred does not affect the liability of the other partner who has been absent from the state, since the statute of limitations is a defense peculiar to him who pleads it; its effect being not to satisfy the debt, but to bar the remedy.

12. Interest 🔑39(1) — Interest on unpaid wages due monthly properly allowed from termination of employment.

In an action for services rendered as a cook at an agreed wage per month, the account not being a mutual, open, and current one, but the obligation to pay becoming absolute at the end of each month, interest might properly be allowed on the principal found due on the claim at the legal rate from the date of termination of her employment.

13. Interest 🔑39(5)—Interest on open and mutual account for wages runs only from time of striking balance.

Where the amount due for services was due as upon a mutual, open, and current account, interest is payable only from the day on which the balance is ascertained, under the express provisions of Civ. Code, § 1917.

14. Interest 🔑39(5)—Statutory provision as to interest held inapplicable to recovery upon open account.

Civ. Code, § 3287, providing that persons entitled to recover damages certain or capable of being made certain by calculation, the right to recover which is fixed upon a particular day, are entitled to recover interest from such day, held to have no application to an action to recover upon an open account.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; M. W. Conkling, Judge.

Action by A. Arocena against Edward A. Sawyer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Frank Birkhauser, of El Centro, for appellant.

B. C. Nichols, of San Diego, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. [1] This is an action to recover for services which plaintiff and his assignors—certain ranch hands—performed for a partnership of which defendant is the surviving member. Judgment passed for plaintiff on four of the assigned claims. Defendant appeals from that judgment and likewise from an order denying his motion for a nonsuit and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. As neither of these last-mentioned orders is appealable, the attempted appeals therefrom will be dismissed.

[2] Defendant and one Leopold Alexander had been partners. The partnership, which had been engaged in farming a ranch in Imperial county, was dissolved by the death of Alexander on February 12, 1916. Plaintiff brought the action against defendant, the surviving member of the firm, pursuant to the rule that in actions upon claims against a partnership the surviving partner may be sued alone, without joining the executors or administrators of the deceased partner or alleging the presentation of any claim against his estate. Corson v. Berson, 86 Cal. 433, 25 Pac. 7; Friermuth v. Friermuth, 46 Cal. 42; West Coast L. Co. v. Apfield, 86 Cal. 335, 24 Pac. 993; Minifie v. Rowley, 187 Cal. 481, 202 Pac. 673.

Plaintiff did work as foreman of the ranch between November 1, 1911, and August 15, 1916. He was employed in that capacity by Alexander some years prior to the latter's death. The assigned claims upon which plaintiff recovered judgment are those of Mariana Arocena, who cooked for the men employed on the ranch, and Juan Arguedas, Antonio Etchebarren, and Juan Louissena, ranch hands employed to do work on and about the ranch. Another laborer, Frank Arocena, did work on the ranch for the partnership; but the court found that he did not assign his claim to plaintiff.

The action was tried upon plaintiff's amended complaint and defendant's answer thereto. The amended complaint contains 22 separate counts. In counts 1 and 12 plaintiff alleges that there is a balance due him for his own personal services as ranch foreman and for moneys advanced by him for the partnership. The court found that all of this alleged balance had been paid, and, accordingly, plaintiff did not recover anything therefor. For this reason there may not be a reversal unless there be some error affecting the judgment on the four assigned claims.

In counts 6, 11, 17, and 22 plaintiff alleged facts showing the amount due for services performed by Frank Arocena; but as the court found that this claim was not assigned to plaintiff, and for that reason rendered no judgment thereon, we are not concerned here with the cause of action alleged in each of those counts. In counts 2 to 5, inclusive, it is alleged that plaintiff's four assignors, Mariana Arocena, Juan Arguedas, Antonio Etchebarren, and Juan Louissena, performed certain services at the request of the partnership of a certain "agreed value," no part of which has been paid, and that an open book account of the same was kept. Counts 7 to 10, inclusive, are like counts 2 to 5, except that they make no mention of any open book account. In counts 13 to 16, inclusive, plaintiff sues in quantum meruit to recover the reasonable value of the work alleged to have been done by his four assignors. In counts 18 to 21, inclusive, plaintiff, suing upon his four assigned claims, alleges that a balance of account in favor of each of his assignors was struck and stated.

The court made findings in favor of plaintiff upon counts 2 to 5, inclusive, 7 to 10, inclusive, and 13 to 16, inclusive. That is, as to plaintiff's four assignors the court found that each rendered services for the partnership of a certain "agreed value"; that an "open book account" of the services was kept; and that the services were of a certain "reasonable value"—the amount found to be the "reasonable value" in each instance corresponding with the amount found to be the "agreed value." No findings were made on counts 18 to 22, inclusive.

Appellant claims: (1) That the court erred in overruling his demurrer to the amended complaint; (2) that error was committed in admitting certain of plaintiff's exhibits; (3) that the evidence shows that each cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations; (4) that through the court's failure to make findings on the issues presented by counts 18 to 22, inclusive, appellant has suffered prejudicial error; (5) that certain of the findings are not supported by the evidence; and (6) that it was error to allow interest upon the assigned claims—the only claims upon which plaintiff recovered judgment.

[3] There is no merit in the point that defendant's demurrer was improperly overruled. In each count there is a paragraph wherein it is alleged that—

> "The defendant, as one of the partners of said partnership, has not paid plaintiff the sum of [naming the amount sued for], nor any part thereof, and said sum * * * is now due, owing and wholly unpaid from defendant to the plaintiff herein."

This allegation, says appellant, does not negative the possibility that the claim may have been paid by the partnership, or by Alexander, the deceased partner. Wherefore it is argued that the complaint fails to allege nonpayment, and that therefore it does not state a cause of action. But in another paragraph of each count, after alleging the facts which show the precise amount of the balance due to the particular assignor mentioned in the count, it is expressly alleged that "no part" of that sum "has been paid." It is difficult to conceive of a more complete allegation of nonpayment than this. It is a generic and comprehensive allegation which is in no wise inconsistent with the more particular averment to the effect that the claim has not been paid by defendant to plaintiff. There is therefore no inconsistency between the two allegations, and the demurrer was properly overruled.

Plaintiff was allowed to introduce in evidence, over defendant's objections, a certain account book (Plaintiff's Exhibit 1), three time books (Plaintiff's Exhibits 2, 3, and 4), and a sheet of paper containing a statement of certain credits in favor of the partnership (Plaintiff's Exhibit 7). Plaintiff, the foreman of the ranch, kept these books and made this statement as the employee of Sawyer & Alexander. The entries were made by him personally or under his direct supervision. As foreman of the ranch, he had personal knowledge of the matters represented by each and every entry. The books and the statement contain entries showing the amount of the monthly wage of each of plaintiff's assignors and when and how long each worked for Sawyer & Alexander. According to the testimony on behalf of plaintiff, each of his assignors was employed to work on the ranch at a certain agreed monthly wage.

[4-6] Several reasons are urged against the admissibility of these books and the statement of credits. For example, it is urged that not all of the entries were made at the time of the respective transactions, and that therefore the documents could not be received in evidence under the rule which governs the admissibility of a tradesman's book of original entries. Under the view which we take of the case it will not be necessary to consider in detail each of appel lant's objections to the introduction of these exhibits. Plaintiff testified that he made the statement and kept the books as a part of his duties in carrying on the business of the ranch as its foreman; and it seems quite evident that it was a part of his business as ranch foreman to do these things. It is a reasonable inference from all the evidence that he made the statement and kept the books, not for himself, but for his employer, the firm of Sawyer & Alexander, and as its agent. The books and the statement were therefore the books and statement of Sawyer & Alexander. Cormac v. Western White Bronze Co., 77 Iowa, 32, 41 N. W. 480; 22 C. J. 892. As such, their contents were the admissions of Sawyer & Alexander and were admissible in evidence against that firm or either member thereof, like any other admission against interest. "A statement contained in a book entry may amount to an admission, in which case it is, like other admissions, competent evidence against the party by whom or under whose direction the entry was made." 22 C. J. pp. 889, 890. "Where a book containing entries against interest is shown to belong to the party, he will not be heard to object to the form of the book or the manner in which it was kept." 22 C. J. p. 891. Although there is very respectable authority for holding that entries made by a clerk in his favor are admissible against his employer (Cormac v. Western White Bronze Co., supra), we shall assume, for the purpose of this decision only, that in so far as the entries relate to plaintiff's own personal services and to moneys advanced by him to or for the partnership, the books would not have been admissible in his favor unless it were shown that they had been kept by him in all respects in conformity with the rules pertaining to the admissibility of a trader's shop books. But if there was any error in admitting the books and statement as evidence of plaintiff's claim for his own services or for moneys advanced by him, such error was harmless, since as to that claim the judgment went against plaintiff. As to the four assigned claims, the books and the statement without question must be regarded as documents kept by the partnership, and, as admissions against the interest of the partnership, they must be held to be admissible in evidence against the partners, or either of them, regardless of their form or the manner in which they were made or kept. At the time when the entries were made, none of these claims had been assigned to plaintiff. The assignments were not made until after the termination of the employment of the assignors. If, instead of assigning their claims to plaintiff, each of these assignors had brought an action in his or her own name against the partnership, or against the defendant here as the surviving partner, the books which plaintiff had kept for the firm as its employee and trusted agent, and the statement of credits which he had made in the course of his duties as ranch foreman, would have been admissible in favor of each of such laborers as admissions made by the partnership against its interests. The fact that these claims were assigned to plaintiff and that he is suing thereon does not make the documents any the less admissible. There is nothing to indicate that when plaintiff, as the agent of Sawyer & Alexander, made the entries in these documents, he contemplated securing an assignment of the claims to himself. And even if he had had such assignments in mind at the time when he made the book entries and prepared the statement, that fact, we think, would have affected the weight of the documents as evidence rather than their admissibility.

For the foregoing reasons our conclusion is that no reversible error was committed in admitting in evidence the account book, the three time books, and the statement.

Appellant also complains of the admission in evidence of certain other exhibits, but as he has not seen fit to advise us of the reasons for his plaint we do not deem it necessary to consider it.

[7] The bar of the statute of limitations cannot be invoked successfully. In the first place, the defense of the statute is not properly pleaded. The answer does not allege that any of the causes of action accrued more than the statutory period of time prior to the filing of the original complaint. No mention is made of that pleading in the answer, nor is there any reference to the date of the commencement of the action. The plea is couched in such language that it must be held to speak, not from the date of the original complaint, but from the time of the filing of the answer. Eno v. Diefendorf, 102 N. Y. 720, 7 N. E. 798; Smith v. Walker, 1 Wash. (Va.) 135. As an attempt to plead the facts constituting the bar, it is fatally insufficient under all the authorities. For an analogous case, see United States Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Parker, 20 Wyo. 29, 121 Pac. 531. As an attempt to plead the statute in the manner permitted by section 458 of the Code of Civil Prodecure, the answer is so analogous to that which was held to be fatally defective in Manning v. Dallas, 73 Cal. 420, 15 Pac. 34, that it must be held to fall withing the rule of that case. However, since the trial appears to have been conducted in the superior court upon the assumption on both sides that the statute was sufficiently pleaded, we shall consider the merits of appellant's contention that the evidence shows each claim to have been barred before the action was commenced.

As we have pointed out, plaintiff recovered upon four assigned claims—those of Mariana Arocena, Juan Arguedas, Antonio Etchebarren, and Juan Louissena. In suing as the assignee of Arguedas, Etchebarran, and Louissena, plaintiff, in each of three counts, sought to recover a balance due upon an open book account. If the evidence shows that the claim of each of these three assignors was for a balance due on a mutual, open, and current account, giving rise to reciprocal demands between Sawyer & Alexander on the one side and each of these three assignors on the other, then the bar of the statute was not available to appellant until the expiration of four years from the date of the last item in the account. Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 2, and section 344. The action was commenced within that four-year period—at least we assume that it was from certain statements made in appellant's brief, although, as we have said, the original complaint nowhere appears in the record before us. It remains now to consider whether the claim of each of these three assignors is for a balance due on a mutual, open, and current account.

[8] Each of the three last-mentioned assignors performed services for the partnership. Each had agreed to work as a ranch hand for a certain agreed monthly wage. The services rendered by these men, the agreed monthly wages therefor, and the times when they worked, were recorded in the books which plaintiff kept for his employers as their ranch foreman. Each of these three ranch hands was supplied by Sawyer & Alexander with certain articles of merchandise from time to time during the term of his employment. The charges for these articles were entered in the books kept for Sawyer & Alexander by plaintiff. The services of each of these three men continued over a long period of time. It is fairly inferable from the evidence that the amount, it any, which might ultimately be payable to each of these farm laborers, was to be determined after the striking of a balance whereby the firm of Sawyer & Alexander would be properly credited for the items of merchandise. There were some cash payment made on account of the men's services; but there also were, on the credit side of the books, entries crediting the partnership with the merchandise which it supplied from time to time to each of these men. The charges for these articles of merchandise constituted credits on which demands could have been made and suits maintained by Sawyer & Alexander if their ranch hands had not rendered a consideration therefor in the form of continuous services performed by them as workmen on the ranch. In short, the accounts consisted of existing debits on the one side which were credits on the other. There was, we think, an implied understanding that these mutual debts should be satisfied or set off pro tanto between the parties. And it is a fair inference from all the evidence that it was the intention that the account with each of these three workmen should be permitted to run with a view to an ultimate adjustment by the payment of such balance as might be found to be due from the employer, Sawyer & Alexander, to each employee, or from the latter to the former, as might prove to be the case. "Where a system of mutual dealing exists it implies that the parties have mutually consented that each item, in whosesoever favor it may be, shall not constitute an independent debt due immediately, to be paid or enforced at once, but that the items occurring from time to time in favor of the respective parties shall operate as mutual set-offs, and that the shifting balance, when either or both shall call for it, shall be the debt." 17 R. C. L. p. 804. Mutual accounts are made up of matters of set-off. The account is mutual if there be a mutual credit founded on a subsisting debt on the other side, or if there be an agreement, express or implied, for a set-off of mutual debts. Here the accounts, kept with these ranch hands by plaintiff for Sawyer & Alexander, possessed all of the elements necessary to constitute them "mutual, open and current" accounts within the meaning of the authorities. Norton v. Larco, 30 Cal. 126, 89 Am. Dec. 70; Millet v. Bradbury, 109 Cal. 170, 174, 41 Pac. 865; Mercantile Trust Co. v. Doe, 26 Cal. App. 246, 253, 146 Pac. 692; Sugar Loaf O. G. Ass'n v. Skewes, 47 Cal. App. 470, 474, 190 Pac. 1076. And since the action was commenced within four years from the date of the last item on each account, it follows that it was not barred as to any of the claims upon which plaintiff sues as the assignee of Juan Arguedas, Antonio Etchebarren, and Juan Louissena.

The claim which was assigned to plaintiff by Mariana Arocena differs from that of each of the other assignors in that no mutual, open, and current account was kept with her. The account which was kept with this woman shows no entries debiting her with merchandise. As to her claim the lower court, in accord with appellant's contention, ruled that subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure governed, and that therefore the monthly wage earned by her under her oral contract to perform services as a cook for the hired hands was barred at the end of two years from and after each month's work. It accordingly was held that the wages earned by Mariana Arocena for seven and one-half months were barred by the statute, thus reducing by $225 the amount of her claim. Appellant has not seen fit to point out wherein, if at all, the amount adjudged to be due on this claim, after making the deduction aforesaid, is greater than it should be, and we therefore are spared the pains of further consideration of the effect of the statute of limitations upon the claim assigned by this woman.

Our conclusion on this branch of the appeal is that the statute of limitations has not tolled any part of the amount for which plaintiff recovered judgment.

[9, 10] Appellant cannot complain of the failure to make findings on the issues presented by counts 18 to 22, inclusive—the counts wherein it is alleged that a balance was struck and an account stated. By making findings upon all of the issues presented by counts 2 to 5, inclusive, 7 to 10, inclusive, and 13 to 16, inclusive, the trial court found upon all of the issues necessary to sustain the judgment as entered. Therefore the fact that no findings were made upon entirely separate and distinct issues which might have been the basis of another and different judgment, but which, if found upon, could not have affected the judgment actually rendered, cannot justify a reversal. Hooker v. Thomas, 86 Cal. 177, 24 Pac. 941.

To avoid the effect of the statute of limitations, plaintiff alleged in his complaint that appellant, the surviving partner of the firm of Sawyer & Alexander, was absent from the state of California at all times between November 1, 1911, and the commencement of the action. The trial court found that appellant was absent from the state at least one-half of the time from May 31, 1914, to May 31, 1918; the latter date being that when, as we understand it, the action was commenced. It now is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to support this finding. There is no merit in the claim. The most that can be said in favor of appellant is that the evidence is in substantial conflict on the subject. But under the oft-repeated rule that conflicts in the evidence are for the determination of the jury or of the trial court sitting without a jury, we cannot disturb the decision of the lower court.

[11] The fact that Alexander continued to be a resident of this state until the right of action against him on the partnership debt was barred does not affect the liability of the other partner—the defendant here—who, according to the findings of the trial court, was absent from the state at least one-half of the four-year period immediately preceding the commencement of the action. The statute of limitations is a defense peculiar to him who pleads it. It is a personal privilege of the debtor, to be asserted or waived at his option. Its effect is not to satisfy the debt, but to bar the remedy. There is therefore no reason why the defense of the statute which permits the personal discharge of a partner who continues to reside in the state should be available to the one whose absence from the state has suspended the operation of the statute as to him. Harrison v. McCormick, 122 Cal. 651, 653, 55 Pac. 592; Caswell v. Engelmann, 31 Wis. 93; Spaulding v. Ludlow Woolen Mill, 36 Vt. 150, 158. See, also, Denny v. Smith, 18 N. Y. 567, and Town v. Washburn, 14 Minn. 268 (Gil. 199) 100 Am. Dec. 219.

[12] The only other point worthy of mention is the question of interest. Appellant cannot complain of the trial court's allowance of interest on the claim assigned to plaintiff by Mariana Arocena who worked on the ranch as a cook at an agreed wage of $30 a month. As we have pointed out, her claim was not based on any balance shown by a mutual, open, and current account. The obligation to pay her the agreed monthly wage became absolute at the end of each month. The amount was certain. The trial court allowed interest on the principal found to be due on her claim at the legal rate from the date of the termination of her employment. This was in appellant's favor, for it was less than Mariana Arocena, or rather plaintiff, as her assignee, was entitled to receive as interest.

[13, 14] As to the question of interest on each of the three other assigned claims, the situation is unlike that presented by Mariana Arocena's claim. While each of these three other ranch hands worked for an agreed monthly wage, the amounts whereof appeared on the debit side of the books kept for the partnership by plaintiff as the ranch foreman, the moneys thus earned as wages were offset by cross-demands for merchandise furnished by Sawyer & Alexander from time to time during the mutual course of dealing between each of these claimants and the partnership. The account kept with each of these workmen appears to have been kept open, in contemplation of further dealings to be evidenced by future cross-entries. And even if we were to assume that the partnership or either member thereof would be concluded from questioning the accuracy of the cross-entries which represented the items of merchandise and their value, the workmen to whom the merchandise was supplied from time to time most certainly would not be concluded by such entries. They did not make them, nor were they made by their agent. Our attention has not been called to any evidence tending to show that the charges for the merchandise, as shown by the book entries, were ever fixed by contract. These three ranch hands were therefore free to question the amount of each and every charge for merchandise—not alone the amount and character of the articles furnished, but also the value thereof as shown by the book entries. We think that in such a case section 1917 of the Civil Code applies, namely, that interest is payable only from the day on which the balance is ascertained. But the accounts were never settled and a balance was never ascertained by agreement of the parties. Indeed, the trial court declined to find that a balance was struck and an account stated, though that issue was directly tendered by four counts in the complaint. Instead of finding that an account was stated, the trial court found, in substance and effect, that each of these three assigned claims was the balance shown by an open book account. And, indeed, respondent himself, in order to avoid the bar of the statute of limitations, has argued that each of these three assigned claims is the balance shown by a mutual, open and current account. Section 3287 of the Civil Code has no application to an action to recover upon an open account. Heald v. Hendy, 89 Cal. 632, 27 Pac. 67. Under section 1917, which is the section applicable here, the balance must be ascertained by agreement of the parties or by the judgment of the court, in order to bear interest. Easterbrook v. Farquharson, 110 Cal. 311, 316, 42 Pac. 811; Erickson v. Stockton, etc., R. R. Co., 148 Cal. 206, 82 Pac. 961; American-Hawaian, etc., Co. v. Butler, 17 Cal. App. 764, 770, 121 Pac. 709. As no balance was ever ascertained by agreement of the parties, it was error to award interest prior to the date of the entry of judgment on the assigned claims of Arguedas, Etchebarren, and Louissena. The amount thus improperly allowed as interest on these three claims is $630.63.

There are no other points worthy of consideration.

The judgment is modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $630.63. As so modified, the judgment is affirmed. The appeal from the order denying the motion for a nonsuit and the appeal from the order denying a new trial are dismissed.

1. Contracts 🔑198(1)—Agreement for monthly payments as work progressed held not to require completion of work as condition to receiving payment therefor.

A contract for leveling certain land, which provided for monthly payments on the tenth of each month "for the work done in the previous calendar month," required the contractor to be paid for work done each month whether the same did or did not involve a completion of the work within the requirements of the contract.

While a practical construction of a writing by the parties thereto is not conclusive as to the correct construction of the instrument, such construction is entitled to great, if not controlling, weight in determining its proper interpretation, where the language requiring interpretation may be characterized by more or less ambiguity or uncertainty.

3. Work and labor 🔑14(2)—Failure to make monthly payments under contract to level land held to justify refusal to proceed with work and suit for quantum meruit.

Where a contract for leveling certain land provided for monthly payments as the work progressed, failure of defendant to make monthly payments held a breach which justified the contractor in refusing to proceed further, and entitled him to proceed against defendant upon a quantum meruit for the reasonable value of the labor and services performed.

4. Evidence 🔑523—Expert evidence as to value of services sued for under quantum meruit held proper.

In an action upon a quantum meruit for work done in leveling certain land, it was proper to prove reasonable value of the labor performed by opinions of qualified experts.

5. Work and labor 🔑29(2)—Plaintiff suing on quantum meruit after breach by defendant held not limited to contract price.

Where plaintiff performed services under a contract for leveling certain land, but defendant breached the contract by failing to make monthly payments stipulated for, whereupon plaintiff rescinded and sued on a quantum meruit, plaintiff was not limited to the contract price as the measure of what he was entitled to recover.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1073(7)—Allowance of recovery in excess of contract price on quantum meruit held harmless.

In an action on quantum meruit to recover for services performed in leveling certain land under a contract which had been breached by defendant, allowing proof of the reasonable value of the work in excess of the contract price, if error, held without prejudice where the recovery was less than the contract price.

7. Contracts 🔑198(1)—Method of determining maximum deviation allowable in leveling land under contract stated.

Where a contract for leveling certain land provided that "each check should be graded to a smooth and uniform surface, and all holes shall be filled to the level of the check, and all knolls shall be cut down to the level of the check with a maximum deviation of two-tenths of one foot," the maximum deviation was to be ascertained with reference to a datum line, and not with regard to the distance from the highest to the lowest points in different parts of the land.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1001(1)—Verdict based on findings sustained by evidence will not be disturbed.

In an action on a quantum meruit to recover for services performed in leveling land, where there was evidence justifying a finding that the work had been done in substantial compliance with the contract, a verdict based thereon will not be disturbed on appeal.

9. Work and labor 🔑14(2)—Conditional offer to pay held not an offer of payment within contract.

Where a contract providing for leveling certain land contemplated monthly payments, which defendant neglected to make under the claim that the contract had not been complied with by plaintiff, an offer by defendant to advance the amount of money representing the deferred payments provided plaintiff would sign a written acknowledgment that the work had not been completed in accordance with the contract held not to constitute an offer of payment, and its refusal would not bar plaintiff's right to abandon the contract and sue upon a quantum meruit if he elected to do so.

10. Arbitration and award 🔑9—Arbitration agreement held not condition precedent to suit on quantum meruit upon rescission of contract.

Where a contract for leveling certain land provided for a settlement of difficulties by means of arbitration, an offer by defendant to submit to arbitration, and plaintiff's refusal to accept the offer, held not to impair plaintiff's right to rescind and abandon the contract, the contract not making the arbitration provision a condition precedent to the right to demand and receive the progress payments provided for, and payment of which had been neglected by defendant.

11. Witnesses 🔑379(2)—Contradictory statements held admissible for purposes of impeachment.

In an action on a quantum meruit for services performed in leveling certain land under a contract which had been rescinded by plaintiff, evidence that defendant's president had stated to a third party that the entire land had been leveled and checked held admissible for the purpose of impeachment; defendant claiming that the work had not been completed in accordance with the contract.

12. Appeal and error 🔑854(4)—Admission of evidence upon erroneous theory not prejudicial where admissible on any theory.

Where testimony is admissible on any theory or for any purpose, its admission will not be considered prejudicial merely because it was allowed upon an erroneous theory.

13. Trial 🔑206—Instruction as to effect of admissions held not sustained by evidence.

In an action on quantum meruit to recover for work done in leveling certain land claimed by defendant not to have complied with the specifications of the contract, evidence as to an admission by defendant's president that the land had been leveled and checked, admissible only for the purposes of impeachment, did not warrant an instruction that whatever a party voluntarily admits to be true, though the admission be contrary to his interest, may be reasonably taken for the truth.

14. Appeal and error 🔑1170(9)—Instruction not sustained by evidence held harmless.

An instruction that whatever a party voluntarily admits to be true, though the admission may be contrary to his interest, may be reasonably taken for the truth, erroneous because not sustained by the evidence, held harmless in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, requiring reversal for erroneous admission of evidence only where it would result in a miscarriage of justice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by C. H. Laiblin against the San Joaquin Agricultural Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Everts, Ewing & Wild and T. M. Stuart, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Fee & Ring, of Madera, and Gallaher, Simpson & Hays, of Fresno, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendant the sum of $18,991.69, claimed to be due him for work or services performed by him for the defendant in building levees and reservoirs upon and leveling and checking certain lands owned by the latter, and situated in the county of Madera. The services for which the plaintiff here seeks compensation were performed in pursuance of the terms of a written contract entered into by and between the parties to this action on the 17th day of January, 1920. The aid of a jury was invoked, and a verdict returned in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $10,071.69. Judgment was entered accordingly, and from said judgment the defendant appeals.

The lands upon which the services were to be performed are, for the purposes of the contract, subdivided into three different tracts, and designated in the agreement as tracts 1, 2, and 3. Tract 1 contains 100 acres, more or less, tract 2, 110 acres, more or less, and tract 3, 480 acres, more or less.

The provisions of the contract important to the present inquiry may summarily be stated as follows:

That the work was to be done according to a certain diagram "on the plats * * * of said land, prepared by the first party" (defendant). That the plaintiff was to furnish his own equipment, machinery, etc., and help for doing the work. That the defendant was to pay the plaintiff for the services performed as follows: For leveling and checking said lands, $30 per acre; for the construction of certain of said levees, ditches, and reservoirs, 25 cents per cubic yard; and for the construction of one particular reservoir 30 cents per cubic yard.

It is further provided in the contract:

That "each check shall be proven level by flooding the same with water, and that, if, after said flooding, any check does not comply with the specifications of this contract, it shall be releveled by the second party at his own cost and expense until it does comply with the requirements of the specifications of the contract. The work of flooding shall be done by said first party, but it is further understood and agreed that the work of proving said checks shall not be done so as to delay second party from undertaking other work after he has completed this contract, or delay the second party from moving his outfit, and, if such work does or will cause such delay, then it is understood that the last 50 acres to be tested and proved shall be tested by surveying the same instead of by flooding."

It is further provided:

That there shall be made by the defendant to the plaintiff progress payments which must be made not later than the 10th day of each month for the work done in the previous calendar month; that "the amount of said work during any month to be settled by statement presented by said second party to first party and by said first party checked and approved, but it is further expressly understood and agreed that the said first party shall retain 10 per cent. of the payments due for each month's work until the final completion of the work, and thereafter until satisfactory evidence of the payment of all claims for labor and material has been presented by said second party to first party, and said 10 per cent. shall be paid to second party upon the expiration of the time allowed by law for filing liens or before said time, provided that the second party presents to the first party satisfactory evidence that that all claims for labor and material have been fully paid."

By the contract the first party reserves the right to pay out of the said 10 per cent. any claims for labor and material duly presented to it and not contested by said second party, the same to be deducted out of the amount remaining due to second party. It was agreed that the second party shall proceed within 10 days after the execution of the contract with the performance of all the work set forth and specified in said agreement, "and to constantly employ for this purpose not less than 60 horses or mules and a sufficient and ample supply of drivers for the same, and to use and employ in said work such other equipment as may be usual or proper in the performance of the work specified in this contract, and to keep at least 60 head of stock constantly employed on said work, so far as the weather will permit, until the work called for in this contract is entirely completed." The contract proceeds:

"It is further mutually understood and agreed that any dispute between the parties hereto arising from any matter covered by this contract shall be submitted to a board of arbitration for determination, said board to consist of three (3) members, one to be selected by each of the parties hereto and the said two arbitrators to select the third."

Other provisions of the agreement will be hereafter referred to, if necessary to the discussion of the points presented for decision.

The plaintiff on the 25th day of January, 1920, proceeded to the execution of the terms of said contract, and remained on the lands with his equipment until May 5, 1920, when he ceased further work, abandoned the contract, and removed all his horses, machinery, and other equipment from the premises. All the work done by him in pursuance of the terms of the contract was upon tract 3, no work having been done by him on tracts 1 and 2.

The amended complaint is in two counts, the first cast in the form of a common count, as upon a quantum meruit. In said count it is alleged that the plaintiff within "two years last past, at the special instance and request of defendant corporation, did furnish said defendant with work, labor, and service in the leveling and checking of certain lands belonging to defendant and in the construction of certain levees, ditches, and reservoirs thereupon," etc., which work, labor, and services, it is alleged, were then and there and now are of the reasonable market value of $24,643.05. It is further alleged that the defendant has paid upon said amount the sum of $6,128.31 only, and that there now remains owing, due, and unpaid the difference between the last-mentioned sum and the sum sued for, to wit, $18,514.74, which, it is alleged, the defendant has refused to pay to plaintiff although often requested to do so. The second count is upon the contract, the substance of which and the refusal of the defendant to comply with its terms are pleaded and alleged. It is unnecessary to reproduce herein the facts set forth in the second count, since the plaintiff was required, on the opening of the trial to make an election as between the two counts of his complaint upon which he intended to rely, and thereupon he elected to rely upon the first or the common count. This eliminated from the case the second count of the complaint, and therefore renders said count a matter of no consequence in the consideration of this appeal.

Copy of the written contract between the parties was attached to and made a part of the complaint, and also with the amended complaint the plaintiff served and filed a bill of particulars, specifying the items making up the general sum for which he here sues. This bill of particulars included, of course, the notation of a credit of $6,128.31, paid by the defendant to the plaintiff.

The defendant interposed a demurrer to the amended complaint upon general and special grounds, and the same was overruled by the court. Thereupon defendant filed an answer, and also a cross-complaint. The answer consists of denials and admissions of certain of the allegations of the complaint. The cross-complaint charges that the plaintiff failed in a number of enumerated particulars to comply with the terms of the contract. Among the assignments of the default of the plaintiff in this respect are these:

That the plaintiff at all times during the period that he performed work upon the lands under the contract had less than 60 head of horses or mules working upon the same; that he failed to complete the work of leveling and checking the land and constructing the ditches and reservoirs according to the terms of the contract, and that he did not finish or complete any of the work called for by the agreement; that prior to the execution of said contract between the parties hereto the said lands of cross-complainant required checks, levees, reservoirs, and leveling, so that cross-complainant could use the same to produce alfalfa successfully, "and this defendant fully advised the plaintiff that the purpose for which it desired to have said lands leveled and checked, and the purpose for which it desired to employ the said plaintiff to do all the work set forth in said contract, was to prepare said lands and put the same in a condition so that the defendant could raise alfalfa successfully thereon, and that the said plaintiff signed said contract and commenced said work, knowing full well that such was the purpose of the said work, and also knowing full well that, if the said lands were not leveled and checked, and if the said ditches, levees, and reservoirs were not completed in accordance with the terms of said contract, the said defendant would be unable to use its said lands to produce alfalfa successfully thereon." It is further alleged that, by reason of the failure of the plaintiff to level and check the said lands and to construct the ditches, levees, and reservoirs called for by the contract, "and by reason of his failing to furnish the number of mules and men specified therein, and to comply with the terms and conditions set forth in said contract, defendant herein has been damaged by reason of said lands not being so leveled and checked, ditches constructed and reservoirs built, * * * in that defendant has been unable to raise any crops of alfalfa on any of the land covered by said contract, and the defendant's said lands are not in the condition for planting as they would have been in were said contract complied with, and hence the defendant has lost the rental value thereof, all to its damage in the sum of $30,000." It is alleged that the defendant has been damaged in the sum of $17,000 because of the failure of the plaintiff to comply with the terms and the conditions of said contract, which sum of $17,000, it is alleged "it would cost said defendant, according to the amount provided in said contract, to complete the work which said plaintiff herein has refused and neglected to so complete all in accordance with the said contract." The defendant further alleges that it is willing and able to fully pay to the plaintiff for all work and service completed and rendered by him in accordance with the terms and the conditions of the said contract. It is further alleged that the "defendant did, in writing, prior to the said plaintiff removing his stock and implements from said land, and prior to his ceasing work thereon, and after demands had been made upon the defendant by plaintiff for moneys which defendant claims and alleges herein are not due from defendant to plaintiff, offer to submit, in accordance with the terms and the conditions contained in said contract, the controversy between the plaintiff and the defendant, to arbitration, and in so making said offer in writing this plaintiff refused to submit the same to arbitration."

The plaintiff filed an answer to the cross-complaint, admitting the execution of the contract, and that the work performed by him was undertaken by him by virtue of and in accordance with the terms and the conditions of said contract, and denying that he breached said contract as alleged in the cross-complaint. Paragraph II of the answer states in detail the grounds upon which plaintiff refused to proceed with the work and demanded payment for the labor performed by him under the contract up to the time of the abandonment thereof. It is therein alleged, in substance, that the plaintiff, on the 1st day of March, 1920, presented the defendant a statement in writing setting forth in detail the amount of work done by plaintiff in the months of January and February, 1920, payment therefor being due, under the contract, on the 10th day of March, 1920; that defendant did not pay for said work until after the 19th day of March, 1920, at which time said payment was made; that plaintiff thereafter notified defendant in writing that he did not consider himself required to proceed with the said work, unless defendant furnished plaintiff with security for future payments as required by the contract; that no such security was ever furnished by defendant. The answer proceeds to allege that a statement in writing was presented to defendant on the 1st day of April, 1920, showing the work done in the month of March of that year, but, although the payment for the work so shown to have been done was not paid on the 10th day of April, 1920, at which time it became due, the amount due for said work has not since been paid plaintiff, and that defendant has at all times refused, and "still refuses," to pay for the work so shown to have been done; that plaintiff continued work under the contract until the latter part of April, 1920, when he presented defendant a statement of work done in the month of April, 1920, and also demanded of plaintiff payment for the work done in March, 1920; that defendant refused, "and still refuses," to pay for the work done in either the month of March or the month of April, and failed to furnish plaintiff security as by him demanded; that, in the latter part of April, 1920, plaintiff ceased to perform work under the contract, and made preparations for moving his equipment from the premises; that the offer of defendant to plaintiff to arbitrate their differences was not made until after the former had ceased doing work under the contract, and had made preparations to move, and had actually commenced moving, his equipment from the premises referred to in the contract; that defendant was, during all of said times, familiar with the demand and claim of plaintiff, but never informed the latter "wherein it differed with (from) said plaintiff" as to said demand and claim. It is further alleged that, after discontinuing said work as aforesaid, and before any offer was made to arbitrate by defendant to plaintiff, the latter notified defendant that he rescinded the contract, and demanded of defendant payment in full for all work done for which payment had not been made, as indicated by the written statements of the same presented to the defendant by plaintiff.

There are some 11 or 12 points specifically urged in support of a reversal, but most of these are subsidiary to what is, in fact, the main or principal proposition, to wit, that the verdict is insufficiently supported. The solution of this proposition hinges, to some extent, upon a construction of certain provisions of the contract.

The specific contentions of the defendant may be condensed as follows: That the work for which plaintiff demanded payment, as also was true as to the work for which he had already been paid, was not done in accordance with the specifications of the contract; that the plaintiff, although demanded by the defendant to complete the work thus far done in conformity with the specifications and requirements of the contract, refused to do so; that the defendant offered to pay plaintiff on April 10th for the work done in the month of March, as shown by the statement presented on the first of April, but the latter refused to accept the same; that the plaintiff refused to present proper statements of the work claimed to have been done by him. It is insisted that, for all these reasons, the plaintiff breached the contract and, consequently, without justification or right rescinded and abandoned the same. Upon these propositions it is contended and argued that it was not competent for the plaintiff to declare on a common count or quantum meruit, and that the court, having permitted evidence to be introduced on the theory that the action was properly brought upon a quantum meruit, erroneously allowed evidence as to the reasonable value of the work done by the plaintiff, or without regard to the contract prices, the contention being in this connection that, having himself violated the terms of the agreement, whatever compensation or damages the plaintiff might be entitled to recover were to be determined solely upon the basis of the contract prices.

In addition to the above points it is contended that the court allowed the plaintiff to prove a certain admission made by the defendant's president, J. W. Goodwin, upon the erroneous theory that such admission involved a declaration against interest. There are also some other points made by the defendant to which we will give brief attention.

As hitherto stated, the plaintiff, in the latter part of January, 1920, assembled upon the premises which were to be improved under the contract the necessary equipment for the execution of the terms thereof, and started work thereon; that, owing to the fact that the plaintiff commenced the work in the latter part of January, there was comparatively little work done during that month, and that because of that fact he presented no statement to defendant disclosing the amount of work done until the 2d day of March, 1920, when he presented a statement which covered all the work done during the months of January and February, particularizing therein the character and amount of work done. This statement showed that the total amount of work done in the months of January and February equaled, when measured in money, the sum of $6,811.40. Against this was a debit of $1,108.31 for approximately 44½ tons of hay furnished the plaintiff by defendant, and also deducted therefrom was the 10 per cent. which the contract provides should be retained by the defendant for the protection of itself against liens for labor, material, etc. Said statement was checked and approved by the defendant's engineer, and the sum shown by the same to be due the plaintiff as a progress or a monthly payment was paid on the 19th day of March, 1920. Because of the fact that the defendant failed to make the payment shown to be due by said statement on the 10th day of March, on which day in each month the contract provides progress payments shall be made, the plaintiff demanded of the defendant in writing that it forthwith furnish him with security for such future progress payments as might become due, and that unless it did furnish such security the plaintiff would not consider himself obligated further to proceed with the work called for by the contract. No such security was furnished by the defendant at any time.

On the 1st day of April, 1920, the plaintiff prepared and presented a statement in writing to defendant disclosing the amount and character of work done in the month of March of that year. The defendant, claiming that the work for which such payment was demanded, as well as portions of the work done in the months of January and February for which payment had already been made, was not done in accordance with the specifications of the contract, and also claiming that the amount paid to the plaintiff for the work done in the months of January and February was in excess of that to which the plaintiff was rightfully entitled, refused to pay the plaintiff the amount shown to be due in the statement presented by the latter for work done in the month of March. This led to a controversy between the plaintiff on the one side and the president and superintendent of the defendant on the other with regard to whether the work already done by the plaintiff accorded with the specifications and requirements of the contract, the defendant claiming that it had made a water test and had found that the portion of the premises upon which work had been done had not been properly leveled, and that certain levees and a reservoir had not been constructed in conformity with the specifications of the agreement. The plaintiff, while insisting that he was entitled to progress payments, whether the work was or was not completed according to the requirements of the contract, also maintained that the work thus far done had been in all particulars as the contract specified. However, upon insistence by the defendant's agents, plaintiff did certain releveling of the lands upon which he had bestowed labor, but the defendant still maintained that all the land had not been properly leveled, and insisted that the defendant should complete the leveling of so much of the land as he had already bestowed labor upon in that particular before it would pay the demand contained in the statement of March 1st. The plaintiff, in reply to this proposition, stated that he had leveled the land as the contract specified, and that he did not propose to go over it again. He further claimed that, if the land was not leveled as specified in the contract, it was due to the fact that the flooding of the land had caused it to settle in spots. The plaintiff declared that he could not go on with the work unless he was paid the progress payments as prescribed by the contract; that he was compelled to pay for labor and material, and depended upon these payments for the purpose of enabling him to proceed with the work; that unless he paid the men who were employed to assist him in the execution of the contract they would cease working for him. The defendant then proposed to advance the plaintiff as much money as the March statement called for, provided the plaintiff would sign a statement acknowledging that the work done by him down to that time was not completed in accordance with the requirements of the contract. This proposition the plaintiff refused to accede to. The controversy remained unsettled, and the plaintiff, in the hope (so he testified) of reaching a satisfactory settlement with the defendant of the demand contained in the statement of March 1st, remained on the premises with his equipment until the latter part of April, 1920, when, concluding that no settlement would be effected, he began preparations for moving the equipment from the premises and abandoning the contract. About the same time he notified the defendant in writing that he rescinded and had abandoned the contract, and thereafter delivered to the defendant a statement showing the amount of work done during the month of April, and demanding that the same, together with the money due for work done in the month of March, be paid. Either shortly before or after the notice of rescission was served by the plaintiff upon defendant, and while the plaintiff was in the act of moving his equipment from the premises, the defendant made an offer in writing to the plaintiff that the differences between them be submitted to arbitration, in accordance with the provision of the contract stipulating that any dispute arising between the parties from any matter involved in the contract should be submitted to a board of arbitration for determination.

The facts above set forth stand in the record uncontradicted. Evidence of other facts will later be referred to herein as we consider certain points, the solution of which will necessitate such consideration. The proposition which first will be considered involves a determination of the true meaning of the provision of the contract stipulating that payments shall be made to the plaintiff on the 10th day of each month for the work done during the preceding month.

The contract provides, as we have seen, that the monthly payments "shall be made not later than the 10th day of each month for the work done in the previous calendar month." Nowhere does the contract provide in so many words, or in express language, that, before the plaintiff shall be entitled to a monthly or progress payment so provided for, the work shall have been completed—that is, finished in accordance with the specifications and requirements of the contract. It is the position of the defendant, however, that, notwithstanding the contract does not specifically stipulate that the work shall be done in full conformity with its requirements before the plaintiff shall be entitled to progress payments as specified therein, the agreement, nevertheless, clearly contemplates that, before plaintiff shall be entitled to such payments, the latter shall prepare and present to defendant a written statement, which shall be authenticated or checked and approved by the defendant, showing not only the amount of work done, but also that the work has been done in accordance with the specifications and requirements of the contract. In other words the contention is that the plaintiff is not, within the plain contemplation and spirit, if not the letter, of the contract, entitled to be paid for any work done during any month unless it is made to appear that the work thus far done has been finished or completed in substantial compliance with the specifications of the contract. On the other hand, the plaintiff contends that the intention of the parties was that he should be paid for work done each calendar month whether the same did or did not involve a completion of such work within the requirements of the contract, and that the contract so expressly provides.

[1] We are inclined to accept the plaintiff's construction of the contract in the particular here considered. As above stated, the contract does not expressly provide that, as a condition precedent to the right of plaintiff to receive the progress or monthly payments, the work shall be done in accordance with the specifications and requirements of the contract. It is quite obvious that, had such been the intention, the parties would have taken the pains to have expressed it in the contract in language which would have afforded no ground for any possible misunderstanding as to such intention. It would have been a very easy matter thus to have phrased the contract if such had been the meaning which the parties intended to ascribe to it. Moreover, it can readily be understood how such a provision could work to the great disadvantage of the contractor, particularly where, as here, the undertaking involves a vast amount of work and labor and an extensive equipment for the proper performance of the terms of the contract. For illustration, the contractor might, during a month, bestow in a proper way a large amount of work upon the premises to be improved without completing such work as the contract required, and, unless he was a man of ample ready means which he could use for that purpose (and the plaintiff in this case testified that he was not himself able to finance the enterprise or proceed with it without receiving installment payments), he could not go on with the work in the absence of the monthly payments prescribed by the contract to be used in defraying the necessary expense to which he was required to go in the employment of labor and material for the purposes of the undertaking. Or, let it be supposed that it required him a full month to lay the foundation for a levee in one of the checks. This would not be a completion of that particular work according to the requirements of the agreement. Would it be reasonable to hold in such case that the contractor would not be entitled to payment for the work thus done in such month under the provision of the contract stipulating that monthly or progress payments should be made for work done? If so, and he was himself without the financial means to meet the current expenses arising against him by reason of the work, he would be compelled to surrender or abandon the contract, and be left without remuneration for services already rendered, assuming that in such case legally the owner of the premises were not required or obligated to reimburse him for the work so performed. But, however this all may be, the practical construction placed upon the contract by the parties themselves accords with that given it by the plaintiff. While now claiming that the plaintiff did not do the work in the months of January and February in pursuance of the specifications of the contract, the defendant, nevertheless, paid him the installments shown by his statement to be due for said months after approval of the same by its engineer. It is to be assumed that the defendant, having through its engineer examined, checked, and approved the statement presented to it by the plaintiff for work done in the months of January and February, was fully aware, before payment for such work was made, that the work had not been finished as the contract required, assuming, of course, that such was the fact. Thus, as stated, the defendant must be assumed to have understood the provision in question as bearing the meaning given to it by the plaintiff, and that it would not have made the payment on the statement delivered to it by the plaintiff on the 1st of March if it had not been its understanding that the provision, at the time it was inserted in the contract, was intended to convey that meaning.

thorized to proceed against the former upon a quantum meruit for the reasonable value of the labor or services performed, and this brings to mind the distinction between the case of Cox. v. McLaughlin, as reported in 54 Cal. 605, and the present case. In the former case the plaintiff contended that the failure of the defendant to make a progress payment at the time prescribed by the contract amounted to an act on the part of the defendant which prevented the plaintiff from proceeding with the fulfillment of the terms of the contract. The court held that a mere failure to pay the consideration for the work as it progresses, according to the terms of the agreement, had never been held such an act of omission on the part of the defendant as to prevent the other party from completing the contract. In the present case there is no claim, either by averment in the complaint or otherwise, that the failure of the defendant to pay the installment due for work done in the month of March constituted an act which prevented the defendant from proceeding with the completion of the contract. Indeed, that is not the theory of the present action. The action here, as stated, is plainly and clearly one upon a quantum meruit. In other words, it is not an action upon the contract to recover the profits the plaintiff would have made if the work had been completed thereunder. The nature of the action by plaintiff necessarily implies a repudiation of the contract.

[4] The action being upon a quantum meruit, it was proper, of course, to allow evidence as to the reasonable value of the labor performed, and it was competent to prove what was the reasonable value of such labor by the opinions of experts fully qualified to give such testimony. In support of the proposition last stated we refer to the following cases: Cowdery v. McChesney, 124 Cal. 363, 57 Pac. 221; Crusoe v. Clark, 127 Cal. 341, 59 Pac. 700; Mosher v. Lack, 41 Cal. App. 23, 181 Pac. 813.

[5] As to the proposition that the plaintiff is not limited to the contract price as the measure of what he is entitled to recover, where he has rescinded and abandoned the contract because of the breach thereof by the defendant, the rule is as stated in 3 Williston on Contracts, § 1485, as follows:

> "Where the plaintiff's failure to fulfill completely his obligations under the contract is due to the defendant's default, there is no reason for imposing any limitation on the amount which he may recover on a quantum meruit or quantum valebat for what he has done, other than that set by the principles of fair value previously stated. Though the amount or rate of compensation stated in the contract is evidence of this it does not set a conclusive limit on the plaintiff's right."

Again, in section 1459, the same learned author declares:

> "More frequently, however, the plaintiff is allowed to recover the real value of the services, though in excess of the contract price. The later rule seems more in accordance with the theory on which the right of action must be based—that the contract is treated as rescinded," the plaintiff declaring upon a quantum meruit, and not upon the contract.

In Johnston v. Star Bucket Pump Co., 274 Mo. 414, 202 S. W. 1143, the court in treating a proposition similar to the one involved here said:

> "But in a case where the owner violates or breaches the contract, we universally say the plaintiff can elect to sue in quantum meruit rather than for damages on the contract. If he does so sue, the special contract performs no function in that suit. The defendant cannot undertake to limit the recovery by the terms of the contract, because he has breached the contract. To permit him to use his breached contract to limit a recovery against him, would be to pay him a premium for his own wrong. The law does not contemplate such."

See, also, Philadelphia v. Tripple, 230 Pa. 480, 79 Atl. 703; Adams v. Burbank, 103 Cal. 646, 37 Pac. 640; Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 67, 18 Pac. 100, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164.

The foregoing views answer the contention of the defendant that the court erred in admitting evidence of the value of the services of the plaintiff in excess of that fixed by the contract, and in instructing the jury that the contract prices did not constitute the criterion for determining what the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

[6] There is, however, another answer to the proposition last above discussed in the fact that the amount awarded the plaintiff by the jury accords with the prices specified in the contract. We have carefully examined the testimony presented by the plaintiff as to the reasonable value of the services performed, and, without entering into an analysis or an examination in detail herein of said testimony, we may say that it clearly appears therefrom that the amount allowed by the jury is far below what the plaintiff would be entitled to for the work shown to have been done in the months of March and April, even according to the prices specified in the contract. Thus it is clear that, if it were to be conceded that the evidence allowed by the court upon the theory of the reasonable value of the work performed tended to show, or did show, that such reasonable value was in excess of the contract prices, and the admission of such evidence was erroneous, the defendant suffered no injury from the rulings allowing such testimony. The same is true as to the instruction upon that proposition.

But it is contended by the defendant that the notice under date of May 5, 1920, served on it by the plaintiff, shows very clearly that the plaintiff proceeded upon the theory that the work for which he here seeks compensation was completed according to the specifications of the contract. It is to be admitted that said notice does so indicate; but we cannot perceive what difference it would make so far as the result to be arrived at in this case is concerned. Even if the work was completed as the contract specifies, the defendant having breached the contract, the plaintiff would be at liberty either to sue upon the contract and recover according to the contract prices or upon a quantum meruit for the reasonable value of the completed work, it being readily conceivable that a portion of the work finished as the contract specifies might be of greater value than where the contract was considered as a whole. And here we may as well observe that there is some testimony from which, in our opinion, the jury could well have inferred that the work shown by the statements to have been done was completed as the contract specifies. The plaintiff testified that he leveled and checked 400 acres in tract 3. He in no way qualified this statement, and from it it may reasonably be inferred that he leveled and checked the number of acres mentioned in accordance with the specifications of the contract. At any rate, it is quite certain, not only from his testimony, but from that of the defendant, that there were out of the 400 acres referred to between 40 and 50 acres which were, prior to the 1st day of April, 1920, plowed and sown to barley by the defendant, and from this circumstance it is clear that the work on the acreage thus utilized by the defendant had been completed as the contract specifies. There is also the testimony of the witness Rue, a civil engineer, who surveyed the land just prior to the trial for the purpose of determining whether it had been checked and leveled according to the requirements of the contract, and who also made such an examination of the work done on a reservoir which had been constructed and some of the levees, to the effect that he assumed a certain level and found, according to his survey that the leveling and checking were substantially according to the specifications of the contract. The contract provides that—

> "Each check shall be graded to a smooth and uniform surface and all holes shall be filled to the level of the check and all knolls shall be cut down to the level of the check. with a maximum deviation of two-tenths of one foot."

[7] The witness Rue stated that there were 15 acres in the whole tract where the maximum deviation was considerably greater than two-tenths of one foot. He was also made to say upon cross-examination, as to the 400 acres generally, that from the highest point in the land to the lowest there might have been approximately a deviation of four-tenths of a foot, but this measurement was made upon the basis of the distance of the highest point from the lowest, and is obviously not in accordance with the provision of the contract the language of which we have just quoted. That provision evidently means that in determining the maximum deviation such deviation should be ascertained with reference to a datum line—that is, a common level—and not with regard to the distance from the highest to the lowest points in different parts of the land. In other words, the provision means that the deviation should be measured from the highest or the lowest point to the level or datum line, and not from the highest point to the lowest point, which would make the four-tenths of a foot deviation mentioned by the witness on cross-examination. This was the construction put upon the provision by the witness, and, as stated, we think it is the correct view of the provision, and, according to his testimony, while there might in places have been a deviation a trifle above two-tenths of a foot, yet, taking the whole acreage together, with the exception of the 15 acres mentioned, the deviation was substantially as the contract provides. In addition to the foregoing testimony, we may refer to the testimony of the president of the defendant, who was called by the plaintiff under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Stats. 1917, p. 58). He testified that he had stated to certain people, prospective buyers of the land, that a considerable portion of the 400 acres referred to above had been leveled and checked. He qualified this, however, by saying that he would not say it had been leveled and checked "within the purview of the contract within two-tenths of a foot." Other witnesses who testified that they were familiar with the character of work specified to be done by the contract, and who had examined the work done by the plaintiff, testified to the reasonable value of such work.

[8] It is unnecessary, however, to proceed further with the examination of the testimony tending to show that the work was completed. It is sufficient to repeat that there is some testimony from which the jury could reasonably conclude that the work, or at least the bulk of it, for which defendant here asks to be paid was done in substantial compliance with the contract, and, of course, if there be any substantial evidence as to that matter, even though contradicted, the verdict, so far as that point is concerned, cannot be disturbed.

The complaint that the plaintiff refused to perform the contract as required by its provisions is without merit. He testified that he did cause the land to be releveled in a number of different places after the flood test, these particular places having been pointed out or indicated by the defendant's superintendent after the water test was made and the water had dried up.

The contention that the statement of work done presented by the plaintiff was not in proper form is without substantial ground for its support. The statements for the March and April work were substantially the same as the one presented to and accepted by the defendant for the work done in January and February. These statements appear to be so clear as to the amount and the character of work done as to have enabled the defendant's engineer without difficulty to check them and so compute and determine whether they were correct. Besides, the contract does not describe any particular form or manner in which the statement of the work should be made. The case here is not exactly the same as that of Sinnott v. Schumaher, 45 Cal. App. 46, 187 Pac. 105, as to the character of statement which a contractor must make and present to the owner as a prerequisite to the making of a progress payment. In that case the contract provided that the contractor shall furnish the architect at each time when payments became due a written report setting forth the exact percentage of the work installed. Here the contract, as we understand it, merely provides that the amount of work done during any month was to be shown by a statement, more or less of a general character, presented by the contractor, and that seems clear enough to have been what the contractor in this case did. Furthermore, the defendant in this case made no objection to the form or character of the statement itself, and did not base its refusal to pay upon that ground. In this connection we may add to what has already been said that the defendant's president testified that the only reason he refused to pay for the work for March, when the statement of the work done for that month was presented, was because plaintiff had been overpaid by defendant for the January and February work.

[9] The declaration of the defendant that it offered to pay the plaintiff for the work done in March and April, but that he refused to accept such payment, is not supported. The defendant did offer to advance to the plaintiff an amount of money equal to the total amount called for by his statements for March and April provided he (plaintiff) would sign a written acknowledgment that the work had not been completed in accordance with the specifications of the contract. This the plaintiff refused to do. But this offer, obviously, did not constitute an offer of payment, and the defendant had the right to refuse it, and his act in doing so did not, as counsel for the defendant contend, constitute a bar to his right to abandon the contract and sue upon a quantum meruit or upon the contract itself if he had so elected.

[10] The offer by the defendant to the plaintiff to submit their controversy to arbitration, and the refusal of the plaintiff to accept the offer, in no way affected or impaired the right of the plaintiff to rescind and abandon the contract. The provision in the contract for the submission to arbitration of any controversies arising between the parties with respect to the contract does not either expressly or by necessary implication say that in such instances arbitration shall be a condition precedent to the right of plaintiff to demand and receive the progress payments provided for in said contract.

> "An arbitration clause of a contract will not be construed as ousting the courts of jurisdiction unless such construction is inevitable, so that, unless the clause is made a condition precedent by express words or necessary implication, it will be construed as merely collateral to the liability clause and is no bar to an action without an award." 2 R. C. L. p. 363; Oakdale Irrigation District v. Beard, 47 Cal. App. 66, 72, 190 Pac. 224; Hamilton v. Home Ins. Co., 137 U. S. 711, 11 Sup. Ct. 133, 34 L. Ed. 708.

See, also, Rose's U. S. Notes.

The point that the court erred in allowing a certain declaration made by J. W. Goodwin, president of the defendant, involving what counsel for the plaintiff seem to believe was a declaration against interest or an admission tending to show that the 400 acres of land were leveled and checked in accordance with the specifications of the contract, even if well taken, is of little consequence in its bearing upon the decision of this appeal. The declaration referred to was made by said Goodwin to one Carroll, in the course of negotiations between the two for the leasing of a portion of the 400 acres by the defendant to said Carroll, and it was to the effect that the entire acreage had been leveled and checked. There is grave doubt as to the admissibility of testimony of the declaration referred to upon the theory that it was a declaration against interest. Indeed, in our present view of the matter, we should say it is not admissible for that purpose.

[11-13] But we think that, in view of the fact that Goodwin's general testimony tended to show that none of the work for which the plaintiff claimed the right to be paid was done, as the contract specifies, the declaration would be admissible for the purposes of impeachment—that is, for the purpose of impeaching the testimony of Goodwin tending to show that the work had not been done as required by the contract. Obviously, if the testimony was admissible upon any theory or for any purpose, it cannot be said that its admission was prejudicial merely because it was allowed upon an erroneous theory. The court also instructed the jury with regard to the testimony of the declaration in part as follows:

> "Evidence has been offered of certain admissions of J. W. Goodwin, President of San Joaquin Agricultural Corporation. Whatever a party voluntarily admits to be true, though the admission be contrary to his interest, may be reasonably taken for the truth."

[14] The court should not have given this instruction, for, as above pointed out, the theory upon which testimony of the declaration of Goodwin was admissible, if admissible at all, is that its tendency was to impeach other parts of his testimony. Indeed, such an instruction should not be given in any case. But, considering the entire record, including, of course, the evidence, and particularly in view of the construction which we have been led to give to that provision of the contract stipulating for monthly payments for work done, the conclusion that no prejudice or miscarriage of justice resulted from the giving of said instruction is justified. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

There are no other points which we conceive it is necessary to be considered.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MAHACH et al. (Cr. 666.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 30, 1923.)

1. Criminal law ⚷1104(6)—Reading and delivering application for transcript of evidence to judge in open court held equivalent to filing.

Where an application for a transcript of the evidence in a criminal prosecution is presented in open court within the time prescribed by Pen. Code, § 1247, in the presence of the clerk or his deputy, the district attorney or his deputy, and read in part to the court, and thereafter delivered to him for inspection, with the understanding that it would be given to the clerk for filing, together with an order for the transcript, held, though it was never delivered to the clerk, that what had been done was nevertheless equivalent to an actual filing; the absence of indorsement by the clerk being only evidence of filing.

2. Criminal law ⚷1104(6)—Relief from default in failure to file application for transcript of evidence held warranted.

Where an application for a transcript of the evidence in a criminal prosecution, which is regular in all respects, has been presented within the time prescribed by Pen. Code, § 1247, and, after being partly read, handed through courtesy to the court for inspection, rather than to the clerk for filing, with the understanding that he would hand it to the clerk, with the order for the transcript, but which he failed to do, so that no filing was in fact made within the prescribed time, held, that the default was one which, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, the court under his discretionary power should have relieved against.

Lawrence Mahach and Marion Rube were convicted of robbery. From an order denying their application for a transcript of the evidence, they appeal. Reversed, with directions.

T. H. Selvage and E. S. Selvage, both of Eureka, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. [1] Defendants were convicted in the superior court of the county of Humboldt on September 1, 1922, of the crime of robbery. On September 5 judgment was pronounced sentencing them to the state prison. When arraigned for judgment they moved for a new trial, which motion was denied. Within two days thereafter they filed a "notice of appeal" with the clerk of said superior court. Within five days after said notice was filed T. H. Selvage, one of the attorneys for said defendants, presented in open court a written application for a transcript of the testimony in said cause; said application stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which the appellants relied, and designating the portions of the phonographic reporter's notes necessary to have transcribed to fairly present the points relied upon. At the time this application was made there were present in court in the discharge of their duties in connection with said cause the judge, the county clerk or his deputy, the district attorney or his deputy, and the said attorney for defendants. Thereupon Mr. Selvage read aloud portions of said application, and then inquired of the judge of the court whether it would be necessary to read all of it. Being advised that it was not necessary to do so, he then handed the same to the judge on the bench, in the presence of the other officers mentioned, for the purpose of having said judge inspect it, so as to make said order requiring the transcription of said notes, and for the further purpose of filing the same with the clerk. Said judge examined the document and retained it, as appellant's counsel believed, for the purpose of making said order, and then handing both to said clerk. Subsequently, on September 13, Mr. Selvage learned through the public press that no such order was made, and that the judge did not hand the application to the clerk, who was sitting at his desk just in front of the judge, but that the latter retained it in his possession until more than five days had elapsed after said notice of appeal was filed. Thereupon Mr. Selvage presented a verified petition to the court, praying that such order be made, supporting it by his affidavit, setting forth the facts which we have related above, and also:

> "That because of the foregoing matters affiant was taken by surprise, and that, upon learning that the said application had not been handed to the clerk by said judge, he at once took steps to have the order transcribing testimony properly made. That affiant believed and had reason to believe that the judge of said court did, at the time said application was handed to him by affiant, hand the same to the clerk of the said court, and that it was through affiant's mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect that the said document was not placed in the hands of the clerk of said court. Affiant refers to the application and points placed in the hands of the judge of said court and now in his possession, and makes it a part of this affidavit. That affiant believes that the defendants have a good cause for appeal, and that errors detrimental to defendants occurred at the trial of said cause in the ruling of the trial judge and upon the introduction of testimony, which said errors were sufficient to reverse said cause by the appellate court and remand the same for a new trial on the ground that they were prejudicial to the rights of defendants."

The matter came on regularly for hearing in open court, and it was ordered "that said motion be and the same is hereby denied," from which order the appeal has been taken.

The particular statute governing such applications for the transcription of the reporter's notes is found in section 1247 of the Penal Code as follows:

> "Upon an appeal being taken from any judgment or order of the superior court, to the Supreme Court or to a District Court of Appeal, in any criminal action or proceeding where such appeal is allowed by law, the defendant * * * must, within five days, file with the clerk and present an application to the trial court, stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which the appellant relies, and designate what portions of the phonographic reporter's notes it will be necessary to have transcribed to fairly present the points relied upon. If such application is not filed within said time, the appeal is wholly ineffectual and shall be deemed dismissed and the judgment or order may be enforced as if no appeal had been taken.
> "The court shall, within two days after the filing of such application, make an order directing the phonographic reporter who reported the case to transcribe such portion of his notes as in the opinion of the court may be necessary to fairly and fully present the points relied upon by the appellant. If the court fails to make the order within two days after the application is filed, the notes requested in the application shall be transcribed without such order."

It is not disputed that appellants complied with the requirements of said section in every particular except they made the mistake of handing the application to the judge on the bench instead of to the clerk who sat in front of him. We think, however, that a just and reasonable interpretation and application of the statute lead to the conclusion that what was done should be deemed equivalent to an actual filing of said application. That appellants desired and intended it to be filed must have been known to the district attorney, the clerk and the judge of the court, and the fact that it was presented in open court with all these officers present subserved the same purpose as though it had been formally filed with the clerk and then presented to the judge. The circumstance that it was not indorsed by the clerk is of no consequence, since the facts as to what occurred are not in dispute. O'Connor v. Board of Comrs., 17 Idaho, 346, 105 Pac. 560; Burkleo v. Town Board, 108 Minn. 224, 120 N. W. 526, 121 N. W. 874. The indorsement of the fact of filing is, indeed, only evidence that such filing has been made. Oats v. State, 153 Ind. 436, 55 N. E. 226.

We consider the situation quite different from that involved in the Estate of Sbarboro, 63 Cal. 5. Therein the petition in question was presented to the judge of the court at his private residence, instead of being filed, as the statute required, with the clerk of the court. It was in view of such fact the Supreme Court said:

> "Presenting an unfiled petition to the judge of a court, for the purpose of obtaining from him an order for a citation upon it, is not filing it in court, nor the equivalent of filing it. It is no part of the duty of a judge to receive a petition in a cause for filing, or to file it, or to make an order for its filing, or for issuing a citation upon it, unless some law expressly requires of him the performance of such a duty. There was no law which required of the judge of the court in this case performance of any one of those acts. The duty of filing the petition, and issuing citation upon it, when filed, was cast by law upon the clerk of the court. Section 1328, Code Civ. Proc."

In Rhodes v. Sargent, 17 Cal. App. 54, 118 Pac. 727, the application utterly failed to comply with the requirements of said section 1247 of the Penal Code specifying what the application should contain, and the District Court of Appeal of the First District very properly held that said section was mandatory, and that one of the important purposes of said section as amended in 1911 (Stats. of 1911, p. 692) was to avoid the "great and needless waste of public funds which had occurred under the former practice." As we have stated, no objection has been or could be made to the form of the application herein.

In People v. Measor, 20 Cal. App. 406, 129 Pac. 469, it appears that no notice whatever was given as contemplated by said section. The cause, however, appeared upon the calendar of the appellate court, and it was stated that the court had examined the record in order "that injustice might not be done the defendant by reason of the neglect of her counsel * * * and we find no prejudicial error therein." The judgment was therefore affirmed.

In People v. Ali, 38 Cal. App. 544, 176 Pac. 883, the last case cited by respondent, we find, also, that no application was made as required in said section 1247, and for that reason the appeals were dismissed.

[2] But, if it should be deemed that there was a failure to comply technically with the requirement of the statute as to filing, we think the trial court should have relieved appellants from their default. In this connection it may be stated that no controversy is raised as to the availability of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure in cases like this. It is likewise admitted that such applications for relief are addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court. The consideration is thus stated in Jergins v. Schenck, 162 Cal. 747, 124 Pac. 426:

> "The law governing this class of cases is so well settled, and has been so often declared in the decisions of this court, that we may dispense with the citation of authority. An application to be relieved from a default under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and the action of that court will not be set aside on appeal unless an abuse of discretion clearly appears. Any doubt that may exist should be resolved in favor of the application, to the end of securing a trial upon the merits. The appellate court will, therefore, be less inclined to reverse an order granting, than one refusing, an application to open a default. Indeed, the cases in which this court has held that such such relief was improperly granted are very rare, while in a number of instances an order refusing to open the default has been reversed."

The great liberality which should be shown toward such applications when made in good faith is also enunciated and emphasized in Paramore v. Colby, 37 Cal. App. 648, 174 Pac. 677, Borgmeyer v. Solomon, 39 Cal. App. 106, 178 Pac. 544, Banta v. Siller, 121 Cal. 414, 53 Pac. 935, Estate of Keating, 158 Cal. 109, 110 Pac. 109, and many other decisions.

Under the circumstances enumerated herein we feel satisfied that appellants' "surprise" was justifiable and their neglect—if any—was excusable. Out of courtesy, no doubt, to the presiding officer of the court, they presented the application to him, that he might entirely satisfy himself that it was in proper form. They had a right to expect and believe that the judge, after reading it, would transmit it for filing to the clerk, who is the custodian of the record of the court. We must assume that the judge knew that the application should be so filed, and that it was presented to him for the twofold purpose already stated. With that situation confronting him, the judge would naturally be expected to pursue the course that appellants anticipated. It may be that there was no express legal obligation resting upon him to do so, but it was the obvious and right thing to do under the circumstances in furtherance of justice and to promote the rights of the parties. It cannot be supposed, of course, that the learned trial judge had any desire to take an advantage of the defendants, or to lull them into fancied security and thereby deprive them of the benefit of an appeal. His retention of the document was probably the result of inadvertence, and not of any purpose to disappoint the expectation of counsel for appellants, or to interpose a merely technical obstacle to the prosecution of the appeal. While the strict letter of the law might justify the affirmance of the order, we think it just to hold that the defendants should be permitted to have an appellate court review the record in the case.

The order is reversed, with direction to the trial court to order the transcription of the reporter's notes as prayed for by appellants.

BIAGGI v. MAINERO et al. (Civ. 4400.)

1. Quieting title 🔑10(2)—Recovery on strength of title.

Plaintiff must recover on strength of his own title rather than any weakness of defendants.

2. Appeal and error 🔑907(3)—Conclusively presumed no evidence supported unsuccessful plaintiff's title where appeal on judgment roll alone.

Where the judgment in action to quiet title decreed that plaintiff was not the owner, on appeal on the judgment roll alone it will be conclusively presumed that there was no evidence offered to establish plaintiff's claim of title.

3. Quieting title 🔑50—On decree that plaintiff was not owner, finding that his claim was based on tax sale not necessary.

In a suit to quiet title a finding that plaintiff's claim of title was based on an alleged sale of said property for delinquent taxes and on alleged conveyances to plaintiff's predecessor in interest pursuant to such sale for delinquency was unnecessary to the judgment wherein the court decreed only that plaintiff was not the owner or entitled to possession of the property, and did not quiet title in the defendants, as Pol. Code, § 3898, subd. 5, providing that no decree of forfeiture shall be given until the former owner shall have repaid the purchaser the taxes, penalties, and costs paid by him had no application.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Action by George Biaggi against G. Mainero and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William R. Biaggi and Ralph McComish, both of San Jose, for appellant.

John P. Fitzgerald, of San Jose, Walter Fitzgerald, of Gilroy, and C. C. Coolidge, Thomas J. Riordan and Maurice J. Rankin, all of San Jose, for respondents.

ST. SURE, J. This is an action to quiet title to a tract of land containing 28.77 acres in Santa Clara county. Judgment was for defendants, and plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll.

The complaint is in the usual form. Defendants G. Mainero, Margherita Mainero, and Peter Piumarta answered, denying ownership in plaintiff of any of the property, and setting up their own ownership of a part of it, subject to a certain pipe line right. They disclaimed ownership in a portion of the property lying "west of Llagas creek." Emelia Piumarta answered separately, denying all of the allegations of the complaint. All of the defendants joined in an amendment to their answers, alleging, on information and belief, that plaintiff's claim of ownership was based upon an alleged sale of the land for delinquent taxes of 1914–15, and alleged conveyances to plaintiff's predecessor in interest pursuant to such alleged delinquency and sale, and tender to plaintiff of taxes, penalties, and costs chargeable upon the land which plaintiff or his predecessor paid at such alleged sale or afterward on the faith of it, with legal interest from the time of payment.

The action was dismissed as to all defendants save the Maineros and Piumartas, and trial was had upon the complaint and answer and amendment to the answer. The court decreed merely that plaintiff was not the owner, in possession or entitled to possession of the property described, and that defendants have judgment for costs.

[1, 2] Plaintiff contends, first, that, inasmuch as there was a disclaimer as to a portion of the land, plaintiff was entitled to a decree quieting his title as to that portion as against the parties making the disclaimer; second, that the judgment should have been conditioned upon restoration to the plaintiff of the money spent in pursuit of the tax title. The first point is disposed of by the cases of Rockey et al. v. Vieux et al., 179 Cal. 681, 178 Pac. 712, Sears v. Willard, 165 Cal. 12, 130 Pac. 869, and Williams v. San Pedro, 153 Cal. 44, at page 49, 94 Pac. 234, which hold that the plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title rather than any weakness of the defendants' title. Whether or not defendants had any title to the property, or any part of it, is immaterial. The defendant Emelia Piumarta did not disclaim as to any part of the property, but denied all of the allegations of the complaint. This put in issue all of those allegations and made it incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove every allegation of his complaint. The appeal comes before this court upon the judgment roll alone, and it will therefore be conclusively presumed that there was no evidence offered to establish plaintiff's claim of title. Mohr v. North Rawhide Co., 177 Cal. 264, 170 Pac. 600. The second point is also without merit. The appeal, as we have stated, comes before us upon the judgment roll alone, and in our determination we are limited to the questions presented thereby. Norton v. Newerf, 45 Cal. App. 10, 187 Pac. 57.

[3] In its decision the trial court, among other things, found that plaintiff's claim of title was based upon "an alleged sale of said property for alleged delinquent taxes for the fiscal years 1914–15, and upon alleged conveyances executed to plaintiff's predecessor in interest, R. G. Biaggi, pursuant to said alleged delinquency and pursuant to said alleged sale." In this connection respondent calls our attention to subdivision 5 of section 3898 of the Political Code, which provides that in an action of this kind no decree of forfeiture shall be given "until the former owner, or other party in interest, shall have repaid to the purchaser, the full amount of taxes, penalties and costs paid out and expended by him." The finding was unnecessary to the judgment. Furthermore, we note that the court did not find that there was in fact a delinquency on the property in question, or that there was in fact a sale of the property for such delinquency. Neither did it find that plaintiff or his predecessors in interest ever paid any sum whatever for taxes, penalties, or costs. In the absence of any evidence showing such payment it must be assumed that there was no evidence in that respect. Had the court made a decree quieting title in defendants, it may be that such decree should have been conditioned on payment of the moneys paid by plaintiff in pursuit of the tax title, but this question does not arise in this case for the reason that the title was not decreed in anyone. If plaintiff is not aggrieved by a judgment declaring some one else to be the owner when he has shown no title in the land in himself, this plaintiff cannot be heard to complain of this judgment.

SWAIN v. LOS ANGELES MORRIS PLAN CO. et al. (Civ. 4076.)

1. Pleading ⚷64(2)—Causes of action on attachment undertaking and for malicious attachment held improperly commingled in one count.

A complaint, in an action against the sureties in an attachment bond for damages for the wrongful issuance of a writ and levy thereunder, which, after charging the improper issuance of the writ and levy thereunder, naming the sureties, charged injury to his name and reputation to the extent of $5,000, and then setting for particular items of actual damages, improperly commingled in one count two causes of action, based on the undertaking given upon the attachment and a cause for malicious procuring and levying an attachment.

2. Pleading ⚷201—Language of demurrer held not objectionable.

A demurrer to a complaint under Code Civ. Proc. § 430, subd. 5, on the grounds that it "purported" to set forth causes of action improperly joined, is not objectionable because of the use of the word purported.

3. Attachment ⚷349—Complaint, stating cause of action on undertaking in attachment, must allege refusal or nonpayment of damages.

A complaint, alleging a cause of action on an attachment undertaking, is insufficient if it fails to allege a demand for and refusal of payment of damages, or that such damages remain unpaid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Charles Swain against the Los Angeles Morris Plan Company and others.

From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. Crawford, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, Paul Fussell, and Walter H. Sprague, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover a large sum of money as damages which he alleged he had been made to suffer through the acts of the defendants. The demurrer of the defendants to the third amended complaint of the plaintiff was sustained. Plaintiff declined to amend, whereupon judgment was rendered against him. Plaintiff appealed.

[1] All of the damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff were attributed to the alleged wrongful issuance of a writ of attachment in a civil action brought by the first-named defendant against the plaintiff. Defendants Workman and Cottle were sureties on the undertaking given to secure issuance of the attachment writ. The demurrer of the defendants assigned: First, the general ground that sufficient facts were not stated in the complaint to constitute a cause of action; second, "that several causes of action are purported to be set forth and are not separately stated, in that said complaint attempts to state in one and the same count a cause of action for malicious attachment and a cause of action upon an undertaking in attachment"; third, that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant. The complaint was so clearly vulnerable to the attack that different causes of action were attempted to be stated in the same count that but brief attention need be given to the other grounds assigned. In the complaint it was first alleged that an action was brought in August, 1921, against the plaintiff by the corporation defendant for the principal sum of $495, and that in the complaint it was alleged that the corporation held a certificate of deposit as collateral security for payment of the debt; it was next alleged that defendant Workman made an affidavit in which he falsely alleged that the payment of the debt mentioned had not been secured by any lien upon personal property, and that said affidavit was filed in the office of the clerk of Los Angeles county; that an attachment bond or undertaking was given with defendants Workman and Cottle as sureties, guaranteeing that, if the attachment should be discharged on the ground that plaintiff "was not entitled thereto under section 537" plaintiff would pay all damages which the defendant in that suit might sustain by reason of the attachment; that the attachment was, upon motion of the defendant, made upon the ground that the writ "was improperly issued," discharged on the 31st of August, 1921. The complaint further showed that after the issuance of the attachment, certain property of the plaintiff here had been taken in charge by the sheriff under the writ, and certain credits had been levied upon. Plaintiff then alleged that in the making and filing of the affidavit and undertaking, and the causing of the attachment to be issued and levied, "the defendant corporation and said Workman and Cottle did so with the intent and design to injure the plaintiff in his good name for honesty and in his good business reputation among his friends and business associates," etc., and that he was so injured and damaged to the amount of $5,000. Particular items of damage were further set forth, as to the value of the use of the attached property ($135) and expenditure for attorney's fees of the sum of $75. The allegations of the complaint show that the plaintiff was attempting to recover both upon the contract undertaking given upon the attachment as well as for the malicious procuring and levying of a writ of attachment. He not only particularly alleged the falsity of the statement in the affidavit that the alleged attachment debt was not secured by a lien upon property, but the amount of his damages were many times in excess of any possible penalty under the bond, considering the sum sought to be recovered in the attachment suit. And yet we find in appellant's reply brief the statement that he is not claiming that a cause of action for malicious attachment was stated, for he says:

> "We could not maintain such an action, as the action of the respondent corporation against the appellant has not been tried nor has it abated. Vesper v. Crane, 165 Cal. 36, 130 Pac. 876, L. R. A. 1915A, 541."

[2] Appellant's objection that the ground of demurrer referred to was not stated in the exact language of subdivision 5 of section 430 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in that the demurrants refer to the causes of action as being "purported," is highly technical and not entitled to serious consideration. Assuming that the different causes of action were such as might be joined in the same suit, respondents were entitled to have them separately stated instead of being commingled and confused as they were in the pleading demurred to.

[3] The cause of action on the attachment undertaking, separately considered, was insufficient, as it was not alleged that there had been demand made on plaintiff in the attachment suit for payment of the damages, or that such damages were unpaid. Morgan v. Menzies, 60 Cal. 341; Curtiss v. Bachman et al., 84 Cal. 216, 24 Pac. 379.

The judgment is affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. THOMPSON et al.

(Civ. 4086.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑935(2)—Counsel's reliance on motion to quash service of summons when permitting default to be taken assumed error after denial of motion.

Where counsel, under the belief that copies of the summons served on them were insufficient, allowed a default to be taken against them, and relied on a motion to quash the service of summons which motion is thereafter denied, it is assumed, on appeal from grant of motion to open default, that they were in error in relying on such motion.

2. Appearance 🔑9(5)—Application for additional time not general appearance.

An application for additional time within which to plead does not constitute a general appearance.

3. Judgment 🔑161—Setting aside default held not abuse of discretion, though proposed answer was not verified.

Where the affidavits in support of a motion to set aside a default judgment, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, state that counsel permitted the default to be taken under the good-faith opinion that the service of summons was insufficient and would be quashed, and that counsel told defendant he had a good and meritorious defense, held, that the setting aside of the default was not an abuse of discretion, notwithstanding the copy of the answer, to be made if the motion was allowed, which accompanied the motion was not verified.

4. Judgment 🔑143(3)—Relief may be had against mistake of the law resulting in default.

In a proper case, the court will grant relief against a mistake of the law which has resulted in a default of a defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. S. Crail, Judge.

Action by George F. Williams against O. M. Thompson and others. From an order granting a motion to set aside a default judgment in favor of plaintiff, plaintiff appeals. Order affirmed.

Goodwin & Morgrage, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Allen & Lyon, of Fullerton, and Jones & Weller, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Judgment by default having been entered against the defendants, they moved the court to set aside the default and vacate the judgment, on the ground that said default was taken as a result of mistake of law and surprise of the attorneys for the defense. This appeal is from an order granting that motion.

The action is one commenced in the county of Los Angeles to recover money alleged to be due under a contract for personal services. The summons was served on the defendants in the county of Orange on October 24, 1921. Summons was returned on November 25th, and the default and judgment by default were entered December 5, 1921.

On the 7th day of December, 1921, pursuant to notice duly given on the 25th day of November and their special appearance for that purpose, the defendants moved to quash the service of summons because of certain alleged defects in the copies of summons and complaint which had been delivered to them. That motion having been denied, they then made the motion whereby they sought relief under the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. From the affidavits on this motion, it appears that Mr. Lyon, one of the attorneys of the defendants, had charge of the motion to quash service of summons; that he in good faith was of the opinion that the copies of summons delivered to the defendants were insufficient because they were not dated, were without seal and were not signed by a deputy clerk of the court, and because the purported copy of the complaint was not signed by the plaintiff or his attorney. Relying upon their special appearance and motion to quash summons, defendants entered no general appearance and thereby suffered default.

[1, 2] The motion to quash service of summons having been denied, it is now assumed as the law of the case that counsel for defendants were in error when, relying upon that motion, they permitted default to be taken against them. They claim that they did this because they were also of the opinion that an application for additional time in which to appear and plead would have constituted a general appearance. If so, we think that this also was a mistake of law. Davenport v. Superior Court, 183 Cal. 506, 191 Pac. 911.

That part of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, which is applicable to this case, reads as follows:

> "And may, also, upon such terms as may be just, relieve a party or his legal representative from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect; provided, that application therefor be made within a reasonable time, but in no case exceeding six months after such judgment, order, or proceeding was taken; and provided, further, that said application must be accompanied with a copy of the answer, or other pleading proposed to be filed therein, otherwise said application shall not be granted."

[3] Appellant contends that the court abused its discretion in granting the order from which this appeal is taken, because there was no sufficient affidavit of merits, and because, although the complaint in the action was verified, the proposed answer which accompanied the motion of defendants was not verified. One of the defendants in his affidavit stated that he had stated all the facts in the case to his attorney and was thereupon advised that he and his codefendants had a good and meritorious defense to the action. We think that this affidavit, together with the proposed joint answer of the defendants, was a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the motion then before the court with respect to a showing of merits of the defense. It may fairly be presumed that when the court granted the motion, the answer filed would have been verified. If the answer, which pursuant to that order has been filed, is not verified, it would have been easy to establish the fact in preparing the record on this appeal.

[4] It is a recognized rule that the court will, in a proper case, grant relief against a mistake of law which has resulted in the default of a defendant. Mitchell v. Cal., etc., S. S. Co., 156 Cal. 576, 580, 105 Pac. 590. The court did not abuse its discretionary power, in treating this as a proper case for such relief.

The order is affirmed.

DIENER v. SHAUL et al. (Civ. 4472.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Jan. 30, 1923.)

1. Sheriffs and constables 🔑113(1)—One consenting to destruction of wine in order to save son from serving jail sentence held not entitled to recover for such destruction.

Where plaintiff's son was convicted of selling wine and sentenced to 60 days in jail and to pay a fine, but the jail sentence was suspended upon condition that the liquor upon his mother's premises and owned by her should be destroyed, and plaintiff consented thereto in order to save her son from serving a jail sentence, and the wine was destroyed, she could not recover damages from the sheriff for such destruction, regardless of her property rights in the liquor.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1052(5)—Error as to admission of evidence of immaterial matters held harmless.

Where, in a suit to recover for the destruction of wine claimed to be owned by plaintiff and destroyed by defendant as sheriff, where the jury found that the wine was destroyed by plaintiff's consent, errors as to admission of evidence of various sales of wine made by plaintiff held immaterial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Action by Marie Diener against B. F. Shaul and others to recover value of wine destroyed. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Roy L. Daily and W. C. Burgess, both of San Francisco, and Benj. C. Jones, of Lakeport, for appellant.

C. M. Crawford, of Lakeport (J. E. Pemberton, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an action to recover the value of certain wine alleged to have been the property of the plaintiff and to have been destroyed by the defendant Shaul, the sheriff of the county of Lake. The other defendant is the surety upon the sheriff's official bond.

The action was tried before a jury, which brought in a verdict for the defendants. From a judgment rendered upon this verdict the plaintiff has appealed.

[1] It is admitted that the wine was destroyed by the sheriff upon the written consent of the plaintiff. It is claimed, however, by the plaintiff that this consent was obtained by duress. The plaintiff had 600 gallons of wine in the cellar of her home held in a bonded warehouse and 180 gallons upstairs. Her son, who lived with her, sold some of this wine and was arrested. He pleaded guilty and was sentenced to 60 days in jail and to pay a fine. The jail sentence was suspended, however, upon condition that he should refrain from further violations of the law and that the liquor upon the premises should be destroyed. The son consented to this, but stated that the liquor belonged to his mother and he had no right to consent to its destruction. The sheriff was then instructed to obtain the mother's consent before detroying the wine. The son returned to his home late in the evening and explained the entire matter to his mother, and on the following day the sheriff arrived at the home of plaintiff and her son and presented a written consent to the destruction of the wine for the mother to sign. She did so, and the jury has found, under instructions which fully and fairly presented the plaintiff's contention of duress, that she signed this consent voluntarily and that the same was not procured by duress. This is determinative of the case. Plaintiff had power to consent to the destruction of her property to save her son from serving a jail sentence, and she cannot recover damages from one who acted upon that consent.

It is unnecessary for us to determine whether or not plaintiff had forfeited her right to the liquor or whether or not a judgment of a court declaring such forfeiture was essential to a destruction of her property rights, or many of the other interesting questions argued in the briefs; for, as we have stated, if the plaintiff consented to the destruction of the wine, she cannot recover against the defendants, regardless of whether or not she had a property right in the same. The matter of her free and voluntary consent was presented to the jury by the instructions given at the request of the plaintiff. After full and fair instructions regarding duress, menace, fraud, constructive fraud, etc., the jury was instructed:

> "If you find from the evidence that the defendant seized and destroyed the wine owned by Marie Diener, plaintiff herein, without a valid process or order of court, he was a trespasser from the beginning and personally liable for his acts, unless the plaintiff, Marie Diener, voluntarily consented to the seizure and destruction of said wine."

It was not disputed that the sheriff did not act nor purport to act under an order of court for the destruction of the wine, but relied upon plaintiff's consent, and did not proceed until he had secured the same.

[2] In the face of the instruction just quoted the jury brought in a verdict for the defendants, and we assume they followed the instructions of the court. It being settled, therefore, by the finding of the jury that the plaintiff voluntarily consented to the destruction of the wine, the case is concluded, and plaintiff could not have been prejudiced by rulings of the court in relation to the admission of evidence of various sales of wine made by her or other matters which had no bearing upon the question of her free and voluntary consent to the destruction of this wine.

The judgment is affirmed.

BROWNING et al. v. DOW et al. (Civ. 2471.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 3, 1923.)

1. Mandamus 🔑72—Writ will issue to compel exercise of discretion or correct "abuse of discretion."

A writ of mandate will issue in a proper case to compel the exercise of discretion, but it will never issue to control discretion, either before or after the exercise thereof, and in a proper case, however, the writ will issue to correct an abuse of discretion, which is not the exercise of discretion, but action beyond the limits thereof, and the writ will only issue where the act to be commanded is certain, definite, and fixed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Abuse of Discretion.]

2. Mandamus 🔑78—Writ to compel trustees of reclamation district to establish office near district improper, where trustees had already exercised discretion.

In an action for a writ of mandate to compel the trustees of a reclamation district to maintain an office in or near the district, as required by Pol. Code, § 3454, as amended by St. 1917, p. 1193, § 6, where it appeared that the trustees in good faith had established an office at a point removed from the district, and had therefore exercised their discretion, which was not limited by the statute, a writ would not issue to compel the trustees to act again nor to set a limit within which they were to act.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by J. W. Browning and others against E. L. Dow and others, for a writ of mandate to compel defendants as trustees of a reclamation district to maintain an office in or near the district. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed with directions.

Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, and Thomas Rutledge, of Colusa, for appellants.

Seth Millington, Jr., of Colusa, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The complaint alleges that the defendants are the trustees of reclamation district No. 108, located in Colusa and Yolo counties; that as such trustees they ceased, on the 16th day of July, 1915, to keep an office in or near the district and established the office of such district in San Francisco, where it is now maintained; that the town of Grimes is in or near the district, is a business center thereof, convenient to the residents of the district, and provided with suitable offices and accommodations for the transaction of the business of such district; and that San Francisco is neither near the district nor convenient to the residents thereof as a place for the transaction of its business. The prayer is for a writ of mandate compelling defendants to keep an office in or near the district for the transaction of the business thereof.

The answer alleges that San Francisco is nearer to the "landowners owning a majority of the acreage of lands in said district than the town of Grimes"; that district No. 108, Sacramento River West Side levee district, and Knight's Landing Ridge drainage district are engaged in the same kind of work; that defendants "constitute a majority of the board of commissioners in each" of the two last-named districts, as well as being the trustees of district 108; that the three districts "have a common office, the same secretary, the same engineer, and the same attorney or counsel, and also the same manager," thereby reducing the expenses of all of said districts. Various other reasons are alleged for maintaining such office in San Francisco.

The court found that San Francisco is neither in nor near the district, but about 130 miles therefrom; that for the residents of the district to go to San Francisco "involves expense, inconvenience, and loss of time, * * * consuming several days in travel and attendance"; that San Francisco is not the most convenient place to keep said office, "but that there is in or near the said district the Town of Grimes, and other towns, adequate and suitable for the keeping of the office of said district"; that the "owners of a majority of land of the said district do not * * * reside within the said district, but that the majority of individual landowners of said district do reside within the boundaries of said district"; that the defendants constitute a majority of the commissioners of the Knight's Landing Ridge drainage district and of the Sacramento River West Side levee district and "that it would be cheaper and more convenient to operate the three offices together and employ office force jointly, but that the three of said offices could be more conveniently located in or near the lands involved, and there is no restriction on removing the offices of the said last-named districts." Judgment was entered commanding the defendants "to keep an office of said reclamation district No. 108 in or near the said district for the transaction of the business of said district and to keep the books, maps, papers, records, contracts, and other documents of said district in said office."

Section 3452 of the Political Code, as amended in 1874, required the trustees of a reclamation district to "keep their office in the district, or as near as practicable for the transaction of all business pertaining to the reclamation of the district." Stats. 1873–74, p. 46. In 1887 this provision was dropped from section 3452 and section 3453 was amended to provide: "The board of trustees must keep an office in or near the district for the transaction of the business thereof." Stats. 1887, p. 238. In 1917 this provision was omitted from section 3453 and section 3454 was amended to include the following: "Said board of trustees shall have powers and duties as follows, to wit: (1) To keep an office in or near the district for the transaction of the business thereof." Stats. 1917, p. 1193. For the purposes of this opinion the foregoing provisions will be treated as mandatory and identical in meaning and as requiring the trustees to keep an office in the district or as near as practicable thereto.

[1] Had the question of location of the office been committed originally to the decision of the trial court, there could be no doubt as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, and there are persuasive reasons in support of the contention that the trustees abused the discretion vested in them when they located the office in San Francisco, but it does not follow, even if such abuse of discretion be conceded, that the judgment can be upheld. Among the rules by which courts are guided in the issuance of writs of mandate are the following: (1) The writ will issue, in a proper case, to compel the exercise of discretion. (2) It will never issue to control discretion, either before or after the exercise thereof. (3) In a proper case, the writ will issue to correct an abuse of discretion. An abuse of discretion, however, is not the exercise of discretion but action beyond the limits of discretion. (4) It will issue only where the act to be commanded is certain, definite, and fixed. Where discretion has not been exercised, the definite thing commanded is to act. Where the limits of discretion have been exceeded, the definite command is to act within such limits.

[2] The command of the statute to keep an office in or near the district undoubtedly vests a discretion in the trustees as to its location. Their selection of a place anywhere within the district or on one side or the other thereof or a mile or several miles therefrom, depending upon circumstances, would be a reasonable exercise of their discretion. The court cannot be more specific in its commands than is the statute, a limitation which the judgment recognizes. Had the court commanded the defendants to keep an office at a particular place or within a given distance from the district, it would have been a judicial usurpation of the discretionary power vested in the trustees. If the trustees attempt to comply with the mandate of the court and establish an office at a place which, in the opinion of the court in a subsequent suit, is not near the district, another writ may issue and another and another, until a place is finally selected which the court shall conclude is near the district. This piecemeal control of the discretion of the trustees would constitute judicial usurpation as fully as if exercised in the first instance. Since the trustees are not charged with bad faith or fraudulent conduct, it must be assumed that they exercised an honest judgment in locating the office in San Francisco. Having exercised their discretion, and the statute not having set any definite limits to that discretion, the courts can neither require the trustees to act again, nor set a limit within which they must act. The following authorities sustain the rules herein applied, and no decision to the contrary has been discovered:

> "When the discretion has been exercised the writ cannot be used to compel a party to abandon his own judgment, and to make it conform to the judgment either of the court or of some other person. Every case where a party has been commanded by mandamus to do an act has been a case where the act was definite, certain, and fixed, and where its character and scope, and the result to flow from it, were as well known before the doing of the act as afterwards." Jacobs v. Board of Supervisors, 100 Cal. 121, 129, 34 Pac. 630, 632.

"Whenever such officers or bodies are vested with discretionary power as to the performance of any duty required at their hands, or when in reaching a given result of official action they are necessarily obliged to use some degree of judgment and discretion, while mandamus will lie to set them in motion and to compel action upon the matters in controversy, it will in no manner interfere with the exercise of such discretion, or control or dictate the judgment or decision which shall be reached." High's Extraordinary Legal Remedies (3d Ed.) § 24.

"It [mandate] does not lie to control judicial discretion, except when that discretion has been abused; but it is a remedy when the case is outside of the exercise of this discretion." Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 313, 323, 25 L. Ed. 667, 671.

See, also, Inglin v. Hoppin, 156 Cal. 483, 105 Pac. 582.

A writ of mandate was sought to compel the board of supervisors to erect a suitable jail. The court said:

"It is obvious * * * that the jail provided by the board of supervisors of La Salle county is far inferior to the wants and public necessities of the people of the county, and we are compelled to express our astonishment, when the wealth and resources of the county are considered, that the board should persist in requiring the officers of the county to confine those who are so unfortunate as to be charged or convicted of crime, in a prison which is dangerous to the life and health of the prisoners. * * * Section 26, c. 34, Rev. Stat. of 1874, p. 307, declares, 'It shall be the duty of the county board of each county to erect or otherwise provide, when necessary, and the finances of the county will justify it, and keep in repair, a suitable courthouse, jail.' * * * Had the county board failed and refused to provide any kind of a jail in which to confine prisoners, and it clearly appeared that the finances of the county were such as to justify the construction of a jail, we are inclined to the opinion that the duty enjoined by the statute might be enforced by mandamus; but such is not this case. While the provision of the statute requiring the county board to furnish a jail may be regarded as mandatory, * * * yet, the kind of a jail to be provided must necessarily be left to the discretion of the board. * * * If the court had power to interfere in this case because the jail was not properly ventilated, and was damp, and the room was too small and endangered the lives and health of the prisoners, upon the same principle, if a county should construct a jail at a cost of $30,000, and some taxpayer of the county was able to show that the cells were too small, or the building insecure, or that money enough had not been expended to make the building as elegant as the wealth of the county demanded, in such a case the court would also have to interfere." People v. Board of Supervisors, 84 Ill. 303, 25 Am. Rep. 461.

In affirming a judgment denying a writ of mandate requiring the board of supervisors to erect a fireproof clerk's office, it is said:

"The provisions of the Code which require the board of supervisors to provide a fireproof clerk's office are mandatory. * * * One of the marked characteristics of a proceeding by mandamus is that, if the functionary whose conduct is complained of is by law to exercise any discretion, that discretion will not be controlled by a writ of mandamus; for that would be to transfer the discretion which the law commits to the functionary to the court which undertakes to award the writ. * * * It cannot be said that the erection of a fireproof clerk's office is an act so clear and specific that no element of discretion is left in its performance. * * * If this court was of the opinion that the clerk's office in question was not fireproof, and awarded the writ commanding the board of supervisors to provide a fireproof clerk's office, how are they to determine whether they should erect a new building or repair or remodel the old? If the court goes into details and directs them what to do, it usurps the discretion vested in them. If the court does not do this, how are they to know what will satisfy the requirement of the statute in the opinion of the court? The county authorities having exercised their discretion, and provided a clerk's office intended to be fireproof, the circuit court did not err in refusing the writ." Broaddus v. Board of Supervisors, 99 Va. 370, 38 S. E. 177.

See, also, Ward v. Commissioners, 146 N. C. 534, 60 S. E. 418, 125 Am. St. Rep. 489.

"An act was passed to divide the county of Surry. * * * By the same act the defendants were appointed commissioners 'to select and determine upon a site for a permanent seat of justice for Surry county, who shall locate the same as near the center of said county as a suitable location can be obtained, taking into consideration both the extent of territory and population.' The commissioners, in their return, state that they have performed their duty with a strict and conscientious regard to the requirements of the act. These commissioners are the servants of the General Assembly to perform the acts required of them; and to their discretion the business was intrusted. With the exercise of that discretion we cannot interfere, as they in their return state their compliance substantially with the act. If the court were to issue its mandamus, what would it command? That the commissioners should proceed to select a site for the county town, observing the requirements of the act. We could not tell them whether the proper site is to the east or west of the center line designated in the petition; or whether, if on the one side or the other, it would be the proper place, regard being had to the population of the county. To do so, would be assuming an authority not given to us, but to the defendants, the commissioners. We could make no other fiat than the one already set forth. What other return then could the defendants make than the one they have made, if it be the truth? Another mandamus might be issued, to which the same return might be made; and in this way the matter might be bandied about from term to term." State v. Bonner, 44 N. C. 257.

Had the statute fixed limits to the discretion of the trustees, as that they should keep an office in the county in which the district or some part thereof is located, mandate would lie to compel them to keep the office within those limits, but the writ will not issue to direct and control the indefinite discretion vested in the board by the law. Since the question considered is decisive of the case, it is unnecessary to consider other grounds urged for a reversal.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment on the findings in favor of defendants.

TONNINGSEN v. ODD FELLOWS' CEMETERY ASS'N. (Civ. 4358.)

1. Mortgages 🔑591(1)—Foreclosure sale may only be made subject to redemption.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 700a, 701, 702, a sale of real property under foreclosure of a mortgage can only be made subject to redemption.

2. Judgment 🔑505—Foreclosure of judgment failing to allow redemption held void and subject to collateral attack in ejectment by holder of equity of redemption.

Where real estate was sold in the foreclosure of a mortgage, the judgment allowing no right of redemption, but providing that a deed issue to the purchaser immediately upon sale, such judgment was void and subject to collateral attack in an ejectment suit by the holder of the equity of redemption against the purchaser.

3. Mortgages 🔑605—Delivery of amount sufficient for redemption held to divest any title which foreclosure purchaser had.

Where a sale in foreclosure has been made without allowing redemption, a tender by the holder of the equity of redemption of an amount sufficient for redemption divested any title which the purchaser had.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Ejectment by John Tonningsen against the Odd Fellows' Cemetery Association. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lent & Humphrey and Robert Mack Light, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Stoney, Rouleau, Stoney & Palmer and R. M. J. Armstrong, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment for plaintiff in an action in ejectment. Exception is taken to certain of the findings of fact, and it is contended that they do not support the conclusions of law and the judgment.

Since 1904, defendant has been in possession of certain land in San Mateo county, which it used for a cemetery. Its possession was held under certain contracts to purchase, made with the predecessors in interest of the plaintiff, as vendors. These vendors transferred the said property to the Union Trust Company of San Francisco, subject to the rights of defendant, as security for the payment of certain bonds of the vendors. On January 23, 1917, default having been made in the payment of the bonds, the Union Trust Company commenced an action in the superior court in and for the county of San Mateo to foreclose the equity in said property, under the terms of the deed conveying the property to it as security.

There is considerable discussion in the briefs as to whether this conveyance for security should be regarded as a deed of trust or a mortgage. The instrument itself recites that it is a deed of trust or mortgage, and provides that, in case of default in payment of the bonds, the Union Trust Company, at the request of the bondholders, may sell the property at public auction or may proceed to foreclose the mortgage or deed of trust and sell all of said property under a decree of foreclosure by the court having competent jurisdiction. The trust company pursued the latter method. For the purposes of this case the instrument was treated as a mortgage and foreclosed as such, and therefore the question of whether this instrument was, technically, a deed of trust or a mortgage is not controlling here

On September 13, 1917, a judgment and decree of foreclosure and sale was made and entered in the foreclosure action. This judgment contained a provision that, immediately, upon the execution of the commissioner's certificate of sale, he should deliver his deed to the purchaser for the property sold, and that from and after the delivery of the deed the defendants in the foreclosure action and all persons claiming under them should be barred and foreclosed of all right, title, and interest, lien, or claim, or equity of redemption in and to the property. No appeal was taken from this judgment. The commissioner appointed by the court sold the property, and it was purchased by the defendant and appellant herein for $9,960. As directed by said decree, the commissioner executed a certificate of sale, and immediately thereafter executed and delivered to the defendant and appellant herein his deed as commissioner, which deed constitutes defendant's claim to title.

Plaintiff's claim to the property arises by reason of the fact that through successive transfers he acquired the rights in the property, if any, which existed in favor of the mortgagor under the deed of trust or mortgage given to the Union Trust Company. On October 2, 1918, one Tuchsen, plaintiff's predecessor in interest in said rights, if any, tendered to the defendant and appellant herein (the purchaser at the foreclosure sale) a sufficient sum to redeem the property if the sale was one subject to redemption, which tender was refused. On the following day Tuchsen conveyed any interest which he had in the property to the present plaintiff, who relied on said tender to divest the defendant and appellant herein of title, and brought the present action in ejectment, thus collaterally attacking the judgment in the foreclosure action which had cut off the right of redemption.

The trial court gave judgment for the plaintiff upon the theory that the decree of strict foreclosure, without allowing the right of redemption, rendered in the former action, was void because it was violative of sections 700a, 701, and 702, Code of Civil Procedure. The defendant has appealed from this judgment, and advances numerous ingenious arguments to sustain its first contention, which is that the portion of the judgment in the foreclosure action barring the right of redemption was proper.

The second contention of appellant is that, even if the decree in the foreclosure action was erroneous in barring the right of redemption, the error was one that could only be taken advantage of upon appeal, and did not render the judgment void so as to subject it to collateral attack.

[1] It is not necessary to discuss the arguments advanced by appellant in support of its first contention; it is sufficient for us to say that sections 700a, 701, and 702 of the Code of Civil Procedure are applicable to the situation presented in the foreclosure proceedings. The sale was of real property, and could only be made subject to redemption. Anthony v. Janssen, 183 Cal. 329, 334, 191 Pac. 538.

The second contention of appellant offers a more serious problem. Some authorities from other jurisdictions would seem to sustain the appellant's position, and it is elementary, of course, that judgments of courts of competent jurisdiction may not be collaterally attacked for mere errors or irregularities. However, in the present case, the judgment barring the right of redemption presents more than a mere irregularity; it was beyond the power of the court. It was said in the case of Anthony v. Janssen, supra:

"The direction in the decree that the deed should be made immediately after the sale was contrary to the Code and beyond the power of the court. It was, therefore, void."

In the case of Sache v. Gillette, 101 Minn. 169, 112 N. W. 386, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 803, 118 Am. St. Rep. 612, 11 Ann. Cas. 348, it was stated that, while the courts were not in full harmony as to what constitutes a mere irregularity in judgments, nevertheless—

"proceedings outside the authority of the court, or in violation or contravention of statutory prohibitions, are, whether the court have jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter of the action or proceedings, or not, utterly void. In re Simmons, 62 Ala. 417; In re Gibson, 31 Cal. 619, 91 Am. Dec. 546; Barton v. Saunders, 16 Or. 51, 16 Pac. 921, 8 Am. St. Rep. 261. The mere fact that the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of an action * * * does not justify an exercise of a power not authorized by law, or a grant of relief to one of the parties the law declares shall not be granted. * * * Although every exercise of power not possessed by a court will not necessarily render its action nullity, it is clear that every final act, in the form of a judgment or decree, granting relief the law declares shall not be granted, is void, even when collaterally called in question. * * * The case of Ritchie v. Sayers (C. C.) 100 Fed. 520, involved a collateral attack on a judgment, and the court after referring to the rule as generally stated in the books, namely, that the judgment of a court having jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter of the action is conclusive and cannot be collaterally called into question, said: 'That may be conceded. But the question is, Did it have jurisdiction to enter the particular decree and judgment that it did enter? As we have before seen, we reach the conclusion that the particular judgment could not be entered; and it is a well-settled principle that, although a court may have jurisdiction of a case, yet, if it appears from the record that it did not have jurisdiction to enter the particular decree and judgment, it may be collaterally attacked."—citing U. S. v. Walker, 109 U. S. 258, 3 Sup. Ct. 277, 27 L. Ed. 927; Ex parte Nielsen, 131 U. S. 176, 9 Sup. Ct. 672, 33 L. Ed. 118; Ex parte Cuddy, 131 U. S. 280, 9 Sup. Ct. 703, 33 L. Ed. 154; Folger v. Insurance Co., 99 Mass. 267, 96 Am. Dec. 747; Seamster v. Blackstock, 83 Va. 232, 2 S. E. 36, 5 Am. St. Rep. 562. * * *"

In said case of Sache v. Gillette, supra, the court considered carefully the authorities which hold that a judgment giving relief in excess of that warranted by the statute is merely irregular and not void, but concluded that—

"The weight of authority sustains the proposition that at common law the judgment is void for want of jurisdiction. In fact, it may be said our statute created no new rule on the subject, but merely adopted that existing at common law. It is laid down in Black on Judgments, 242, as a general principle, that, in addition to jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter of the action, it is necessary to the validity of a judgment that the court should have had jurisdiction of the precise question which the judgment assumes to decide, or the particular remedy or relief which it assumes to grant. Support for this doctrine is found in numerous well-considered cases. * * * The tendency of the courts to enlarge the definition of 'jurisdiction,' by many text-writers and judges seemingly limited to authority over the subject-matter and parties, is referred to in Newman v. Bullock, 23 Colo. 217, 47 Pac. 379, with the statement that it should, properly defined, include, not only power to hear and determine, 'but power to render the particular judgment in the particular case.'"

"A judgment may be collaterally attacked where the court had jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter of the action, but did not have jurisdiction of the question which the judgment assumes to determine or power to grant the particular relief which it assumes to afford to the litigants." 15 R. C. L. § 327.

[2] We conclude that the judgment in the foreclosure proceeding, in so far as it barred the right of redemption, was void and subject to collateral attack. The only evidence relied upon by defendant in support of its claim was the deed of the sheriff executed and delivered to the defendant on the day of the sale, one year before the period of redemption had expired. Its admission in evidence was objected to by plaintiff at the time of the trial on the ground that it was void.

[3] It is admitted that plaintiff's predecessor in interest made a valid and sufficient tender for redemption if the property was subject to redemption. This was sufficient to divest any title which the defendant had. Leet v. Armbruster, 143 Cal. 663, 77 Pac. 653. The plaintiff was entitled to recover in an action in ejectment. Lett v. Armbruster, supra.

GRANGE v. JUDAH BOAS CO. (Civ. 4365.)

1. Corporations 🔑404(2)—President has no authority by virtue of office to pledge property.

The president of a corporation has no authority merely by virtue of his office to pledge the property of a corporation.

Opinion of Supreme Court Denying Hearing.

2. Bonds 🔑93—Person receiving bonds in good faith in ordinary course of business as security for pre-existing debt is "holder for value."

One who received bonds in good faith in the ordinary course of business as security for a pre-existing debt became a "holder for value," even though the pledge was not in fact valid, the bonds were not negotiable, and the pledgee did not forbear or agree to forbear in consideration of the pledge.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Holder for Value.]

3. Estoppel 🔑75—Expressly authorized pledge by agent held not to be defeated by owner.

Where plaintiff had given his agent a power of attorney to mortgage, hypothecate, and in every manner deal with choses in action and other property in possession or in action, he thereby expressly authorized him to pledge corporate bonds, so as to be within the rule of Civ. Code, § 2991, that one who has allowed another to assume the apparent ownership of property for the purpose of making any transfer of it cannot set up his own title to defeat a pledge of the property made by the other to a pledgee who received it in good faith in the ordinary course of business and for value.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Clarence Grange against the Judah Boas Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed in District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

A. L. Weil and Harris F. Shaw, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Walter H. Linforth, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The trial court awarded a money judgment against the defendant, and the defendant has appealed and has brought up a bill of exceptions.

An understanding of the points made requires that we go back to the year 1912 to commence. In that year R. B. Hanford, W. S. Tevis and the Hanford Investment Company were each engaged in the business of dealing in securities. The Hanford Investment Company had three directors, the two individuals just named, and Miss O'Connell. At that time, and during the years following, Mr. Tevis was president and Mr. Hanford was vice president, or Mr. Hanford was president and Mr. Tevis was vice president; but during the same period of time Miss O'Connell was secretary. During the same period of time Miss O'Connell was the private secretary to Mr. Hanford and was the private secretary to Mr. Tevis. She had the combination to the safe in which were the valuable and confidential papers of Mr. Hanford and Mr. Tevis and of the corporation. During all the times mentioned the corporation and both of those men had numerous interests and each and all were heavily indebted. Their debts were evidenced by promissory notes held by numerous banks and by certain private individuals. Many of the notes were secured by corporate securities pledged to secure the same. When their affairs stood in this condition, they employed the plaintiff to take care of their outstanding obligations and to pay pressing creditors by negotiating loans from other persons, and also by making such arrangements with the creditors as from time to time became necessary to prevent suits and attachments. In transacting this business the plaintiff was to advance out of his own funds certain moneys and repay himself from time to time when the financial affairs of said persons would permit the repayment. In transacting the business the plaintiff took up certain obligations and detached the securities pledged to secure the same, and from time to time pledged those securities with the same or other creditors on other obligations. The plaintiff testified that R. G. Hanford, W. S. Tevis, and the Hanford Investment Company jointly and severally authorized the plaintiff to hold the securities so taken up to secure the plaintiff for advances made by him. The plaintiff testified in this connection that he never saw a resolution of the Hanford Investment Company authorizing any one to make a pledge of its securities, and the plaintiff did not testify, and there is no evidence in the record to the effect that any officer of the Hanford Investment Company was ever authorized to pledge any of its securities.

On July 2, 1912, Albert Hanford delivered to the Hanford Investment Company, among other debentures, five bonds, Nos. 1671–1675, of the United Light & Power Company, which delivery was evidenced by a writing as follows:

> "Received from Albert Hanford thirty-five six per cent. first mortgage United Light & Power bonds, par $1,000 each, numbered 1671 to 1675 inclusive; six Natomas Consolidated of California, seconds, numbered 479 to 484 inclusive; six Natomas Consolidated of California, seconds, numbered 463 to 468 inclusive. These bonds are a temporary loan to the Hanford Investment Company to be returned within a short time and not later than thirty days from date. In case of the death of Albert Hanford they are to be returned immediately to his estate.
> "Hanford Investment Company,
> "By William S. Tevis."

The above letter was never exhibited to Mr. Grange until he saw the same in the courtroom during the trial of this case.

In taking up one of Mr. Tevis' outstanding debts, the plaintiff came into possession of the five bonds just mentioned and the equity in which is the subject of this suit. At no time did Mr. Tevis, Mr. Hanford, or the Hanford Investment Company make any indorsement on the bonds, or execute or deliver to the plaintiff any writing in the nature of a blank indorsement, a blank assignment, a bill of sale, or other paper evidencing or indicating a transfer of the bonds.

While the bonds were so in the possession of the plaintiff, he received a summons to the bedside of his wife, who was sick in Europe. When that summons was received, and for some weeks prior thereto, the employers of Mr. Grange had been negotiating with Mr. Moore for the financing of the United Light & Power Company. That arrangement contemplated that all of the bonds of the United Light & Power Company would be called in, and other securities issued in lieu thereof. He prepared a letter dated April 11, 1914, and delivered it to Miss O'Connell. That letter was as follows:

> "San Francisco, April 11, 1914.
> "Hanford Investment Company, San Francisco, Cal. Attention of Miss O'Connell. Gentlemen: Herewith I am handing you securities, bonds and stocks, received by me as collateral security for the joint indebtedness of yourselves, R. G. Hanford and William S. Tevis. These securities are to be held by you in trust for me subject to the disposition, however, by your company for the following purposes.
> "Bonds of your subsidiary companies are to be used, if necessary, for exchange under the Moore agreement. Any of the securities may be redeemed at market from my lien. Any moneys received by you you will please deposit to my credit in bank. Any securities received in exchange kindly hold until my return.
> "The object of this deposit with you is to prevent any embarrassment should these securities be needed before my return from Europe.
> "Yours very truly."

At the time that the letter was delivered, there was a locked tin box in the safe which had contained the securities which had been in the possession of Mr. Grange, and that box was marked "C. Grange." In that safe was also a drawer which had been used by Mr. Grange and which also had written thereon "C. Grange."

At the same time that the letter was handed to Miss O'Connell, Mr. Grange handed to her a bunch of securities, including the bonds above mentioned. He testified:

> "I gave them to her as the Hanford Investment Company. I deposited them with the Hanford Investment Company."

The witness also testified that he asked her to take care of them. He did not testify that she consented to do so, or that she made any promise to him, or entered into any agreement with him of or concerning the custody of the papers. About that same time, whether as part of the same transaction or a few hours afterwards, the witness testified:

> "When I went to Europe I gave the key to the drawer to Miss O'Connell. I don't know who got the key to the box. I gave it to somebody. It was not Mr. Tevis."

Whether preceding or following the conversation between Mr. Grange and Miss O'Connell does not appear; but, nevertheless, shortly before Mr. Grange left for Europe he executed a general power of attorney appointing Mr. W. S. Tevis his attorney in fact. The instrument is altogether broad and contains no restrictions or limitations. He also prepared a letter of even date therewith, which is as follows:

> "Mr. William S. Tevis, San Francisco, Calif. —Dear Sir: Inclosed herewith I am handing you my power of attorney which is absolute in form and detail. Should you have occasion to make use of the authority contained therein, I would ask that you act for me as you know I would were I here.
> "Any cash arising out of the sale of real estate deposit in a special account in some bank or banks in San Francisco, subject to my order and your own under the authority of the power of attorney.
> "Should the Union Land Company, that Hanford Investment Company, or any other of your subsidiary institutions desire to repurchase from me any of the lands I obtained from the Union Land Company, see that an adequate price is paid for lands so conveyed, either in cash or securities convertible at an early date; bearing in mind that I have still unliquidated paper outstanding in a very large amount for money borrowed for the benefit of yourself and Mr. Hanford.
> "Yours very truly, C. Grange."

Thereafter he delivered the power of attorney and the letter just quoted to Mr. W. S. Tevis.

Some time prior to his departure for Europe, among other financial transactions which the plaintiff conducted, was one with the defendant, the Judah Boas Company. The plaintiff called on that company and negotiated a loan for Mr. Tevis. He delivered to that company the promissory notes of Mr. Tevis and certain securities in pledge. During all of the times that we have mentioned the plaintiff had in his employ, as an accounting and financial agent, a Mr. Crook. Although Mr. Crook was the personal agent of Mr. Grange in Mr. Grange's office in the Merchants' National Bank building, he also attended him in the offices of the Hanford Investment Company, and whether Mr. Grange was in San Francisco or elsewhere, Mr. Crook acted as the personal representative of Mr. Grange.

After Mr. Grange had left San Francisco, the Judah Boas Company notified Mr. W. S. Tevis that additional securities should be deposited with it to protect that company from loss on the loan made to Mr. Tevis. Thereafter Mr. Tevis directed Mr. Crook to take out of the package of securities which Mr. Grange had handed to Miss O'Connell, the bonds in question, and also directed him to deliver the bonds to the Judah Boas Company. Mr. Crook did as he was directed, and in doing so he did not exhibit or mention to the appellant the existence of the power of attorney, or any one of the letters above set forth, or an instrument in writing evidencing a transfer. This suit was commenced to recover the amount of the alleged equity of the plaintiff in and to these bonds.

In his complaint the plaintiff alleged "that prior to the 11th day of April, 1914, there was delivered and pledged to plaintiff by the owner thereof, for the purpose of securing the payment to him of an indebtedness," etc., the bonds above mentioned. The second finding made by the trial court, and which is the only finding in response to the plaintiff's allegation, is as follows:

> "That prior to the 11th day of April, 1914, there was delivered and pledged to plaintiff by the Hanford Investment Company, for the purpose of securing the payment to plaintiff of a joint indebtedness of the said Hanford Investment Company, W. S. Tevis and R. G. Hanford, the above-mentioned bonds."

[1] From what we have quoted from the record it is patent that the Hanford Investment Company never made any pledge to the plaintiff. The most that can be said is that the record purports to show a pledge by the president of that corporation, but that officer merely by virtue of his office has no power to pledge the property of the corporation. Black v. Harrison Home Co., 155 Cal. 121, 99 Pac. 494; 14a C. J. p. 464, §§ 2321, 2322.

It is clear that the plaintiff entertained the opinion that Miss O'Connell became his confidential fiduciary agent to take and hold the bonds as against Mr. W. S. Tevis and the Hanford Investment Company. We think he is mistaken as to any rights flowing to him out of this feature of the case. In the first place, he does not state in his testimony that she agreed to so act; in the second place, she states most positively that she never entered into any such agreement; and, in the third place, she was the confidential agent of the Hanford Investment Company and of Mr. Hanford and of Mr. Tevis. The record is all one way to the effect that whatever conversation was held between Mr. Grange and Miss O'Connell, the same was not in the presence or hearing of Mr. Tevis or of Mr. Hanford, and was never brought to their attention. Under those circumstances, conceding that Mr. Grange had attempted to impose on Miss O'Connell a trust in his favor, adverse to the trust already imposed on her in behalf of her beneficiary, the Hanford Investment Company, such an attempted arrangement would be wholly illegal. Civ. Code, §§ 1992, 2230–2234. Mr. Grange never claimed to be the owner of the bonds. The most he ever claimed was a special property right based solely on the theory of a valid pledge by the Hanford Investment Company. There was no such pledge, and the second finding, therefore, is wholly unsustained by the evidence.

Mr. Grange returned from Europe about the 9th day of July, 1914. Almost immediately thereafter he was fully informed regarding the pledge of the bonds to the appellant. He testified that he made a demand on Judah Boas (now deceased), for the return of the bonds. He testified that he demurred to Mr. W. S. Tevis regarding the pledge of the bonds, and that he would proceed to recover possession of the bonds, and that Mr. Tevis stated that within a short time the United Light & Power Company would be financed, and that thereupon $75,000 would be paid to Mr. Grange. Both for the months of July and August of 1914 Mr. Grange paid to the appellant the interest on the obligation for which the bonds had been pledged. Furthermore, there was evidence to the effect that a short time after the plaintiff returned from Europe another demand for further security was made by the appellant. In response to that demand Mr. Grange attended at the office of the appellant, and appellant's officer showed him that there was a great depreciation in the securities which it held. Mr. Ben Boas testified:

> "At that time we went over the list of the securities that we had in our possession. He didn't claim any of the securities that we had belonged to him at that time."

The five bonds were deposited with the appellant in consideration of forbearance on appellant's part. The appellant did forbear. The plaintiff and the plaintiff's principal accepted and retained the consideration with full notice of all of the facts. Moreover, when with notice that his securities had been pledged for the debt of Mr. W. S. Texis, Mr. Grange thereafter attended at the office of the appellant and paid interest accruing subsequent to the date of the alleged unauthorized pledge, such acts on his part constituted evidence proving, or tending to prove, a ratification of the alleged unauthorized act. The appellant pleaded ratification as a defense. True it is that the defense, as pleaded, might have been subject to a demurrer as not being properly pleaded; but no demurrer was interposed. A reading of the record shows that the case was tried on the theory that the defense had been sufficiently pleaded. The trial court should have made a finding on the issue. However, there is no finding that purports to cover the subject.

The appellant makes many other contentions, but in view of what we have said we do not find it necessary to take up and consider other points made in the briefs.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. Upon petition to have the above-entitled cause heard and determined by this court after judgment in the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 2.

[2, 3] For the purposes hereof the validity of the following contentions urged by respondent in support of this application may be conceded: That there was a valid pledge of the bonds in question from the Hanford Investment Company to plaintiff; that the bonds were not negotiable instruments under the law in effect at the time of their issuance; that the defendant did not forbear or agree to forbear, in consideration of the pledge of the bonds to it; that there was no ratification by plaintiff of the act of Tevis in pledging the bonds to defendant. Nevertheless the defendant, having received the bonds in good faith in the ordinary course of business, as security for a pre-existing debt, became thereby a holder for value. Smitton v. McCullough, 182 Cal. 530, 537, 538, 189 Pac. 686, and cases there cited. The plaintiff by his power of attorney to Tevis expressly authorized the latter "* * * to bargain and agree for, buy, sell, mortgage, hypothecate, and in any and every way and manner deal in and with * * * choses in action and other property in possession or in action." Therefore Tevis, in hypothecating the bonds to defendant for his benefit, is not to be regarded in law as a thief who stole them, but as an agent who, while violating his obligation to his principal, was nevertheless acting in the course and within the scope of his agency. The case is thus brought within the rule that—

> "One who has allowed another to assume the apparent ownership of property for the purpose of making any transfer of it, cannot set up his own title, to defeat a pledge of the property, made by the other, to a pledgee who received the property in good faith, in the ordinary course of business, and for value." C. C. § 2991.

This rule is but an application of the equitable doctrine of estoppel, one of the expressions of which is found in the maxim that—

> "Where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he, by whose negligence it happened, must be the sufferer." C. C. § 3543; National Bank of San Mateo v. Whitney, 181 Cal. 202, 205, 183 Pac. 789, 8 A. L. R. 298; Brittan v. Oakland Bank of Savings, 124 Cal. 282, 289, 57 Pac. 84, 71 Am. St. Rep. 58.

For these reasons, the judgment of the trial court in favor of the plaintiff was properly reversed, and the petition is therefore denied.

FLYNN et al. v. FINK et al. (Civ. 4073.)

1. Trial 🔑5—Duty of court to insist upon cases being heard as promptly as possible.

It is the duty of the trial judge, in the absence of some weighty reason to the contrary, to vigorously insist upon cases being heard and determined with as great promptness as the exigencies of the case will permit.

2. Attorney and client 🔑75(1)—Litigants have not absolute right to change of counsel if it necessitates a continuance.

Litigants have not an absolute right to insist upon a change of counsel where such a change requires a continuance in order that the case may be properly prepared for trial.

3. Continuance 🔑7—Largely, if not entirely, at discretion of judge.

The granting or denial of a motion for continuance rests largely, if not entirely, within the discretion of the judge.

4. Continuance 🔑20(3)—Denial of held not abuse of discretion.

Where it appeared that counsel, of whom there were two in the firm at the time of accepting defendants' case, being substituted for the attorney of record five days before the case was set for trial, knew that another trial in which they were engaged would not end in time to allow them to appear for defendants, held, that a denial of a continuance by the court was not an abuse of discretion.

5. Appeal and error 🔑966(1)—Continuance 🔑7—Duty of trial judge to work out justice; his action within sound discretion final.

On a motion for continuance, it is the duty of the trial judge, which the law presumes he will faithfully perform, to work out justice, and his action in the exercise of a sound discretion is final, and cannot be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. S. Crail, Judge.

Action by William A. Flynn and another, copartners doing business under the firm name of the Venice Sanitary Plumbing & Sheet Metal Works, against D. Fink and others, copartners doing business under the firm name of the Venice Barbecue Meat Company. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Smith & Breslin, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Dennison & Towner, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. The matter before the court on this appeal from the judgment arises out of the refusal by the judge of the lower court to postpone the date of trial. The facts are as follows: On July 7, 1921, the action was set for trial on the 1st day of December of the same year. On November 26, 1921, which would be five days before the date for the trial of this case, the firm of Smith & Breslin was substituted as attorneys for defendants, but the notice of substitution was not served on the attorneys for plaintiffs until the 30th day of November. On the day when the case was set for trial, to wit, December 1st, the attorneys representing defendants moved for a continuance without first having given the attorneys for plaintiffs any notice of their intention so to do. When the case was called for trial at 10 o'clock a. m., the reason given to the court for the continuance was that the attorneys representing defendants were then engaged in the trial of an action in another department of the superior court; that the case in which they were then engaged had been on trial for a considerable time and would in all probability last a period of a week or ten days longer. On being interrogated by the court, Mr. Smith, of the firm of Smith & Breslin, stated that his firm was engaged in the case on trial in the other department at the time they were substituted as attorneys for defendants, and that they knew at the time of the substitution that they would not be able to conclude the case that was then on trial in the other department by the date set for the case in which a continuance was sought. The court temporarily denied the motion, but continued the case until 2 o'clock p. m. on the same day, at which time attorneys for defendants again appeared in court and filed a formal motion and affidavit for continuance, which motion was denied by the court, and defendants and their counsel thereupon left the courtroom. Evidence was then introduced on behalf of plaintiffs, and judgment was ordered in their favor and against defendants in the sum prayed for in the complaint.

or proceedings of any sort be permitted to drag by reason of successive continuances, the calendars of the courts will become crowded and congested. Lawyers, litigants, and witnesses will be inconvenienced by reason of the inability of the courts to hear cases on the day on which they may be set for trial with the result that in meritorious instances cases actually ready for trial will not proceed, and the various interested parties will be obliged to return to court on another or perhaps a third or fourth continuance before the action may be determined—all of which often means great loss and hardship to the parties to the action, as well as to witnesses therein. Another consequence which may frequently appear is that, with knowledge of the fact that successive continuances may be had, the lawyers on either side may fail to properly prepare for trial either in matters of law or as to the production of witnesses by whom the facts are to be established, in which event the administration of justice may be greatly embarrassed or hindered, if not altogether thwarted. It therefore becomes and is a part of the bounden duty of the trial judge, in the absence of some weighty reason to the contrary, to vigorously insist upon cases being heard and determined with as great promptness as the exigencies of the case will permit.

[2] Parties litigant have no absolute right to insist upon a change of counsel at the last moment before the time set for the commencement of the trial, where such change of counsel requires a continuance in order that the case may be properly prepared for trial. Such a course, if permitted and if persisted in, might and probably would in many cases work the destruction of private rights of the opposing litigant and would be subversive of the "prompt administration and execution of the laws, upon which depends largely their effectiveness." There are many California cases dealing with the question presented on this appeal.

[3] It has been almost universally held that the granting or denial of a motion for continuance rests largely, if not entirely, within the discretion of the judge before whom the motion may be made. In Baumberger v. Arff, 96 Cal. 262, 31 Pac. 53, a motion for continuance was made on the ground of the absence of the attorney who was then engaged in the trial of a case in another court. In the course of the opinion the court said:

> "The plaintiff did not have an absolute right to a continuance because of the absence of his attorney, but the motion was one which was to be disposed of in the sound discretion of the court, and in view of all the circumstances then made to appear."

In Haight v. Green, 19 Cal. 113, it was held that, where an attorney who was engaged to conduct the defense, but who for two or three days previous to the date fixed for the trial had been engaged as counsel in another case, and consequently was not present when the appealed case was called for trial, "the discretion of the court below cannot be reviewed in its refusal to set aside the judgment for the cause assigned—the absence of the attorney at the time of trial." In the criminal case of People v. Collins, 75 Cal. 411, 17 Pac. 430, it was held that—

> "The defendant's motion for a continuance on the ground that his counsel had been unable, in consequence of another and prior engagement, to make due preparation for the trial of defendant's case, was one which addressed itself to the sound discretion of the court below, and ought not to be interfered with unless we could see clearly that there had been an abuse of discretion."

And in another criminal case, where one of defendant's counsel was engaged in a civil case in another department of the superior court, it was said:

> "To hold that a defendant charged with crime has an absolute right to counsel of his own selection, with unlimited right to insist upon continuances of his trial, and that the court, jury, and witnesses must await the convenience of his counsel in fulfilling other engagements, would be subversive of the prompt administration and execution of the laws—upon which depends largely their effectiveness—and subject the time and service of citizens serving the state gratuitously, as jurors and witnesses, to the wishes and interest of the attorney engaged in the defense." People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 341, 19 Pac. 167.

And see, also, the following cases: Musgrove v. Perkins, 9 Cal. 212; People v. De Lacey, 28 Cal. 590; Kern Valley Bank v. Chester, 55 Cal. 49; People v. Warren, 130 Cal. 678, 63 Pac. 87; Peachy v. Witter, 131 Cal. 319, 63 Pac. 468; Estate of Kasson, 141 Cal. 33, 74 Pac. 436; Sheldon v. Landwehr, 159 Cal. 780, 116 Pac. 44; Abrook v. Ellis, 6 Cal. App. 451, 92 Pac. 396; Boehm v. Gibson, 4 Cal. Unrep. 483, 35 Pac. 1014.

[4] In this case plaintiffs sought compensation on account of labor performed and materials furnished. The affidavit submitted on the motion shows that at the time they were retained counsel for defendants fully understood the situation with reference to the nature of the action, as well as to the time the case was set for trial, and of course were familiar with their own engagements. There were two members of the firm of attorneys for defendants, and it is not beyond the realm of reason to infer that one of them might well have been spared from the case in which they were engaged in trial long enough to properly present the defense in the instant case.

[5] On a motion for a continuance of the trial of a case it is the duty of the trial judge, which the law presumes he will faithfully perform, to work out the justice of the situation; his action in the exercise of a sound discretion is final and cannot be disturbed. Nothing appears in this case to indicate that the judge before whom the action was tried was not earnestly endeavoring to do his full duty in the premises. There was no abuse of discretion.

The judgment is affirmed.

MARBLEHEAD LAND CO. et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 4143.)

1. Eminent domain 🔑264—Service of writ unnecessary where officers acting under suspended orders giving possession knew thereof.

Where state officers constructing a highway under orders giving possession of land to be condemned before the final decree was entered knew of the issuance of a writ of review which contained the provision authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 1071, requiring the parties to desist from further proceedings in the matter under review, it was immaterial that they had not been formally served with a duly authenticated copy of the writ.

2. Eminent domain 🔑264—Highway officers in possession under order pending condemnation are "persons acting under the orders."

State officers who have entered upon premises sought to be condemned for highway purposes and are constructing the highway thereon after an order had been entered giving the right to such possession on deposit of security before the decree ascertaining the damages are "persons acting under the orders" giving possession so as to be subject to the provision in a writ of review prohibiting such persons from so acting until the final determination of the writ.

3. Eminent domain 🔑187—Court has jurisdiction and control over property in possession of condemnor before decree.

Where possession of premises sought to be condemned for a highway is granted in accordance with Const. art. 1, § 14, as amended in 1918, upon the deposit of proper securities for the payment of compensation which may be awarded by the final decree, the property is in the possession and control of the court to the same extent as personal property impounded by it to await the outcome of a suit, and the court has power to regulate such control.

4. Eminent domain 🔑187—Possession not ordered unless security deposited is sufficient.

Under Const. art. 1, § 14, as amended in 1918, requiring the plaintiffs in a condemnation suit to give such security as the court may direct in such amounts as it may determine to be reasonably adequate to secure to the owner the immediate payment of just compensation, defendant cannot be deprived of the possession and use of his property unless the deposit of money be made and maintained under the orders of the court at such an amount as will adequately secure to him the payment of the compensation found by the decree of condemnation to be just.

5. Eminent domain 🔑187—Acts in constructing highway under order for possession before decree are "proceedings" under that order.

Acts by the state highway officers in constructing a highway upon property sought to be condemned under orders giving possession of the property before final decree are proceedings under the orders giving possession, since a proceeding in court is an act done by the authority or direction of the court, express or implied.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Proceeding.]

6. Certiorari 🔑47—Persons not parties to proceedings for review may be punished for violating supersedeas.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1070, authorizing writ of review to be directed to the inferior tribunal, board, or officer whose proceedings are sought to be reviewed, so that persons acting under the orders which are sought to be reviewed are not parties thereto, it would be impossible to enforce the order superseding the proceedings under the orders sought to be reviewed inserted in the writ as authorized by sections 1071 and 1072 if proceedings for contempt were limited to the parties to the writ of review, and therefore any persons violating the supersedeas order may be punished for contempt, though not parties to the writ of review.

7. Contempt 🔑72 — Officers acting in good faith under advice of counsel not substantially punished.

Where the officers of the state highway department acted in good faith under advice of counsel in proceeding with the construction of a highway under orders giving possession in condemnation proceedings, notwithstanding a writ to review such orders, only a nominal punishment need be imposed upon them.

Petition by the Marblehead Land Company and others against the Superior Court in and for the County of Los Angeles and Frank R. Willis, a Judge thereof, for writ of supersedeas and for an order punishing A. B. Fletcher and others for contempt of court in violating a writ of review. Motion for supersedeas denied, and Fletcher and others adjudged guilty of contempt.

Grant Jackson, Nathan Newby, and Newby & Palmer, all of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Lorrin Andrews, of Los Angeles, for A. B. Fletcher, N. D. Darlington, C. A. Whitmore, and G. C. Mansfield, persons sought to be punished as for a contempt of court.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Lorrin Andrews, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, J. The two matters now awaiting our disposition arise out of an application for a writ of review, and the title above set forth is the title of the proceeding for review. In order that our ruling upon the two specific matters which now engage our attention may be thoroughly understood, it will be necessary for us to state with some particularity the questions of fact and law which are involved in the original proceeding for the writ of review.

The present Constitution of California has always contained a provision to the effect that—

> "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having first been made to, or paid into court for, the owner, and no right of way shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation, other than municipal until full compensation therefor be first made in money or ascertained and paid into court for the owner, irrespective of any benefits from any improvement proposed by such corporation, which compensation shall be ascertained by a jury, unless a jury be waived, as in other civil cases in a court of record, as shall be prescribed by law." Const. art. 1, sec. 14.

In fact, this language was the entire text of the section as originally adopted. In 1911 the section was amended in a respect which is not of moment in the present litigation. In 1918 a second amendment was adopted. This amendment opens with the original text as above set forth, the time-honored language being followed immediately by these provisions:

> "Provided, that in an action in eminent domain brought by the state, or a county, or a municipal corporation, or a drainage, irrigation, levee, or reclamation district, the aforesaid state or political subdivision thereof or district may take immediate possession and use of any right of way required for a public use whether the fee thereof or an easement therefor be sought upon first commencing eminent domain proceedings according to law in a court of competent jurisdiction and thereupon giving such security in the way of money deposits as the court in which such proceedings are pending may direct, and in such amounts as the court may determine to be reasonably adequate to secure to the owner of the property sought to be taken immediate payment of just compensation for such taking and any damage incident thereto, including damages sustained by reason of an adjudication that there is no necessity for taking the property, as soon as the same can be ascertained according to law. The court may, upon motion of any party to said eminent domain proceedings, after such notice to the other parties as the court may prescribe, alter the amount of such security so required in such proceedings."

The section now stands as it was amended in 1918.

On December 13, 1922, the people of the state of California, by the department of public works of the state of California, as plaintiff, filed complaint in eminent domain with respondent superior court. All the petitioners before us for the writ of review were defendants in that action, as were also county of Los Angeles, Reider-Haag Company, a corporation, and eight fictitiously named persons. By the complaint the plaintiff in the action sought to condemn a right of way 19 miles in length for a state highway across that extensive tract of land familiarly known as the Rancho Malibu. After the filing of the complaint, and upon motion to that end, respondent superior court made its two certain orders in the action, each dated December 13, 1922. The first of these, after reciting the fact that the complaint had been filed, and various other matters, including a description of the right of way sought to be condemned, ordered "that the plaintiff * * * deposit in" a certain named bank "the sum of $32,180 in a savings account on interest, which sum is to be placed in a special deposit to be paid out only upon the order of the court herein, and to be held as security for payment to the owner or owners of the property sought to be taken as just compensation for the taking of the parcel of land, and any damage incident thereto, including damages sustained by reason of any adjudication that there is no necessity for taking the property as soon as the same can be ascertained according to law," and also "that upon satisfying the court that such deposit has been made in accordance with this order the said plaintiff shall be given an order by the court authorizing it to take immediate possession and use of the right of way hereinabove referred to, and described." The second order, after reciting that it satisfactorily appeared to the court that the deposit required by the first order had been made, was to the effect "that the said plaintiff, the state of California, may take immediate possession and use of the right of way described in the complaint and in said order, and which said right of way is described, as follows: [Here followed a description of the right of way.]" It is these two orders which are the subject of the application for the writ of review, and, as we have already remarked, the writ issued.

Section 1071, Code of Civil Procedure, is in part as follows:

> "The writ of review must command the party to whom it is directed to certify fully to the court issuing the writ, * * * a transcript of the record and proceedings * * * that the same may be reviewed by the court; and requiring the party, in the meantime, to desist from further proceedings in the matter to be reviewed."

Section 1072 of the same enactment provides:

> "If a stay of proceedings be not intended, the words requiring the stay must be omitted from the writ; these words may be inserted or omitted, in the sound discretion of the court, but if omitted, the power of the inferior court or officer is not suspended or the proceedings stayed."

Following the mandate of these sections the writ of review which issued in the present instance was in the usual form prescribed by section 1071, containing at its close the clause:

> "And in the meantime we command and require the said respondents, and all persons acting under said orders, to desist from further proceedings in the matter so to be reviewed."

[1] We come now to a more direct consideration of the two matters which are the subject of our present inquiry. Soon after the filing of the complaint in the condemnation action and the making by the superior court of the two orders above mentioned, and pursuant to the terms of the second of those orders, certain officers of the state acting either directly or through employees of the state or of some of its departments, entered into possession of the real property covered by the right of way described in the complaint and in the orders. That possession they have maintained ever since. These officers are A. B. Fletcher, chief of the division of highways of the state of California, and N. D. Darlington, C. A. Whitmore, and G. C. Mansfield, members of the California highway commission. While the writ of review was not technically served upon these four officers, they were each made acquainted with its contents, and such admissions of service and such stipulations have been made between the various parties that it is to be deemed by us that a service of the writ was in due form made upon each of them. In other words, they are before us exactly as if formal delivery of a duly authenticated copy of the writ had been made to each of them. We shall hereafter, for convenience, therefore speak as if service had actually been made upon them. What the effect of that service was, it becomes our duty to determine.

Immediately after taking possession of the right of way the four officers began the construction of the proposed highway across the Rancho Malibu and along the proposed right of way, and they continued with the work after service upon them of the writ of review. In the prosecution of the labors incident to the construction, probably before and certainly after the service of the writ, they removed parts of the soil from place to place and effected a substantial disturbance of the surface of the country. In short, they proceeded with the work of grading necessary to an installation of the highway, making the cuts and fills incident to the prosecution of a work of that nature. Thereupon petitioners presented to this court an affidavit showing the character of the operations being conducted upon the property and asked the issuance of an order to show cause why the four officers should not be punished as for a contempt of court in violating the order for a stay of proceedings which was incorporated in the writ of review. The order to show cause was issued. To it the officers make return that they are advised by their counsel that they have the right to proceed with the construction of the highway in question, and, in effect, that it is their duty to do so, notwithstanding the clause for a stay of proceedings. Whether they are guilty of a contempt of this court is the first of the two questions to which we have referred as awaiting our disposition.

[2] As the writ of review required, in part, that "all persons acting under" the orders made by respondent court "desist from further proceedings in the matter" sought to be reviewed, it is at once apparent that a great part of our labor will be to determine whether, in carrying on the work of grading for the highway, the four state officers are acting under respondents in the matter to be reviewed. We are of the opinion that this question must be answered unfavorably to the position of the officers. It appears to us that the possession of the right of way is in respondent court, and that it will be so until the rendition of decree by that tribunal in the condemnation suit. It may not be strictly correct to say that respondent court has impounded the real property over which the proposed right of way is to pass, or has impounded the right of way itself, for the use of the word "impound," as related to judicial procedure, is usually, if not invariably, descriptive of the act or process by which a court takes possession, pending the conclusion of a litigation, of money or other personal property in controversy. Nevertheless it appears to us that under the provisions of the Constitution to which we have referred respondent court, since the making of the two orders which petitioners seek to review, in effect occupies the same position as to this real property, or as to the right of way, as does an impounding court toward the personal property which it has seized. If these views be correct, it at once follows that the state officers are acting, before decree in the condemnation suit, under respondent court as to everything they do in and about the "impounded" real property or right of way. If our views are correct, it at once also follows that the officers are acting, at least before such decree, in the matter sought by petitioners to be reviewed.

[3] We shall now state the arguments which have led us to the views above expressed. It will be observed, from a general survey of the language of the Constitution providing for the exercise of the right of eminent domain, that there was by the amendment of 1918 no attempt to authorize a taking for public use prior to condemnation decree. The order provided for by the section can neither advance nor retard the ultimate taking. The organic law merely allows to a would-be condemnor the "possession" and "use" of the land or right of way sought to be taken finally by the decree of condemnation. The nature and extent of this possession and use and the manner in which they may be controlled are ascertainable upon a more specific consideration of the language of the Constitution. The "use" allowed under the section plainly contemplates, in a given case, the prosecution of a public improvement even to completion, if sufficient time for that outcome shall elapse between the date of the order allowing possession and use and the date of decree of condemnation. Can it be possible that under such circumstances the "use" of property of which possession is taken under an order of court can be exercised by the possessor in an unbridled manner and without interference or control by the court making the order? Suppose in the present instance that those who represent the state in the construction of the highway should by mistake depart from the lines of the right of way described in the proceedings for condemnation and should prosecute the construction of the road over parts of petitioners' property not covered by the right of way really intended to be taken. Suppose that by mistake, or through bad engineering, they should construct a culvert over some waterway with an aperture so small that it could not carry the waters of the stream in time of storm, thus entailing a certainty of the flooding of property of petitioners outside the right of way, with the damage naturally consequent upon such an event. Suppose that, during the work of construction, by mistake or otherwise, they should occupy and commit waste upon property of petitioners outside the lines of the right of way. Can it be possible that in case of any of these eventualities it would not be within the jurisdiction of respondent court, upon the motion of defendants in the condemnation suit, and at any time before condemnation decree, to require the officers of the state to administer properly the "use" allowed by the court's order granting possession and use? It is well settled, of course, that after final decree in the ordinary condemnation suit a defendant may protect his property from or collect damages for such invasions or harmful acts as we have supposed may be committed in the present instance. We cite authorities to various principles of law which bear more or less directly upon this assertion. A voluminous array of cases is appended in an encyclopedic work to the statement that—

> "As a general rule, except where an exclusive remedy has been provided by statute, the owner of property appropriated or injured for a public use without just compensation having been made may maintain an action at law for the damages sustained thereby." 20 C. J. 1162.

Where one owns land abutting upon a public improvement, he may recover for such damages caused to his property by the making of the improvement as are over and above those suffered by him in common with the general public. Eachus v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 103 Cal. 614, 37 Pac. 750, 42 Am. St. Rep. 149; Smith v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 146 Cal. 164, 79 Pac. 868, 106 Am. St. Rep. 17; Sievers v. Root, 10 Cal. App. 337, 101 Pac. 925; Hunt v. Manning, 24 Cal. App. 44, 140 Pac. 39; Fairchild v. Oakland & Bay Shore Ry. Co., 176 Cal. 629, 169 Pac. 388. If a railroad company enters upon land and constructs its road before commencing condemnation proceedings, the owner of the land may recover damages for the trespass. Robinson v. Southern California Ry. Co., 129 Cal. 8, 61 Pac. 947. If one who is engaged in the construction of a line which is to be employed in the administration of a public use appropriates or commits waste upon lands outside the right of way which has been granted to or which has been condemned by him, the owner of the invaded lands may recover damages for the injury resulting. Phillips v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 71 S. C. 571, 51 S. E. 247; 20 C. J. 1164. Where the public authorities engage in the construction of a public improvement and by mistake place the structure upon private lands, the owner may recover compensation for the taking of his property, or for the damages to it, in an appropriate action. Tyler v. Tehama County, 109 Cal. 618, 42 Pac. 240. When one exercising the right of eminent domain appropriates a right of way wider than that allowed by law, the owner of the excess may recover it in an action of ejectment. McKennon v. St. Louis, etc., Ry. Co., 69 Ark. 104, 61 S. W. 383; Pfaender v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 86 Minn. 218, 90 N. W. 393; 20 C. J. 1156. Where a concern enters upon land not covered by the grant or condemnation of a right of way, for the purpose of constructing a line or plant to be used in the administration of a public use, the owner of the unlawfully occupied property may maintain trespass. 20 C. J. 1166. If a public improvement is constructed in a negligent manner, and the land of an abutting property owner is thereby damaged, he may recover for the damage done. De Baker v. Southern California Ry. Co., 106 Cal. 257, 39 Pac. 610, 46 Am. St. Rep. 237; 20 C. J. 1165. Where one seeking to exercise the right of eminent domain attempts to enter upon the land sought to be condemned before the amount of compensation to be made is ascertained and paid, the entry may be prevented by injunction. Grigsby v. Burtnett, 31 Cal. 406. "An owner may by injunction restrain the taking or injury of property not covered by the condemnation proceedings." 20 C. J. 1171. The rights of one whose property is taken or damaged after condemnation decree, or without such decree, being thus plainly stated, what are his rights before condemnation decree in such a situation as the present? Respondent court necessarily will have full jurisdiction of the condemnation suit now before it until decree rendered. It will then make disposition of the right of way sought to be acquired by the plaintiffs. Can it be that, in the meanwhile, by a mere interlocutory order for possession and use of the land covered by the right of way, it has placed the plaintiffs in such a position that they may deal with the land itself as they please and without the control or interference of the court? We think not. It is plain to us that the continuing jurisdiction of respondent court over the condemnation suit, existent until condemnation decree, includes a jurisdiction to control the possession and use of the land by plaintiffs under the orders made pursuant to the provisions of the Constitution. In a further analysis of those provisions we shall present additional reason for this view.

[4] It is to be observed that, as a prerequisite to the making of an order for possession and use, the Constitution provides that the plaintiffs in a condemnation suit shall give "such security in the way of money deposits as the court * * * may direct, and in such amounts as the court may determine to be reasonably adequate to secure to the owner * * * immediate payment of just compensation * * * as soon as the same can be ascertained according to law." It is certain that, when such money deposits are made and the consequent order for possession and use follows, the court making the order has exclusive control of the money deposited. The cash is to be deposited merely as security for the immediate payment of compensation when the amount of compensation is ascertained. For the time being neither the plaintiff nor the defendant has any right to the possession of it, and neither may exercise any control over it. If the compensation is not paid by the plaintiff to the defendant immediately, or perhaps within a reasonable time, after the amount to be paid is finally ascertained, then the court must make some order transmuting the money deposited from security into payment; that is, the cash must by appropriate order be turned over to the defendant. If the compensation be promptly paid by the plaintiff, then the court, perforce, must order the cash to be returned to the plaintiff. The money is undoubtedly in the possession and control of the court until condemnation decree, and perhaps until a reasonable time thereafter. Does it not legitimately follow that during a like period the court holds and may exercise a reciprocal control over the land included in the order for possession and use and embraced within the limits of the right of way sought to be taken? We think it does.

The language of the Constitution immediately following that just quoted is most significant:

> "The court may, upon motion of any party to said eminent domain proceedings, after such notice to the other parties as the court may prescribe, alter the amount of such security so required in such proceedings."

Suppose that in a given action in which an order for possession and use had been made the defendant should become convinced that the amount of security was inadequate and should move for an increase under this provision. Suppose that after due consideration the court should order the increase, and the plaintiff should refuse to make deposit of the added amount. It is too plain for words that in such an event it would become the immediate duty of the court to order that the possession of plaintiff should cease, that his use of the land should terminate, and that the defendant should resume the interrupted possession and control of his property. A court cannot in the first instance make its order for possession and use until an amount of money fixed by it as adequate security has been placed under the court's control. Under the sentence of the Constitution now under examination a court surely could not permit the possession and use to continue if the security became and, after order for its increase, were allowed to remain inadequate. Taking the entire provision of the Constitution on the subject, it is obvious that a defendant cannot be deprived of the possession and use of his property unless the deposit of money be maintained, under the orders of the court, at such an amount as will adequately secure to him the payment of the compensation found by the decree of condemnation to be just.

Let us take another view of the sentence quoted from the Constitution in the paragraph immediately preceding the present one. Suppose again that a defendant, the possession and use of whose property had been ordered to the plaintiff, should ask the court for an order to show cause why the amount of deposited security should not be increased. Suppose the showing made by the defendant in support of his application were so strong that it appeared to the court that it might be necessary to order the security increased in a large amount. Can it be possible under such circumstances that the court, upon an application to that end, could not direct that the "use" of the plaintiff under the order for possession and use should cease pending the hearing on the order to show cause? It appears to us to be plain that such a jurisdiction would necessarily exist under the broad principles of equity and under the constitutional guaranties incident to the taking of private property under the right of eminent domain.

[5] For the foregoing reasons it seems to us that respondent court has in effect "impounded" the real property covered by the proposed right of way, and that the four officers of the state, in exercising the "use" authorized by respondent court, are acting under the court, and that their acts are proceedings under the orders desired by petitioners to be reviewed by this court under their petition for the writ of review. In other words, we conclude from what has been said above that the four officers are guilty of a contempt of this court. We do, in addition, however, cite some general authority upon the question as to what matters constitute or are a part of proceedings in an action or under an order or a judgment of a court. In doing so, however, we shall notice but a few of the many cases on the subject which are pointed out to us by petitioners. In applying a provision of the Revised Statutes of the United States inhibiting injunctions by federal courts against "proceedings in any court of the state," it was determined that a sale of land by a sheriff under an execution issued by a state court was a proceeding in the court. The tribunal which passed upon the question, laying aside for a moment the words of the federal statute, said that—

> "The act, however tortious, of an executive officer of a court, done under color of its process, is to be regarded as a 'proceeding' of that court, which comity and public policy require courts of concurrent jurisdiction not to interfere with by injunctive or dispossessory process."

The court then held that this rule of comity and public policy was conclusive in construing the federal statute. American Association v. Hurst, 59 Fed. 1, 7 C. C. A. 598. In another case a federal court approved the language of an earlier decision to the effect that—

> "This term 'proceedings' may properly, and, I think, must necessarily, include all steps taken by the court or by its officers, under its process, from the institution of the suit until the close of the final process of execution which may issue therein." Marblehead Land Co. v. Los Angeles County (D. C.) 276 Fed. 305.

The Supreme Court of this state, in Stonesifer v. Kilburn, 94 Cal. 33, 29 Pac. 332, approved the following quotations from other cases:

> "The word [proceeding] is generally applicable to any step taken by a suitor to obtain the interposition or action of a court. * * * The term 'proceeding' is generally applicable to any step taken by a party in the progress of a civil action. Anything done from the commencement to the termination is a proceeding."

It was said in Burns v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 1, 73 Pac. 597:

> "The word 'proceeding' necessarily has different meanings, according to the context and the subject to which it relates. * * * In section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and in similar statutory provisions of other states, it has a broader signification [the court, under circumstances stated earlier in the opinion, having attributed a narrow meaning to it], and includes any step taken in a case, whether by the court or by one of the parties thereto. [Citing cases.] 'In its more general sense, in law, it means all the steps or measures adopted in the prosecution or defense of an action.' [Citing cases.] In Anderson's Law Dictionary, p. 816, it is defined thus: 'A proceeding in court is an act done by the authority or direction of the court, express or implied.'"

A consideration of these authorities affords an added justification for the views which we have already expressed, for it is plain from them that the four officers, in administering the "uses" allowed under the order of respondent court, are conducting "proceedings" under that order. They come within the two decisions of the federal courts for the reason that under the provisions of the Constitution, as we have analyzed them, the officers are in effect but the agents of respondent court in the administration of the use. They are to our minds as well within the broad lines of the quotations approved by the Supreme Court, and especially within the definition taken from Anderson's Dictionary of Law.

[6] The four officers make some points which are in effect covered by what we may have said already, but one of them seems, in addition, to merit some specific attention. After the extended discussion which we have bestowed upon the really controlling question in the case, however, we shall be brief in our treatment of the particular point now in question. It is contended that the officers may not be punished for a contempt because they are not parties to the proceeding for review. If that were so, no one could ever be punished for a violation of the terms of the supersedeas which may incontrovertibly be made part of a writ of review under sections 1071 and 1072, Code of Civil Procedure, with the single exception of cases in which the proceedings to be reviewed were those of an "officer." It is provided that—

> "The writ may be directed to the inferior tribunal, board, or officer [whose proceedings are sought to be reviewed], or to any other person having the custody of the record or proceedings sought to be certified." Code Civ. Proc. § 1070.

Where the respondent is a court or a board, the writ should not be directed to the judge of the court nor to the members of the board.

4 Cal. Jur. tit. Certiorari, § 60, and notes. Individuals who are not named in writs of injunction are frequently punished for a violation of their terms. It is necessary only that they should have acted as the agents of persons named in a writ of injunction and should have had knowledge of its existence and terms. Such, we apprehend, is the situation of the four state officers here.

The officers cite many authorities in opposition to the views which we have expressed. It will be found, however, that the cases cited by them fall into two classes: First, those in which the writ of review contained no supersedeas clause and in which the only point involved was whether the writ, without such a clause, had any effect as a supersedeas; and, second, those in which an attempt was made by writ of review, either with or without supersedeas clause, to annul or vacate some act which had been completed under the order desired to be reviewed. This case falls in neither of those classes.

[7] Although we have reached the conclusion that the four officers of the state are guilty of a contempt, we are of the opinion that their punishment should be but nominal. In exercising the "use" of the property covered by the proposed right of way, they have acted in good faith under the advice of their counsel, and in the belief that they were not within the inhibition of the supersedeas clause of the writ of review. Under all the circumstances of the case it is more important that the four officers be furnished, through this expression of our views, with a guide for their future conduct, than that they be subjected to any substantial punishment for contempt.

We now mention the second of the two questions to which we referred early in this opinion. Petitioners ask that we now issue a supersedeas to prevent the agents of the state from acting further, and until the termination of the proceeding for review, under the "use" allowed by the order of respondent court authorizing the possession and use of the land covered by the proposed right of way. This motion was made out of an abundance of caution and in view of the possibility that we might determine that the four officers were not within the supersedeas clause of the writ of review. The motion falls to the ground because of the conclusion we have reached as to the effect of the supersedeas clause.

It is ordered that A. B. Fletcher, N. D. Darlington, C. A. Whitmore, and G. C. Mansfield be, and each of them hereby is, adjudged guilty of a contempt of this court, and each of them hereby is ordered to pay a fine of $10 because thereof. The motion for an injunction or supersedeas is denied.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; CRAIG, J.

FAURE v. DROLLINGER et al. (Civ. 3827.)

1. Judgment 🔑252(2)—Where answer is filed, general relief may be granted as to either or all the defendants within issues, regardless of the prayer for relief.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 580, where an answer is filed in a case even where there are many defendants, the plaintiff's relief is not limited as to any given defendant, either to what he has asked for in his prayer for relief as against such defendant, or as to either or all the other defendants; but such relief may be granted to any party to the action as may be justified by the facts in a case provided such facts are embraced within the issues.

2. Judgment 🔑358—Form of pleading in claim and delivery held not to mislead defendant to his prejudice.

In claim and delivery, the fact that the complaint merely consisted of a statement of the facts constituting the cause of action in ordinary and concise language, together with a demand for relief, and did not formally set up the cause of action in claim and delivery, did not mislead defendant to his prejudice, within Const. art. 6, § 4½, providing that no judgment shall be set aside for errors in pleadings unless resulting in a miscarriage of justice.

3. Replevin 🔑93—Findings held to conclude defendant's contention that plaintiff was without equity.

In an action of claim and delivery for a motor truck purchased by plaintiff but delivered by defendant to another, a finding that representations had been made by another defendant to defendant that the person to whom the truck was delivered had no interest therein, and that plaintiff, when he paid his money, had no knowledge of any claim of such person to the truck or of any interest therein, when considered in connection with the pleadings, held to show that defendant was concluded in regard to his contention that plaintiff was without equity.

4. Replevin 🔑69(3)—Finding as to payments to defendant held embraced within issues.

In an action of claim and delivery for a truck purchased and partly paid for by plaintiff, but delivered by defendant to another, a finding that plaintiff had paid to a third person for defendant's benefit a certain amount was merely evidentiary of payment to defendant himself, and would be included within a general allegation of so much money paid by plaintiff to defendant, and therefore was embraced within the issues.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1071(5)—Erroneous findings on immaterial facts not sufficient to disturb judgment.

Findings on immaterial facts, although erroneous, are not sufficient to disturb a judgment.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1071(1)—Trial 🔑404 (1)—That findings of fact state conclusions of law or are not clearly conflicting will not reverse.

Findings are to be read and considered together, and, if possible, are to be reconciled so as to prevent any conflict on material points, and, unless the conflict is clear and the findings incapable of being erroneously construed, the judgment will not be reversed on the ground of a conflict in the findings, and the same is true of findings which, instead of being strictly confined to matters of fact, stated conclusions of law.

7. Trial 🔑394(1)—Statutory requirement that facts and conclusions of law must be separately stated held directory merely.

The statutory provision that the facts found and the conclusions of law must be separately stated is merely directory.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. S. Crail, Judge.

Action by Andre Faure against S. C. Drollinger and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Clark & Law, of Los Angeles (J. D. Taggart, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

J. L. Murphey, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. Appellant, Drollinger, complains of many things in connection with the judgment of the lower court; his first contention being that his general demurrer to plaintiff's complaint was overruled when it should have been sustained. He bases that conclusion on the premise that plaintiff intended to set up an alleged cause of action in claim and delivery, and he points out that in such an action possession in the defendant of the subject-matter is both a proper as well as a necessary allegation in the complaint—which allegation, it is conceded by plaintiff, is altogether lacking. But plaintiff states in effect that he had no intention of setting up a claim and delivery action; that all he attempted to do, and in fact all he did, was to conform to the Code rule of making "a statement of the facts constituting the cause of action in ordinary and concise language," together with a demand for the relief which he claimed.

[1] The only question then for this court to consider in that connection is whether the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action as against appellant, Drollinger. So far as defendant Drollinger is concerned (outside of certain admitted facts to be hereinafter noticed), the facts appearing in the complaint which affect him in the action, although stated in a somewhat involved manner, cover substantially the following allegations: Defendant Dawson made certain representations to plaintiff by which plaintiff was induced to and did enter into a contract with defendant Drollinger by which plaintiff was to purchase from Drollinger and Drollinger was to sell to plaintiff a certain auto truck on installments; that in pursuance of the terms of this agreement, plaintiff paid to Drollinger personally or for his use and benefit a certain sum of money; that without the previous knowledge or consent of plaintiff, and before the last payment was to be made under said agreement, defendant Drollinger received from one Nora Dawson the sum of $188.25, which was the amount that would shortly thereafter become due to defendant Drollinger from plaintiff on account of the purchase of said truck under the terms of said agreement, and thereupon, instead of delivering the truck to plaintiff, defendant Drollinger delivered the truck to said Nora Dawson, who immediately sold it to defendant Bedford; that plaintiff thereafter made tender to defendant Drollinger of all moneys to be paid by him to Drollinger under the terms of said agreement and demanded possession of the truck from each of the defendants, which was by each of them refused. Plaintiff's prayer covers a considerable territory, but he finally prays for general relief. Where an answer is filed in a case, even where there are many defendants, the plaintiff's relief is not limited as to any given defendant either to what he has asked for in his prayer for relief as against such defendant, or as to either or all the other defendants. Such relief may be granted to any party to the action as may be justified by the facts of the case, provided such facts are embraced within the issues. Section 580, Code Civ. Proc.; Tyler v. Mayre, 95 Cal. 169, 26 Pac. 160, 30 Pac. 196; Murphy v. Stelling, 8 Cal. App. 707, 97 Pac. 672; Hoffman v. Kirby, 136 Cal. 29, 68 Pac. 321.

[2] The record on this appeal shows that both defendant Drollinger and his counsel thoroughly understood the issues involved in the action and were fully prepared to meet them at the time of trial. Hence, although the allegations of the complaint might have been more direct and more certain, defendant Drollinger was in no wise prejudiced by reason of the manner in which the complaint was drawn. Moreover, section 4½ of article 6 of the California Constitution provides in effect, so far as this particular point is concerned, that—

> "No judgment shall be set aside, * * * for any error as to any matter of pleading, * * * unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

From an inspection of the complaint and from the reporter's transcript on appeal, as well as from the other papers in the record herein, it would appear that defendant Drollinger was in no manner misled to his prejudice by reason of the state of the pleadings. On the contrary, the case was tried, so far as Drollinger was concerned, openly and avowedly on the issues covered by allegations in effect and substance as herein set forth, and therefore from an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court is unable to discover any miscarriage of justice as a result of any error as to any matter of pleading in the case.

[3] Following appellant's brief, his next specification of error relates to a finding. Appellant states in his specification that plaintiff should not be permitted to recover if he rest his case in equity, because plaintiff knew that there was serious trouble between Dawson and his wife Nora, and that plaintiff had no right to rely upon Dawson's statement that his wife Nora had abandoned a prior agreement to purchase the truck and had returned it to Drollinger. The gist of that allegation was set up in the complaint; it was not denied by the answer of Drollinger, as will appear by appellant's specification in his opening brief, that the complaint alleges:

> "That he (Dawson) and his wife at the time were having marital difficulties which were being considered in the court, and that she had abandoned the agreement to purchase the truck and had returned it to Drollinger. These allegations are not denied by the answer of Drollinger."

Irrespective of any prior rights or interests which Mrs. Dawson may have had or claimed in the truck, she had therefore abandoned same, according to Drollinger's admissions, at the time when plaintiff made his contract with Drollinger with reference to the truck. Moreover, on this particular point, the court found:

> "That said defendant Charles J. Dawson represented to the plaintiff that the defendant Nora Dawson had no right, title or interest therein (referring to the truck), and that plaintiff at the times he paid the moneys hereinafter set forth had no notice or knowledge of any claim of the said defendant Nora Dawson to said truck or any interest therein, and that plaintiff paid and advanced the moneys hereinafter set forth in good faith and without notice or knowledge of any claim or interest of the defendant Nora Dawson in said truck."

It would therefore clearly appear that both by the pleadings and by the findings appellant is concluded in regard to his contention that the plaintiff is without equity.

The other alleged errors of which appellant complains relate, first, to the failure of the court to find on certain issues; or, secondly, that some of the findings made by the court are on immaterial issues or that they are outside the issues; or, thirdly, that conclusions of law are placed among certain findings of fact.

On the material allegations of the complaint as herein set forth, the court found that the representations referred to in the complaint were made by Dawson to plaintiff, and the findings show, among other things:

> "That on or about the 17th day of May, 1920, the said defendant Charles J. Dawson interviewed the defendant Drollinger and represented to the said defendant Drollinger that he could obtain the balance of the purchase price which remained unpaid under the said contract from the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff would take title to the said truck to secure the advances that he had and would make to purchase the said truck and hold the same for the use and benefit of the said defendant Charles J. Dawson, and that the said Charles J. Dawson produced the plaintiff to carry out the said agreement, and that it was then and there agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant Drollinger that plaintiff should pay to the said Drollinger the sum of $250 cash, and the sum of $100 on or before the 1st day of June, 1920, and the sum of about $188, the balance of the purchase price, on or before 30 days thereafter, and that the said Drollinger agreed to hold possession of the said truck and to deliver the same to the plaintiff, provided that the plaintiff would make the said payments within the said time, and that said Drollinger then and there declared that he had the right to sell said truck and that the said Dawsons had no right therein as against him, and at the same time that the said Drollinger, contemporaneous with the said payment of $250, agreed with the plaintiff that he would hold the possession of the said truck and deliver it to the plaintiff, provided the plaintiff would pay to him the balance of the said purchase price in monthly installments. That plaintiff then and there, relying upon the said statements of the said Drollinger, and upon the agreement he had made with the said defendant Charles J. Dawson, and on the 19th day of May, 1920, paid to the defendant Drollinger the sum of $250 cash, and on the 1st day of June, 1920, paid the sum of $100, and that the plaintiff, within the said time provided for the payment, tendered to the said Drollinger the sum of $188.25, the balance which remained due after the last payment of the sum of $100. That the said defendant Drollinger refused to receive the said sum and refused to deliver the said truck to the plaintiff on the ground that he had delivered the same to the defendant Nora Dawson."

It is further found:

> "That the said Charles J. Dawson paid to the said defendant S. C. Drollinger the sum of $101.65 of the plaintiff's money on or about April 13, 1920, and that the defendant Drollinger had notice that the said sum was paid on the purchase price by the plaintiff."

Further findings by the court included the facts:

> "That the defendant Nora Dawson, prior to the time when said $188.25 became due under the said contract, voluntarily paid the said amount to the said defendant Drollinger and received possession of the said truck from him; that said payment by the said defendant Nora Dawson was without any request or knowledge on the part of plaintiff or of the defendant Charles J. Dawson; and that she obtained the possession of the said truck upon said payment without the consent of the plaintiff or the said defendant Charles J. Dawson and without the knowledge of either of them, and that she, after receiving the possession of the said truck, immediately sold and delivered the same to the defendant Henry Bedford."

It will therefore be seen that each of the material allegations of the complaint affecting plaintiff's right to recover as against defendant Drollinger is substantially covered by the findings of the court, and that judgment was given in plaintiff's favor as against defendant Drollinger in the sum of $451.65, which amount was within the allegations of the complaint.

[4, 5] Specifically, appellant complains that there was no finding on the issue of conspiracy; on the fictitious sale of the truck by Mrs. Dawson to Bedford, as well as to Bedford's use of the truck; and that Nora Dawson defaulted on a prior purchase contract of the truck. Appellant also complains that certain facts were found by the court which were not embraced within the issues; for example, that plaintiff paid to Dawson for Drollinger's use and benefit $101.65. But assuming that to be true, it is merely evidentiary of payment to Drollinger himself and would be included within a general allegation of so much money paid by plaintiff to Drollinger. As to the objections that there was no finding on the issue of whether any contract was made between plaintiff and Drollinger, or on the issue of conspiracy, or on the issue of the fictitious sale of the truck by Mrs. Dawson to Bedford, each of such findings is immaterial to plaintiff's case as against defendant Drollinger. He is not and cannot be interested in them, nor in any wise harmed by such immaterial findings. The case against him is complete without them. They might just as well have been omitted as far as he is concerned; and it follows that, being in, they are of no effect as producing any results either for or against Drollinger. It is well settled that findings on immaterial facts, although erroneous, are not sufficient to disturb a judgment. Klockenbaum v. Pierson, 22 Cal. 160; Dougherty v. Coffin, 69 Cal. 454, 10 Pac. 672; Sherman v. Sandell, 106 Cal. 373, 39 Pac. 797; Collins v. Gray, 154 Cal. 135, 97 Pac. 142; and there are many other California cases to the same effect. The cases are also numerous and without apparent conflict which hold that a failure by the court to find on an immaterial issue or on an issue which, as judged by other facts found and the entire record, must necessarily have been against appellant, affords no grounds for reversal of the judgment.

The complaint by appellant that there was no finding on the issue of whether any contract was made between the plaintiff and Drollinger, and that said Drollinger then and there declared that he had the right to sell the said truck, and that the said Dawsons had no right therein as against him, must be completely disposed of by an examination of the findings as hereinbefore set forth.

[6, 7] As to the other findings to which appellant takes exception, he says that the court by its findings created a new and independent form of contract which is in no way set out in the complaint; but a glance at the record will show that the only substantial difference between the complaint and the findings in that regard rests in the amount which the court found was paid by plaintiff to Drollinger as being $451.65, as against the amount alleged in the complaint as having been a considerably greater sum. Appellant also complains of what are termed "inconsistencies" in the findings; but if there are any inconsistencies they are of no moment, and certainly not such as would justify a reversal of the judgment on that ground. Findings are to be read and considered together and, if possible, are to be reconciled so as to prevent any conflict on material points; and unless the conflict is clear and the findings incapable of being harmoniously construed, the judgment will not be reversed on the ground of a conflict in the findings. Syllabus, Haight v. Haight, 151 Cal. 90, 90 Pac. 197. The same thing is true of the findings which, instead of being strictly confined to matters of fact, state conclusions of law; for example, one of the findings is to the effect that the delivery of the truck by Drollinger to Nora Dawson "was a wrongful delivery as to plaintiff"; and another finding is "that at the time said defendant Drollinger delivered said truck to said defendant Nora Dawson she had no right, title, or interest therein as against plaintiff." The statutory provision that the facts found and the conclusons of law must be separately stated has been repeatedly held to be merely directory. Butler v. Agnew, 9 Cal. App. 330, 99 Pac. 395; Spencer v. Duncan, 107 Cal. 426, 40 Pac. 549; McKelvey v. Wagy, 157 Cal. 409, 108 Pac. 268; In re Bullard's Est., 3 Cal. Unrep. 688, 31 Pac. 1119.

Having noticed all of the alleged errors arising on the trial and it conclusively appearing that appellant Drollinger has not been substantially prejudiced by them or by any of them, it is ordered that the judgment as against S. C. Drollinger be and the same is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. WEBB v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 10597.)

1. Injunction 🔑105(1)—Prohibition 🔑10(2)—Sentence of death lawfully imposed cannot be stayed by injunction.

Injunction will not lie to restrain or interfere with the execution of the death penalty under judgment of conviction for murder on the ground that the condemned did not have a fair trial, his only remedy being an appeal to the executive for pardon; and where a court undertakes to interfere with such judgment by injunction prohibition will issue to prevent such interference.

2. Injunction 🔑105(1)—No authority to sue for vacation of judgment of conviction.

It is not within the power of a court of equity nor of the judge of the superior court upon an ex parte affidavit or complaint for injunction to stay or set aside the execution of a judgment entered by the trial court for the punishment of crime of which the accused was found guilty after trial by a jury; there being no authority in law to sue the state for vacation of a judgment, and the only remedy being application for pardon.

In Bank.

Prohibition by the People of the State of California, upon the relation of U. S. Webb, against the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco and James M. Troutt, Judge thereof, to prevent interference by injunction or otherwise with the execution of Ullah Mohammed, convicted of murder, and under sentence of death. Writ granted.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., D. M. Edwards, of Visalia, J. H. Linne, and J. C. Thomas, of Susanville, for petitioner.

Humphrey, Grant, Zimdars & Warren, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. [1] The writ of prohibition will be granted, including an order vacating the restraining order and the temporary injunction heretofore issued. It is very clear to the court there is no law sustaining this application for an injunction, and that there is no relief other than an application to the Governor for a pardon. The constitutional grant to the Governor of the right to pardon is to enable the state to do justice in those cases where the ordinary procedure results in injustice in individual cases by reason of extrinsic fraud or for any other reason. There is thus a procedure established for the purpose of doing justice in this type of cases, and we must assume that, if, as claimed here, Ullah Mohammed did not have a fair trial, and for the reasons he alleges in his complaint has not been able to present his defense, an application to the Governor for pardon will be given due consideration, and, if the representatives are there made on his behalf that have been made here, and are established to the satisfaction of the Governor, that he will extend to him such a degree of leniency as is proper under the circumstances.

[2] Application was made to the respondent court to set aside the judgment of conviction and stay the execution thereof after an appeal, and after the affirmance of the judgment by this court. It is not within the power of a court of equity, nor of a judge of the superior court, upon an ex parte affidavit, to stay or set aside the execution of the judgment entered by the trial court for the punishment of the crime of which he was found guilty after a trial before a jury, for the verified complaint filed before the respondent amounts to no more than an affidavit of the convicted man or of some one on his behalf. The fundamental reasons for this, as suggested by Mr. Justice LENNON and by myself during the oral argument, are these: That there is no authority, as far as the defendant is concerned, to sue the state of California for a vacation of the judgment; and that the remedy provided by law is by an application for a pardon.

This opinion was delivered orally from the bench by the Chief Justice, and is transcribed and filed as the written opinion of the court, as ordered.

Writ granted as prayed for.

MORRISON v. VEACH et al. (L. A. 6947.)

1. Sales 🔑479(1)—Seller can impose any condition to revival of forfeited conditional sales contract.

After a conditional sales contract has been forfeited by the seller for the buyer's default, he can impose any condition upon the right to have the contract revived, and therefore can require the payment of an attorney's fee incurred by him, even though the buyer was not liable for such fee under the original contract.

2. Sales 🔑477(1)—Notice of installments given before previous check was dishonored does not waive forfeiture.

The conditional seller's right to forfeit a contract for the buyer's default was not waived by his giving notice of subsequent installments which became due after he received the buyer's check for the amount agreed upon to revive the contract after forfeiture for previous default, and before he was notified by the bank that the check was not paid for want of funds, since there can be no waiver of a default unless the party against whom the waiver is claimed had knowledge of the default.

3. Assignments 🔑119—Assignee for collection can maintain action.

One to whom the conditional seller assigned the contract and all rights thereunder for the purpose of recovery became the legal owner of the cause of action, and was entitled to maintain claim and delivery for the property sold; the assignor retaining an equitable interest therein.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; M. W. Conkling, Judge.

Action of claim and delivery by J. R. Morrison against Oscar Veach and others. Judgment for the named defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Andrew J. Copp, Jr., of Los Angeles, and J. Stewart Ross, of El Centro, for appellant.

J. E. Simpson, of Holtville, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendant Oscar Veach in an action of claim and delivery. Said defendant purchased an automobile under a conditional contract of sale, binding him to the performance of certain covenants, including payment of a balance of the purchase price in monthly installments. The vendor, upon the execution of the contract, assigned it to the Pacific Finance Corporation (hereafter referred to as the corporation), which later, after its alleged breach, assigned it to the plaintiff, who thereafter commenced the present action in claim and delivery, under which he took possession of the car. Judgment went for the defendant for the return of the automobile, and, in case delivery could not be had, then for its value fixed at $550, together with damages for the detention thereof in the sum of $400 and costs.

The chief question to be decided is, Does the evidence support the finding that there was no forfeiture by defendant of his rights under the contract, entitling the plaintiff to maintain this action?

The contract under which the automobile was sold provided for the payment of $316.67 upon the signing of the contract, and a balance of $541.10 in monthly installments of $54.11, commencing on the 1st day of June, 1920. It further provided that if the buyer failed to pay any of said installments when due, the seller, at his option, and without notice to the buyer, might elect to declare the whole balance of the purchase price immediately due and payable, or the seller might declare the rights of the buyer under the contract forfeited, and, without demand, immediately take possession of the car and hold the same discharged from further liability under the contract. Title to the automobile was to remain in the seller until the covenants of the contract on the part of the buyer were fully performed, and time was declared to be of the essence of the contract. That instrument also imposed upon the buyer certain collection charges if any installment was not paid when due, and an attorney's fee under specified circumstances.

An installment of the purchase price falling due on September 1, 1920, not having been paid, the corporation on the 8th of that month wrote to the defendant, calling his attention to the fact, and stating that a "collection fee of $1 on payment delinquent over seven days makes the total amount due on this installment $55.11," and advised him that, unless the amount so due were paid within four days from the date of the letter, it would elect to bring suit immediately for the entire balance remaining unpaid, "or retake possession of said property * * * and all your rights under said contract will be terminated." Receiving no reply to this communication, the corporation on the 15th day of September wrote to the defendant, demanding possession of the car. Three days later the corporation assigned the contract to the plaintiff for the purpose of collection. The plaintiff thereupon employed counsel, who later prepared and filed the complaint in this action, procured a surety company claim and delivery bond at an expense of $10 for premium, and paid certain notarial fees in connection with the suit. On September 22 the corporation received from the defendant a check for $55.11, on which was written the notation, "Sept. payment on car contract." On the same day counsel for plaintiff wrote defendant a letter, reciting the expenditures and occurrences we have detailed, and acknowledging receipt of the check. The letter also contained the following:

> "Your check does not cover the various items of your indebtedness for the September installment in the event the Pacific Finance Corporation would waive its remedy taken on the 16th inst., and if it is your desire to avail yourself of such waiver, will you please send your additional check for $28.50, upon receipt of which both checks will be deposited for collection. In the event of collection the proposed action will be abandoned."

The letter stated that the items making up the demanded sum of $28.50 were:

> "Attorneys fees $25.00, provided by section 9 of the contract; replevin bond $2.50, two notarial acknowledgments at 50 cents, $1.00."

The communication closed with the statement that if the sum of $28.50 were not received within three days the check for $55.11 would be returned to the defendant and the action would proceed. Under date of September 23 defendant mailed his check for $28.50 to counsel for plaintiff, and the two checks were immediately deposited for collection. The check for $55.11 was duly honored, but the check for $28.50 was not, because of the fact that defendant had not sufficient funds in the bank to meet it. Before the dishonor of this check was brought to the notice of plaintiff, the installment of $54.11, payable on October 1st, fell due. On October 4 the corporation wrote to defendant, calling his attention to this new delinquency, and asking that the amount be remitted. On October 8, the payment still not having been made, the corporation in writing notified the defendant that, unless the amount, with a collection fee of $1.08 added, being the total amount of $55.19, were paid within four days, the corporation would elect to bring suit for all unpaid installments or to retake the car, etc. Under date of October 14 defendant remitted to the corporation check for the last-mentioned amount. It was not until after these notices were mailed that either the plaintiff or the corporation learned of the dishonor of the check for $28.50. The check for the October payment was not presented for payment, and it, with the dishonored check, was returned to the defendant at the trial.

[1] The findings of the trial court appear to have been based upon the theory that the $25 attorney's fee going to make up the charge of $28.50 demanded by the plaintiff was not warranted under the terms of the contract. We think this position is untenable, but in any event the question of the attorney's fee is immaterial in this case, since the defendant on September 13, 1920, was admittedly in default, and the corporation, as it had an undoubted right to do, elected to terminate the contract and to retake the car, and notified the buyer of such election. This had the legal effect to terminate all of the defendant's rights in the car. The plaintiff's offer of September 22 to waive its remedy and to revive the contract on condition that the defendant should within three days pay $55.11, plus $28.50, was not availed of by him; hence the remedy was not waived, and the contract, which was terminated, was not revived. The corporation having lawfully terminated the contract, and elected to retake possession of the car, thereby became the owner thereof, freed from any obligation under the contract, and had a right to dictate the conditions upon which the contract would be revived. These conditions, as we have seen, were not complied with.

[2] The suggestion that by giving the two notices respecting the nonpayment of the October installment, thus treating the contract as still in force, the corporation waived the accrued forfeiture, is not well founded. The uncontradicted evidence is to the effect that when these notices were sent the corporation did not know of the dishonor of the defendant's check, and in fact assumed that the defendant had accepted and complied with the terms on which it had offered to reinstate the contract. It is elementary that there can be no waiver of a default unless the party against whom the waiver is claimed had knowledge of the default.

[3] There is no merit in the assertion that plaintiff is not the proper party plaintiff. The evidence shows without conflict that the corporation, prior to the commencement of the action, assigned the contract and all its rights thereunder to the plaintiff for the purpose of recovery. The assignee thus became the legal owner of the cause of action, and was entitled to maintain the suit; the assignor retaining an equitable interest in the thing assigned. Barlow v. Lande, 26 Cal. App. 424, 147 Pac. 231.

1. Venue 🔑52(1)—Change for convenience of witnesses largely in discretion of court.

Determination of motion for change of place of trial for convenience of witnesses rests largely in the sound discretion of the court to which it is addressed.

2. Appeal and error 🔑965—Denial of change of venue for convenience of witnesses disturbed only for abuse of discretion.

Determination of motion for change of place of trial for convenience of witnesses will be disturbed only for abuse of sound discretion.

3. Venue 🔑68—Denial of change for convenience of witnesses not abuse of discretion in view of opposing affidavit of inconvenience.

It is not an abuse of discretion to deny plaintiff's motion for change of place of trial on the ground of convenience of witnesses, where defendant's affidavit in opposition shows his witnesses will be inconvenienced by change.

4. Venue 🔑52(1)—Change for convenience of witnesses not concluded by comparative number.

A mere preponderance in number of witnesses expected to be produced by one party will not necessarily determine the order to be made on motion for change of place of trial for convenience of witnesses.

5. Venue 🔑52(1)—Change for convenience of witnesses not concluded by need of records in another suit.

The question of what order shall be made on a motion for change of place of trial for convenience of witnesses is not settled by the necessity of producing the records and files in another suit, tried in the county to which change is sought, and the expense incident to such production.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Action by Russell Scott against Z. B. Stuart. From an order denying motion for change of place of trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. C. Baker, of Salinas, for appellant.

C. W. Byres, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order denying his motion for a change of the place of trial.

The action is to recover the reasonable value of legal services alleged to have been rendered by the plaintiff for the defendant and certain of the latter's clients at the instance of defendant in a suit for partition theretofore tried in the county of Monterey. By his answer the defendant admits that the plaintiff performed part of the alleged services, but denies all liability therefor, claiming that there was no contract of employment or agreement for compensation, and that the services were gratuitously rendered. Within a reasonable time after the cause was at issue, the plaintiff made the motion above mentioned to change the place of trial from the county of Los Angeles, where the defendant resides, to the county of Monterey, on the ground of the convenience of witnesses, as provided in subdivision 3 of section 397 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

We are unable to agree with the appellant that the court erred in denying such motion.

[1, 2] The determination of a motion of this character upon the ground of the convenience of witnesses rests largely in the sound discretion of the court to which it is addressed, and its order thereon will be disturbed only for an abuse of such discretion. Pascoe v. Baker, 158 Cal. 232, 110 Pac. 815. The pleadings in the action disclose but two issues to be decided, namely, were the services of plaintiff gratuitously rendered? and, if not, what is their reasonable value?

It appears from an affidavit of plaintiff filed in support of his motion that he intends to call 16 witnesses, 4 of whom will give testimony tending to show that defendant intended to employ the plaintiff to act for him as associate counsel in the partition suit mentioned; that 3 others will testify that plaintiff actually appeared in court on behalf of the defendant in the capacity of an attorney at law in said suit and rendered therein certain services; that 7 of the witnesses whom plaintiff expects to call are expert witnesses, some of whom will testify to the same effect as the 3 just mentioned, and all of whom will testify that the services so rendered were reasonably worth the sum of $2,500. The affidavit also avers that plaintiff will call as a witness the county clerk of Monterey county, who is the custodian of the papers and files in the partition suit, which he expects to introduce in evidence, and which constitute material evidence in the case; that the presence of such clerk or his deputy will be necessary at the trial; also, that he intends to produce Ralph C. McComish as a witness, without stating, however, what he expects to prove by his testimony; and that all of said witnesses reside in or near Monterey county.

The defendant filed a counter affidavit, in which he states that he expects to call eight certain witnesses, who all reside in the county of Los Angeles, and all material and necessary for proof of the allegations and denials of his answer. The testimony of three of these, it appears, will tend to limit the participation of plaintiff in the trial of the partition suit; and others of them will testify that such services were rendered without expectation of compensation. In this affidavit it also appears that seven of the eight witnesses will testify that the services so rendered by the plaintiff were not reasonably worth more than the sum of $100.

[3] This brief statement fairly reflects the condition of the record; and we fail to see how it can be reasonably said that the court abused its discretion in denying the motion for change of the place of trial. The defendant being a resident of the county of Los Angeles at the time of the commencement of the action, is entitled to have the trial take place in that county, unless it appear from the evidence submitted on the motion that the convenience of witnesses and the ends of justice will be promoted by the removal of the cause. From such evidence it appears without contradiction that plaintiff, in his capacity as an attorney and counselor at law, in conjunction with others represented the defendant in the partition litigation. As to whether or not he was to be paid therefor will depend in large measure upon his own testimony and that of the defendant. Upon this point, and also upon the issue of the reasonable value of the services, there will be practically an equal number of witnesses convenienced by the transfer or retention of the case. In these respects the parties stand on a parity. It is no abuse of the trial court's discretion to deny a motion for a change of the place of trial made on the ground of the convenience of witnesses, if the affidavit of the defendant in opposition to the motion shows that his witnesses will be inconvenienced if the change be ordered. McNeill & Co. v. Doe, 163 Cal. 338, 125 Pac. 345.

[4, 5] There is no merit in the suggestion that the larger number of witnesses reside in or near the county of Monterey. A mere preponderance in number of the witnesses which either party expects to produce will not necessarily determine the order to be made. Reavis v. Cowell, 56 Cal. 588. Nor will the necessity of producing in this case the records and files in the partition suit and the expense incident thereto settle the question. This, in common with the other matters, is a consideration addressed to the discretion of the court.

The order is affirmed.

DUFTON v. DANIELS et al. (S. F. 10418.)

1. Extradition 🔑40—State agent held entitled to recover from state expenses in bringing back to state extradited fugitive; the latter having been "placed on trial," although tried on another information.

Under Pen. Code, § 1557, an agent of the state held entitled to recover from the state his expenses in bringing back to the state a fugitive from justice extradited in another state, on the ground that the latter had been "placed on trial" within the proviso of said section, although he was not actually tried until after he had escaped after such return, and had been returned to the state a second time, and was then tried and convicted on another and amended information making the same charge.

2. Mandamus 🔑101—May issue against board of control.

That the board of control, in auditing claims against the state, acts in a sense judicially, does not preclude the issuance of a writ of mandate to control its action, where the facts are all admitted, and are susceptible to but one construction.

3. States 🔑183—Findings of board of control conclusive only on questions of fact.

Although a finding of the board of control on conflicting evidence on a disputed question of fact is conclusive, a finding by it that a claim against the state is not valid is not conclusive as a finding of fact, where the substantive facts in relation to the claim are admitted, and are susceptible to but one construction, namely, that the claim is a valid one; the claimed finding in such case being but an erroneous conclusion of law.

4. Courts 🔑207(4)—Supreme Court has original jurisdiction to issue writ of mandate against board of control.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4, the Supreme Court has original jurisdiction to issue writ of mandate against the board of control.

5. Mandamus 🔑3(6)—Legal remedy of state agent against state to collect expenses held not effective.

Mandamus lies against the board of control to compel audit and allowance of expenses, under Pen. Code, § 1557, of state agent in returning to the state a fugitive from justice; his remedy at law against the state, under St. 1893, p. 57, and St. 1921, p. 1592, not being equally convenient or beneficial.

6. Mandamus 🔑3(2)—Remedy at law must be equally effective to preclude mandamus.

The remedy by mandamus will be denied only when the party seeking relief has a plain remedy at law, which is not only speedy, but adequate, in the sense that in and of itself it is capable of directly affording and enforcing the relief sought.

7. Mandamus 🔑101—Lies to enforce official duty.

Mandamus lies against the board of control to compel audit and allowance of expenses, under Pen. Code, § 1557, of state agent in returning to the state a fugitive from justice, as seeking merely to compel the performance of a duty especially enjoined by law, as a duty resulting from an office and arising from the plain provisions of statute.

In Bank.

Application by John S. Dufton for writ of mandate against Gilbert B. Daniels and others. Writ granted.

Leon E. Gray and Robert M. Ford, both of Oakland, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondents.

MYERS, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the state board of control to audit and allow petitioner's claim for his necessary traveling expenses as a state agent in returning to the state of California a fugitive from justice, under the provisions of section 1557 of the Penal Code. The admitted facts are that one Newell, a fugitive from justice under a charge in Alameda county of a violation of section 476a of the Penal Code, was arrested in the state of New York. Thereupon the Governor of California issued a demand for his extradition and appointed petitioner a state agent for the purpose of returning him to California. Petitioner went to New York, secured the prisoner, returned him to California, and delivered him to the city prison in Oakland. Upon a preliminary hearing he was held to answer, and the district attorney thereupon filed an information in the superior court of Alameda county, charging him with the offense for which he had been extradited. Thereafter he was admitted to bail, and when his case was called for trial failed to appear, whereupon the court declared the bail forfeited, and ordered that a bench warrant issue. Thereafter he was rearrested in Arizona, and again returned to California upon extradition proceedings, this time by another agent of the state appointed for that purpose. His case was again called for trial, a jury impaneled and sworn, and a trial had, at the conclusion of which the court, acting under Pen. Code, § 1165, advised the jury to acquit, ordered that the prisoner be detained in custody, and that the district attorney file an amended information upon the same charge, which was done. His case again came on for trial and he was tried, convicted, and sentenced to San Quentin.

[1] Petitioner presented to the respondent, board of control, his claim for traveling expenses incurred in bringing back the prisoner from New York, pursuant to section 1557 of the Penal Code, which provides:

> "When the Governor of this state, in the exercise of the authority conferred by section 2, article 4, of the Constitution of the United States, or by the laws of this state, demands from the executive authority of any state of the United States, or of any foreign government, the surrender to the authorities of this state of a fugitive from justice, who has been found and arrested in such state or foreign government, the accounts of the person employed to bring back such fugitive must be audited by the board of control and paid out of the state treasury: Provided, however, that the state shall not pay the expenses of any such person so employed where the fugitive returned is not placed on trial, but such expense shall be a charge upon the county asking the requisition."

No question is made as to the form or sufficiency of the claim presented, and no contention is made that the items thereof were not actually and properly expended by petitioner in the performance of his duty. The claim was disallowed solely on the ground that it did not constitute a legal claim against the state of California; the sole contention of the board being that the fugitive returned was not "placed on trial," as required by said section, because of the circumstance that he was not actually tried until after he had escaped and had been returned to California a second time. Respondents argue that the fugitive was in fact "placed upon trial in connection with that second return from Arizona," and that therefore he was not placed upon trial in connection with the first return from New York. From this they conclude that petitioner is not entitled to reimbursement for his traveling expenses from the state. There is no merit in this contention. The Code section makes it the plain duty of the board of control to audit and allow the necessary traveling expenses of the petitioner incurred as above recited, unless in fact the fugitive so returned by him was not placed on trial. The language of the section is plain and unambiguous, and it is not necessary to invoke the settled rule of construction that an exception contained in a statute to a general rule laid down therein is to be strictly construed (Black, Interpretation of Laws, p. 275; Lewis' Sutherland, Statutory Construction [2d Ed.] § 352), and that "where the enacting clause is general in its language and objects and a proviso is afterwards introduced, that proviso is construed strictly and takes no case out of the enacting clause which does not fall fairly within its terms" (U. S. v. Dickson, 15 Pet. 141, 165, 10 Ed. 689). Neither is it necessary to consider here whether, if the fugitive had in fact been tried upon a charge different from that upon which he had been extradited, the proviso in the section would apply. The fact is admitted herein that the fugitive so returned was actually placed upon trial upon the precise charge on which he had been extradited and was actually tried, convicted and sentenced. It requires no involved argument to demonstrate that this does not present a case falling within the purview of the said proviso.

[2] The fact that the board of control, in auditing claims against the state, acts in a sense judicially, does not preclude the issuance of a writ of mandate to control its action, where, as here, the facts are all admitted and are susceptible to but one construction. Grand Lodge, etc., v. Markham, 102 Cal. 169, 36 Pac. 423; Robertson v. Board of Library Trustees, etc., 136 Cal. 403, 69 Pac. 88; Wood v. Strother, 76 Cal. 545, 18 Pac. 766, 9 Am. St. Rep. 249; Raisch v. Board of Education, 81 Cal. 542, 22 Pac. 890; U'ren v. State Board of Control, 31 Cal. App. 6, 159 Pac. 615; Puterbaugh v. Wadham, 162 Cal. 611, 123 Pac. 804.

[3] It is urged that the conclusion of the board of control that this was not a valid claim against the state must be construed as a finding of fact that the returned fugitive was not placed on trial in this state, and that such finding of fact is conclusive upon this court. It cannot be so regarded. All of the substantive facts are here admitted, they are susceptible to but one construction, and the claimed finding of fact is but an erroneous conclusion upon a question of law. San Diego, etc., Ry. Co. v. State Board of Equalization, 165 Cal. 560, 564, 132 Pac. 1044; Grand Lodge, etc., v. Markham, supra; Wood v. Strother, supra; Harelson v. South San Joaquin Irr. Dist., 20 Cal. App. 324, 128 Pac. 1010; Inglin v. Hoppin, 156 Cal. 483, 489, 105 Pac. 582. It may be conceded for the purposes hereof that, if there had been a disputed question of fact determined by the board upon conflicting evidence, its finding thereon would be conclusive, but such is clearly not the case here.

[5, 6] Respondents' contention that mandamus will not lie in the instant case, because there is available to petitioner a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law, is predicated upon the existence of two statutes, Stats. 1893, p. 57; Stats. 1921, p. 1592. It may be conceded that the latter, at least, of these two statutes does provide a plain remedy at law, available to petitioner, in the pursuit of which he will be entitled, under the facts alleged in his petition, to a judgment against the state for the amount due upon his claim. But it does not necessarily follow therefrom that mandamus is unavailable, because of the existence of such a remedy. "It has been held in this state that, to supersede the remedy by mandamus, the party must not only have a specific adequate legal remedy, but one competent to afford relief upon the very subject-matter of his application, and one which is equally convenient, beneficial, and effective as the proceeding by mandamus." Robertson v. Board of Library Trustees, etc., 136 Cal. 403, 405, 69 Pac. 88. See, also, Raisch v. Board of Education, supra; Babcock v. Goodrich, 47 Cal. 488; Ross v. Board of Education, 18 Cal. App. 222, 122 Pac. 967. The remedy afforded by the statutes above cited is manifestly not equally convenient, because the action therein provided for must be transferred to Sacramento county upon demand of the Attorney General, regardless of the residence of the plaintiff, and it is not equally beneficial or effective, because the plaintiff therein, though successful, cannot recover his costs, and because, as pointed out by Beatty, C. J., in Polk v. State, 138 Cal. 384, 389, 71 Pac. 435, 648, he has no means of enforcing the payment of such judgment after obtaining it. As was well said in Ross v. Board of Education, supra:

> "The remedy by mandamus will be denied only when the party seeking relief has a plain remedy at law which is not only speedy, but adequate, in the sense that in and of itself it is capable of directly affording and enforcing the relief sought."

We find nothing in conflict with these conclusions in Chapman v. State, 104 Cal. 690, 38 Pac. 457, 43 Am. St. Rep. 158. That case may be regarded as authority for the contention that petitioner here is entitled to maintain an action at law against the state upon his claim; but that is here conceded. The dictum in Crandall v. Amador County, 20 Cal. 72, 75, to the broad effect that the existence of an appropriate legal remedy (without regard to the adequacy or effectiveness thereof) will preclude a resort to the writ of mandate, does not appear to have since been followed or approved by this court, and cannot now be regarded as an accurate statement of the law.

[7] Petitioner herein is seeking merely to compel the performance of a duty especially enjoined by law as a duty resulting from an office. Code Civ. Proc. § 1085; Spaulding v. Desmond (Cal. Sup.) 207 Pac. 896; Ott Hardware Co. v. Davis, 165 Cal. 795, 801, 134 Pac. 973; Puterbaugh v. Wadham, supra. The duty arises unequivocally from the plain provisions of the Code section above quoted under the facts admitted.

It is, therefore, ordered that a peremptory writ issue as prayed.

1. False pretenses 🔑39—Inference of falsity of representation authorized.

From the fact that a month after the making of the representations that an oil well derrick had been, or was being, erected on the land, there was there no derrick or evidence of the construction of one, the jury were entitled to infer that no erection had been made or commenced.

2. Criminal law 🔑1032(7)—No reversal for variance not suggested at trial.

There should be no reversal for variance, not suggested at the trial, between allegation of information that defendant represented that an oil well was being constructed, and proof that he represented that one was wholly constructed; there being no miscarriage of justice therefrom.

3. Criminal law 🔑1130(2)—Statute as to including evidence in brief directory.

Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, requiring the printing in the briefs of the record and evidence relied on on appeal (especially since amendment by St. 1919, p. 261), is to be regarded as for the convenience of the appellate court, and therefore directly only, to be disregarded by the appellate court when justice requires.

4. Criminal law 🔑1130(2)—Evidence in record, though not in brief, to be considered on rehearing to prevent reversal.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, directing and clearly contemplating an examination of the entire record, including the evidence, to see whether there has been a miscarriage of justice, before there shall be a reversal for error, it may be examined to discover evidence not in the briefs to prevent a reversal on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to sustain a conviction, and this though first called to the court's attention by petition for rehearing, unless it appears that failure to include it in the brief was for purpose of securing an unfair advantage.

W. T. Kendrick, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WILBUR, C. J. The defendant sold a worthless desert lot to one Francis A. Nelson. In order to induce her to purchase the lot, he represented to her that the land was oil land, stating that there was oil there; that they were now putting up a derrick on the land; that they would soon be drilling for oil and that it would be but a short time before the purchaser would be getting money out of it; that there was a little town on the land and that there was plenty of water there. There was no town there; there was no water in the vicinity except in the Los Angeles aqueduct, and that was not available; there was no reason to believe that the land was oil land or that the purchaser would derive a profit from the land. Upon the basis of these misrepresentations, the defendant was charged with obtaining money by false pretenses. He was convicted and appeals from the judgment of conviction. He contends for a reversal of the judgment that some of the statements were mere expressions of opinion, others were not relied upon by the purchaser, and the falsity of the others was not proved. The trial court was of the opinion that the representation that the land was oil land was a mere expression of opinion, and the district attorney concurred in this opinion and apparently did not ask for a conviction upon that ground. The purchaser testified that she purchased the land because it was oil land, and she made certain statements concerning her state of mind which would indicate that she was not influenced to purchase by the fact that there was a town there or that there was water there. The Attorney General contends that, although the purchaser did state that she was not particularly influenced by the statements concerning the town being there or water being there, nevertheless the jury from the whole evidence of the witness was justified in concluding that these representations were inducing causes for her purchase, for it is obvious that the availability of water and the location of a town would bear upon the availability of the lot for the development of oil.

The appellant, however, did state to the purchaser that they were putting up an oil derrick on the land, and it is, of course, conceded that such a representation being false and one of the inducing causes for the purchase, would justify the verdict of conviction. It is contended, however, that there was no sufficient proof of the falsity of this representation to justify the conviction based upon its falsity. The prosecuting witness testified that the defendant told her that they had the oil derrick up and that they were probably drilling; that the defendant showed her a picture of the derrick and of the land before they started the derrick and then when the derrick was finished. These representations were made about the 1st of June, and in the latter part of June the complaining witness accompanied by two friends visited the alleged town. The prosecuting witness testified as follows:

> "Q. * * * What did you see, what was the character of the land there? A. It was a little rocky, small bushes, small rocks, some brush, and a few cactus trees. Q. Were there any oil derricks there? A. No oil derrick. Q. Were there any evidences or preparations of drilling for oil? A. Not a piece of board as big as my hand that I could see. Q. Were there any buildings there of any kind? A. Not a thing. Q. What kind of land was it there, what was the character of the land? A. Rather level, only there would be little low places like that in it."

A month later the complaining witness again visited the land with a surveyor to assist them in locating Aqueduct City. With reference to her observations at that time, she was questioned and replied as follows:

> "Q. Did you see any oil derrick anywhere, is there any in that country anywhere? A. No, I could say for myself I didn't see any oil derrick anywhere."

The witness also testified that the defendant pointed out to her the location of the alleged oil derrick at the time he induced her to purchase the property and that the location was about three blocks away from the lot purchased by her. The evidence also shows that the defendant indicated upon a map, by marking thereon with a pencil, the location of the oil well derrick. The defendant himself testified upon that subject as follows:

> "Q. You said to this jury a while ago, you said to these people that there were derricks within a few miles of this place? A. Yes, sir. Q. How far is a few miles, give an estimate. A. Well, I am not a judge of distance as I stated on here, I believe in the neighborhood of the same distance stated on the stand before by me."

This statement was 14 miles. Counsel for the appellant contends, as we understand him, that the fact that there was no oil derrick or any trace of a derrick on the land or in the vicinity a month after the representations were made is no evidence that there was not an oil derrick in some state of construction at the time the representations were made. Appellant states:

> "There is some evidence that there was not a derrick for several miles around what is known as Aqueduct City tract, but no one testified that an oil derrick was not being put up at the time the representation is alleged to have been made by the defendant. It is well established that the averment that the representation is false must be clearly established beyond a reasonable doubt."

[1, 2] The jury were entitled to infer from the fact that there was no visible evidence of the construction of a derrick or the derrick itself a month after the representations were made that no such derrick was ever under process of construction or was actually erected. Nor do we think that the appellant should have a reversal of the judgment because of the alleged variance between the allegations of the information that the defendant represented that an oil well derrick was being constructed—that is, was partly constructed—and the proof that he represented that one was wholly constructed. It is perfectly evident from the whole record that the defendant procured from the complaining witness the purchase price of the land by false pretenses; that he was sufficiently advised of the nature of those pretenses by the allegations of the information; no objection was taken at the trial by reason of such alleged variance between the pleading and the proof, and that there has been no miscarriage of justice.

[3] A transfer was made in this case upon the respondent's petition because the District Court of Appeal, after reversing the case, declined to grant a rehearing upon evidence pointed out in the respondent's petition for a rehearing in that court, for the reason that such evidence had not been set out in the original briefs filed on behalf of the people. People v. Woods, 39 Cal. App. Dec. 232, upon the authority of Peterkin v. Randolph Marketing Co., 48 Cal. App. 300, 191 Pac. 947, decided by Division One of the Second District Court of Appeal. The statute requiring the printing in the briefs of the record and evidence relied upon on appeal (section 953c, Code Civ. Proc.), particularly since the amendment of 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 261), must be regarded as one for the convenience of the appellant tribunals, and for that reason directory only, and should be disregarded by the court wherever substantial justice requires it to be done.

[4] The Constitution (article 6, § 4½) directs and clearly contemplates an examination of the entire record, including the evidence, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not there has been a miscarriage of justice before a case shall be reversed because of errors in the instructions or in the admission or rejection of evidence or because of errors of pleading or in any matter of procedure.

The record on appeal is that provided by section 953a, and comprehends all the pleading, evidence, and matters included in the typewritten transcript prepared as required by law. Section 953a, Code Civ. Proc. It is true that the Constitution does not expressly require the examination of the entire record where the question presented is the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict or decision, but it is more necessary to do so in such a case than in one merely involving a question of procedure, for the fundamental question involved in such a contention is that there has been a miscarriage of justice because of a conviction or decision wholly unsupported by the evidence in the record, instead of one merely induced by an error of procedure. See, also, section 475, Code Civ. Proc.

When the question presented to the reviewing court is the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain a verdict, the court may properly assume that the parties have complied with the statute requiring them to print in their briefs the portions of the record upon which they rely, and therefore may confine its investigation to such evidence, but the statute requiring such evidence to be printed in the briefs (section 953c, Code Civ. Proc., as amended in 1919) now provides that:

> "* * * No appeal shall be dismissed nor shall any appeal be decided adversely to any party for failure to print in his brief the portion of the record or any part thereof in support of his points, but in such case the court hearing the appeal shall direct such party to print and serve on the adverse party and file with it a supplement to his brief in which shall be set forth in full that portion of the record relied on by such party and not printed in any former brief. The court shall fix the time within which such supplement shall be served and filed and shall permit or require such additional portions of the record to be printed, served and filed as may be desirable for the full presentation of the points at issue."

This procedure is wholly useless, for if the members of the court discover evidence in the record while considering the matter which would assist in a proper determination of the case, the decision can be arrived at as well without as with the printing of it in the briefs. And this method of relying on the record as shown by the typewritten transcript, without requiring it to be printed in the briefs, has been the usual practice in this court for some years. In O'Connor v. West Sacramento Co. (Cal. Sup.) 207 Pac. 527, the decision construing a lease was based in part upon portions of the lease not called to the attention of the District Court of Appeal or this court in briefs or petitions for transfer or rehearing. In Oliver v. Robnett (Cal. Sup.) 210 Pac. 408, neither the pleadings, findings, nor decree were printed in the briefs, yet the court nevertheless considered the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings attacked by the appellant and reversed the judgment. In Gibbons v. Yosemite Lumber Co. (Cal. Sup.) 211 Pac. 4, the evidence that the plaintiff kept all stock other than his own off the land was neither printed in the briefs nor called to the attention of the court by the parties, yet our decision as to notice due to occupancy was based thereon.

In short, it has been the uniform practice of this court, at least since 1919, to examine the typewritten record in all cases where the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings is attacked. Section 953c, requiring the evidence relied upon on appeal to be printed or set out in the briefs, at least since the amendment of 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 261), must be considered as directory for the convenience of the court, and where evidence is pointed out to the court, even in a petition for rehearing, as a basis for its action, such action ought not to be refused merely on the ground that the parties had neglected to fully set out the evidence in their briefs. For instance, in this case the Attorney General claimed in his brief that there was evidence to support the conclusion of the jury, and set out in his brief the evidence which he deemed sufficient to support a verdict. After the court had declared this evidence insufficient, he then called the attention of the District Court of Appeal to additional evidence included in the typewritten record and asked for a rehearing, which was denied. There was no indication that the omission of this evidence from the respondent's brief was due to anything other than overconfidence, perhaps, in the sufficiency of the evidence set out in his brief to support the verdict. It was only after the District Court of Appeal declared the evidence insufficient to establish the fact that no oil derrick was being constructed at the time the representation was made by the defendant that the significance of the testimony of the prosecuting witness that there was not even a board in sight when she saw the premises, and the evidence of the other witnesses that there was not the slightest indication of any attempts to develop oil, was fully appreciated. This evidence was set out in the petition for rehearing and in the order denying a rehearing by the District Court of Appeal, and was assumed to be sufficient to require an affirmance of the conviction, instead of a reversal as theretofore ordered. In this we think the District Court of Appeal was in error. When it appears from evidence presented in the petition for reconsideration of the case by the District Court of Appeal that there was in fact evidence adduced at the trial and incorporated in the record before the court on appeal which would show that the conclusion arrived at by the court, by confining its attention to the portions of the record printed in the brief, was erroneous, a rehearing should be had in that court and in default of such rehearing by the District Court of Appeal this court, upon an application for transfer, disclosing the existence of evidence amply sufficient to sustain the verdict, must grant a transfer of the case and affirm the conviction or judgment, notwithstanding the failure of the parties to include in their briefs before the District Court of Appeal the portion of the record which, in the judgment of that court and of this court, would sustain the verdict, unless it appears that the conduct of the parties who failed to print such matter in their brief was the result of an effort to secure an unfair advantage.

1. Libel and slander 🔑77—Joinder as parties defendant the writer and receiver of libelous letters held not misjoinder.

In an action for libel based upon the publication of two letters, it is not a misjoinder of parties to make both writer and receiver of the letters parties defendant.

2. Conspiracy 🔑19—May be inferred from surrounding circumstances.

Conspiracy is usually provable by circumstantial evidence, and may be inferred from nature of acts, individual and collective interest of the alleged conspirators, the situation and relation of the parties at the time, and generally all circumstances preceding and relating to the culmination of the claimed conspiracy.

3. Libel and slander 🔑112(1)—Evidence held sufficient to establish concerted action and publication of libelous letter by sender and receiver.

Evidence that a letter was written to a district attorney who was engaged in a political fight with deputies whom he had discharged, and who were working for his recall, offering evidence against one of the deputies, and the fact that the offer was accepted and the evidence requested to be forwarded, held sufficient to warrant a finding that the sender and receiver of the letter acted in concert, and that the publication by the receiver was in fact a publication contemplated by the sender.

4. Libel and slander 🔑51(1)—The communication to be privileged must be without malice.

A communication, to be privileged under Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 3, must be made without malice.

5. Libel and slander 🔑112(2)—Evidence held to show malice in publication of libelous letter.

Evidence that one wrote a letter to a district attorney who was engaged in a political fight with some deputies whom he had discharged, and who were seeking his recall, offering information concerning one of the deputies who had once appeared against the writer in litigation, and the fact that such information was subsequently requested and sent and published, held to sustain a finding that malice existed so as to preclude a claim of privilege.

6. Libel and slander ⚷112(2)—"Malice" may be proven directly or indirectly.

"Malice," as used in Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 3, relating to privileged communication, is used in its popular sense—that is, a desire or disposition to injure another founded upon spite or ill will—and may be proven either directly or indirectly taking into consideration the general course of defendant's conduct and specific acts or external evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; T. N. Harvey, Judge.

Action by Alfred Siemon against F. C. Finkle and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frank M. Gunter and Janeway, Beach & Pratt, all of Los Angeles, for appellant Finkle.

Foster & Barnhart, of Bakersfield, for appellant McCowan.

Rowen Irwin and W. W. Kaye, both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This is an action for libel instituted by Alfred Siemon, plaintiff below and respondent here, an attorney at law, practicing at Bakersfield, against the defendants, F. C. Finkle and Barclay McCowan. The action was based uopn the publication of two letters written by Finkle at Los Angeles to McCowan at Bakersfield and shown by the latter to various persons. Plaintiff's complaint proceeded upon the theory that the two defendants jointly published the letters, to the damage of the plaintiff. The facts of the case as revealed by the pleadings, proof, and findings are as follows:

In 1916 plaintiff was discharged from the office of deputy district attorney by defendant McCowan, then district attorney of Kern county. The reason given by McCowan for such discharge was that plaintiff had been using the county's time and its employees for his private practice. Defendant Finkle, having read in Los Angeles papers an account of the discharge of plaintiff and the reasons therefor, sent to McCowan the following letter:

"January 20, 1917.

"Personal.

"Mr. Barclay McCowan, District Attorney, Bakersfield, California—Dear Sir: The press dispatches convey to me the information that you have discharged a number of your deputies who are threatening you with recall. Should you require any information about one of your former deputies, Mr. Alfred Siemon, whom you have discharged, as to his practices in regard to taking private business, I will be glad to furnish it. He has, to my knowledge, undertaken some very questionable business while one of your deputies, and while I have never met him, from what he has been doing, I am convinced that he was not a suitable person to act as deputy district attorney anywhere. I have never met you personally, but I am well known in Bakersfield, and, should the information I have concerning Mr. Siemon be of interest to you, I will be glad to give you the particulars.

"Very truly yours,

"FCF/LVH. [Signed] F. C. Finkle."

To this letter McCowan replied, thanking the sender "for the information * * * so kindly offered." The reply letter from McCowan also stated that he, McCowan, was interested, as a ranch owner, in an irrigation project involving the storage of the waters of Kern river, and asked for information and ideas on the subject. This letter concluded with a request that Finkle send to McCowan "the Siemon particulars in a separate letter."

On the 27th day of January Finkle sent to McCowan a lengthy letter, in which it was stated that plaintiff, while he was deputy district attorney of Kern county, had represented, as an attorney, one Hubbard in litigation which had arisen between said Hubbard and the defendant Finkle. The letter last referred to charged plaintiff with having used information which he had received from Finkle to assist Hubbard in defeating the claims of his creditors, of whom Finkle was one. It also charged plaintiff with having advised Hubbard to go through bankruptcy proceedings for the purpose of avoiding the payment of his just debts, when, as a matter of fact, Hubbard was not insolvent, and with having assisted Hubbard "to put under cover" as much of his property and assets as possible. The letter concludes with the following paragraph:

> "As stated to you, I have never met Siemon, but from my correspondence with him and the way in which I know he has conspired with Hubbard to assist the latter in defrauding his creditors, I have formed the opinion that he is a shyster of the worst kind which unfortunately now and then are found to exist in the ranks of the legal profession."

Each of the two letters written by Finkle to McCowan forms the basis of a cause of action set out in two separate counts in plaintiff's amended complaint. Both counts allege and proceed upon the theory that the defendants, with the intent of injuring the plaintiff, combined and conspired together with the purpose of publishing the said letters.

[1] Both defendants demurred to the plaintiff's first amended complaint upon the ground, among others, that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant. No misjoinder appearing upon the face of the complaint, and the remaining grounds of demurrer not being well taken, the demurrers were properly overruled.

The respective demurrers of defendants having been overruled, they elected to separately defend against the action, and accordingly interposed separate answers. The answer of the defendant Finkle, in addition to denying all of the material allegations of the complaint, interposed and separately pleaded three additional defenses: (1) Misjoinder; (2) privilege; and (3) justification. The defense of defendant McCowan was rested solely upon a denial of the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint. No misjoinder in his behalf was pleaded, and therefore, in so far as he was concerned, the defense of misjoinder was waived. Upon the issues thus raised the case was tried by the court below sitting without a jury, and resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $750 as actual damages, to which was added an award in the sum of $250 against defendant McCowan as punitive damages for a malicious publication.

The trial court found that as to the first letter "the statements pertaining to the plaintiff were false and defamatory," but that the publication thereof by each of said defendants was not joint and that for that reason plaintiff was not entitled to recover on the first count.

As to the second letter, the trial court found in effect that certain statements therein were false and defamatory, and known at the time of their publication by the defendants to be false, and that the publication was by each of said defendants, and was wanton and malicious and done for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff as an attorney at law and aspersing his good name and standing in his profession. In addition thereto the express finding was made:

> "That the publication of the said letter by each of said defendants was the result of the joint acts of said defendants combining and conspiring together for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff in his name and reputation."

The main contention of defendants urged in support of the appeal is that the evidence falls short of proving a conspiracy to publish the letter in question and is wholly insufficient to support the trial court's finding in that behalf.

With this contention we cannot agree.

[2] A conspiracy is almost always of necessity provable only by circumstantial evidence—that is to say, by inference reasonably deduced from facts proven—and this is so because the law recognizes the intrinsic difficulty of establishing a conspiracy by direct evidence. Consequently the conspiracy complained of may oftentimes be inferred from the nature of the acts complained of, the individual and collective interest of the alleged conspirators, the situation and relation of the parties at the time of the commission of the act, and generally all of the circumstances preceding and attending the culmination of the claimed conspiracy. Revert v. Hesse, 184 Cal. 295, 301, 193 Pac. 943.

[3] It may be conceded that the plaintiff failed to prove any formal agreement between the defendant Finkle and the defendant McCowan concerning a concert of action for the publication of the statements complained of. Nevertheless we think the facts of the entire transaction warranted the trial court in arriving at the conclusion and making and finding that the defendants acted in concert in the publication of said statements.

There are, for instance, the established facts that the defendant Finkle, knowing that the defendant McCowan was embroiled in a bitter battle, politically, with the plaintiff, who, with other persons, was endeavoring to procure McCowan's recall from the office of district attorney, wrote to McCowan the letter of January 20th, maliciously making the false and defamatory accusations against the plaintiff.

Standing alone these particular facts would not, of course, suffice to support the finding of a concert of action between the two defendants in the publication of the statements in question. But they are to be considered in conjunction with other facts shown in evidence. Thus in this behalf the further facts will be noted that the defendant Finkle suggested that defendant McCowan might "require" the proffered information. And this suggestion, when read and considered with the context of the entire letter, readily enough warrants the inference that it was the defendant Finkle's intent and purpose that defendant McCowan could and should use the said information for the purpose of damnifying and defeating the plaintiff, Siemon, in his purpose to recall the defendant McCowan.

Again, there is the fact shown in evidence that McCowan requested Finkle to "send the Siemon particulars in a separate letter." Considered in connection with the facts above narrated, this request of McCowan tended strongly to warrant and support the inference that it was McCowan's intent and purpose to suggest to Finkle that the proffered information, when received, could, if separately stated, be more readily and effectively published. And if it be a fact, as the trial court in effect found, that in keeping with the suggestion and its probable purpose Finkle forwarded the desired information, then it may be fairly said that he was acting in concert with McCowan for the publication complained of. True, the defendant Finkle testified in effect that he expected McCowan to make an independent investigation as to the correctness of the statements contained in the letter, and that "after being tipped off" he expected McCowan to use the information on his own authority. The trial court, however, was not required to accept this testimony at its face value, and, in view of the inference readily deducible from the evidence that an independent investigation would have demonstrated Finkle to be a falsifier, the trial court may well have concluded that he was deliberately disseminating false information with the intent and purpose of inducing McCowan to use it against the plaintiff in the recall fight.

Moreover, it may be fairly said, we think, from all of the circumstances involved in the writing and publication of the letters in question, that the act of McCowan in publishing the second letter was the natural and probable result of defendant Finkle's act in writing and sending the same to McCowan. That it to say, under the circumstances existing at the time of the writing and receipt of the letter, the publication by McCowan was a result which Finkle might have reasonably foreseen as likely to occur. This being so, it follows that Finkle's act in writing and sending the letter was the proximate cause of the publication by McCowan. In short, all of the circumstances hereinbefore narrated warrant the inference that the publication by McCowan was in fact a publication contemplated and countenanced by Finkle.

[4, 5] The other two defenses specially pleaded by defendant Finkle, (1) that the letter was a privileged communication under subdivision 3 of section 47 of the Civil Code, and (2) that the defamatory charges were true, cannot be sustained.

Conceding, for the purpose of discussion, that the publication comes within the category of privileged communications, in order to bring the publication in question within the provisions of section 47 it is necessary that there should be an absence of malice. The finding of the trial court that the publication "of each of said letters by each of said defendants was with malice" is, in our opinion, supported by the evidence.

[6] The malice referred to by this section of the Civil Code is malice in the popular conception of the term; that is to say, as a desire or disposition to injure another founded upon spite or ill will. Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 116 Pac. 530. The absence of malice is the absence of enmity. Malice in fact may be proved either directly or indirectly—either by direct evidence of the evil motive or by legitimate inferences to be drawn from other facts and surrounding circumstances. And for the purpose of ascertaining the existence or nonexistence of actual malice there may be taken into consideration not only the general course of defendant's conduct toward plaintiff and any specific act or acts tending to prove or disprove the existence of an evil motive, but also the internal evidence furnished by the nature of the libel itself. Davis v. Hearst, supra.

The general tone of the letter, the language employed therein to characterize plaintiff and plaintiff's conduct, considered in the light of defendant's motive for resentment therein disclosed, together with the fact that defendant Finkle unsolicited volunteered the first offer to furnish information about the plaintiff, warrant and support the inference that defendant Finkle was actuated in the publication of the false and defamatory statements by enmity and ill will.

No serious attempt was made at the trial of the case to establish the truth of the defamatory charges. The chief proof offered consisted merely of the reiteration by Finkle of the facts upon which he based his opinion that plaintiff was a "shyster." These facts were those set out in the letter of January 27th, some of which facts were themselves libelous.

[7] It is urged that the testimony of one Thorton, stenographer of McCowan, should have been excluded. Inasmuch as the fact of publication about which Thorton testified was proved by the direct and undisputed testimony of several other witnesses, this testimony was merely cumulative, and need not, therefore, be discussed.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by E. M. Rustigian against F. M. Phelps and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Everts, Ewing & Wild, J. R. Fitch, and Harris, Johnson, Willey & Griffith, all of Fresno, for appellants.

W. D. Crichton and Gallaher, Simpson & Hays, all of Fresno, for respondent.

WASTE, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover a deposit of $1,000, made upon a tentative receipt for the purchase of land. Plaintiff entered into a contract with defendant Phelps, as agent for the owner of the purchased land, paid Phelps the above sum as and for a deposit and partial payment on the full purchase price of the property, and received an escrow deposit receipt and agreement which provided that, upon payment of $5,000 cash, including the amount deposited, he should receive a good and sufficient contract for a deed conveying said property to him, together with an abstract or certificate of title, to be furnished at the owner's expense, showing title to such property to be in the owner, free and clear of all incumbrances whatsoever, except as otherwise expressly stated in the escrow receipt and agreement. The only exception noted by this agreement was a provision that the property in question was covered by a contract between the owner and the California Associated Raisin Company.

The defendant Brooks, as owner, in writing accepted the terms of the escrow agreement, and agreed to execute and deliver a good and sufficient contract for a deed conveying the property to the plaintiff. Thereafter the defendant Brooks delivered a certificate showing title to the property to be vested in him, but subject to the payment of certain taxes and rights of way for ditches shown on the map accompanying the certificate and referred to as reserved in various deeds of record, and also subject to an annual payment to the Fresno Canal & Land Corporation for water right appurtenant to the land and right of way thereover to convey water to other lands, as provided by an agreement of record. Brooks also tendered to plaintiff an agreement for a deed to be executed when one-half of the total purchase price of the property, together with interest to that date, had been paid, and when the plaintiff otherwise performed the conditions and covenants of the tendered contract. The contract provided, further, for the execution by Brooks and his wife, and the delivery to the plaintiff, of a deed conveying the property to plaintiff free and clear of any liens except taxes, agreed to be paid by plaintiff, and defects of title, "save and excepting rights of way for roads and ditches, and any contract which is now in force." This plaintiff refused to execute, and brought this action to recover his deposit of $1,000. Judgment was entered in his favor, and defendants have appealed.

[1] The plaintiff based his rejection of the contract tendered by Brooks upon the ground that the escrow agreement provided for a transfer to him of the property free and clear of all incumbrances excepting as therein otherwise stated, whereas the certificate of title furnished by Brooks, in compliance with the provisions of the preliminary contract, disclosed the title to the property to be subject to rights of way for ditches and roads and the annual payment to the Canal & Land Corporation for water right appurtenant to the land and a right of way to convey water over the property. This contention was upheld by the trial court, and we are satisfied that its judgment must be affirmed. The rights of way for ditches and for the conveyance of water across the land constituted an incumbrance thereon. Cosby v. Danziger, 38 Cal. App. 204, 208, 175 Pac. 809. These restrictions and incumbrances upon the title of the defendant Brooks, not being included in the exception carried in the escrow agreement, and not being removed, justified the plaintiff in seeking a recovery of his partial payment under defendant's contract to convey to him a title free and clear of all incumbrances except as in the escrow agreement noted. Tandy v. Waesch, 154 Cal. 108, 110, 97 Pac. 69.

[2] In combating the contention of the respondent and the finding of the trial court, the appellants assert that the incumbrances complained of existed openly, notoriously, and continuously throughout the entire period covered by the transaction in question; that their existence was known to the respondent; and that the real subject-matter of the dealings between the parties was the land subject to visible easements. The record in the case discloses no such facts. There is not a word of testimony, nor was there a scintilla of evidence before the trial court, to justify even an inference that the Fresno Canal & Land Corporation, up to that time, had ever constructed a ditch or canal on the land in question. The certificate of title referred to "rights of way for ditches shown on the map hereinafter referred to, as reserved in various deeds of record." The map was not produced, and no deeds are found in the record of the evidence. Neither is there testimony that the plaintiff ever saw the land. The case, therefore, does not fall within the application of the rule relied upon by appellants that an agreement to convey land free and clear of all incumbrances does not refer to visible physical burdens upon the land, permanent in character.

The judgment is affirmed.

WILBUR, C. J. The Garden Grove Drainage District was created in pursuance of the statutes of 1903. Stats. 1903, p. 291. An election was called for the purpose of creating the original bonded indebtedness authorized by section 27 of the act for the construction of the necessary improvements for which the district was organized. This section provides for the issuance of such bonds, and, if necessary, for a supplemental issue of bonds to complete the work, when authorized by a vote of the electors of the district. With reference to the result of the election, the statute provides:

> "At such election the ballots shall contain the words 'Bonds—Yes' or 'Bonds—No,' or words equivalent thereto. If a majority of the votes cast are 'Bonds—Yes,' the board of directors shall cause bonds in said amount to be issued; if a majority of the votes cast at any bond election are 'Bonds—No,' the result of such election shall be so declared and entered of record. Whenever thereafter, a petition of the character hereinbefore provided for in this section, is presented to the board, it shall so declare of record in its minutes, and shall thereupon submit such questions to said electors in the same manner and with like effect as at such previous election."

The bonds were defeated at the election, and thereafter, without any petition therefor from electors or property holders, the directors called another election at which the bonds carried. This action was brought to establish the validity of the bonds about to be issued as a result of the second election. The trial court held that the election was valid.

The sole question presented by this appeal is whether or not the board of directors of the Garden Grove Drainage District was authorized by the statute to call such second election without a petition therefor.

This involves an interpretation of the last sentence of section 27 (Stats. 1903, p. 299), above quoted. The uncertainty as to its proper construction arises from the fact that section 27 does not thereinbefore provide for any petition whatever. The appellants contend that this whole sentence should be disregarded because void for uncertainty. The respondents suggest that the word "act" was intended instead of "section," and that the petition provided for in section 1 of the act is the one referred to in the concluding sentence of section 27. That petition is one signed by 50 or a majority of the holders of title within the proposed district, and addressed to the board of supervisors asking for the calling of an election for the foundation of the district, etc.

We are satisfied that the petition referred to in section 27 is a petition signed by "fifty or a majority of the holders of title," and that the phrase "a petition of the character hereinbefore provided for," relates, not to the form and subject-matter of the petition mentioned in section 1 of the act, but to the character of signers thereof, to wit, "fifty or a majority of the holders of title." Not only is this petition the only one mentioned in the act before the concluding sentence of section 27, and, therefore, of necessity, the one there referred to, but it is reasonable to suppose that the Legislature so intended.

It is such a petition which initiates the proceedings for the establishment of the district which is to pay for the necessary improvements by the issuance of bonds. Thereafter the subject of the issuance of bonds is voted for at an election called by the directors, at which election all the electors of the district, regardless of whether or not they own land, vote upon the issuance of the bonds. Section 27, supra. If the proposed bond issue is defeated, it is evidently intended that the majority of the holders of the land of the district susceptible of drainage or 50 of them can by petition require a second election. But the board of directors has no power to call an election for the issuance of bonds, unless expressly authorized by law, and the statute nowhere makes provision for an election authorizing a bond issue after such issue has once been defeated, except such authority as is given in the concluding sentence of section 27, and this authority on the part of the board of directors is predicated upon a petition therefor. Section 56 provides that the board of directors shall have no power to incur any debt or liability whatever, either by issuing bonds or otherwise, in excess of the express provisions of the act.

If we reject the whole of the last sentence of section 27, there is no authority for the calling of the election in question. That we have arrived at the intention of the Legislature with reference to the necessity of a petition by a majority, or 50 of the holders of title, as a basis for a second election is indicated by a similar requirement in the statute concerning the refunding of bonds.

Section 33 provides for an election for refunding bonds already issued, upon a petition presented to the board of directors, signed by a majority in number of holders of title or evidences of title to real property in such district.

We think it clear that the Legislature intended to authorize an election only upon petion of "fifty or a majority of the property owners," after the defeat of such a proposition. The judgment of the lower court holding the bond issue valid is erroneous.

The judgment is reversed.

SHAFFER et al. v. BEINHORN. (Sac. 3303.)

1. Brokers 🔑82(1)—Complaint held to show plaintiffs' services were not those of real estate broker or salesman, within statute, so as to prevent recovery of compensation without a license.

A complaint alleging that defendant, a licensed real estate broker, employed plaintiffs to introduce prospective purchasers for certain property to defendant, who thereafter negotiated the sale of the property to such purchasers, and expressly denying, in the language of the statute, that plaintiffs were employed as brokers or real estate salesmen, held to show that the services performed by plaintiffs, for which they claimed a share of the commission, were not those within the Real Estate Brokers' Act, so as to prevent them from recovering compensation for such services without having been licensed under that act.

2. Brokers 🔑42—Unlicensed person cannot claim compensation for single act as broker or salesman.

Since Real Estate Brokers' Act makes it unlawful for a licensed broker to pay a commission for performing any of the acts therein specified to any person who is not a licensed broker or a licensed salesman, compensation cannot be claimed for the performance of a single act as broker or salesman, regardless of whether such act would constitute a partial vocation or not

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by Carl H. Shaffer and another against Charles A. Beinhorn. Judgment for defendant, when demurrer to the amended complaint was sustained, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, with instructions to overrule the demurrer with leave to defendant to answer.

Earl A. Bagby, of Visalia, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., amici curiæ.

Karl A. Machetanz, of Exeter, for respondent.

LENNON, J. The case is here on rehearing, after decision by the District Court of Appeal. The facts of the case, and the point presented in support of the appeal, are as follows:

"The appeal is from a judgment based upon an order sustaining defendant's demurrer to the amended complaint of plaintiffs. As far as necessary to quote said complaint is as follows:

" 'That on or about the 5th day of March, 1920, the defendant was a real estate broker, duly licensed as such, residing and having his principal place of business in the city of Exeter, county of Tulare.

" 'That on or about the said last-mentioned date the said defendant as such broker was the real estate agent and broker, by writing duly appointed for the sale of certain real property situate in the county of Tulare, state of California, commonly known as the Rockford ranch, and that by the terms of the agency agreement, as aforesaid, as plaintiffs are informed and believe, the said defendant was to receive from the owner of said ranch as compensation for the selling of the same as such real estate broker, and the owner of said ranch in said agency agreement did agree to pay as such compensation to defendant, as such real estate broker, a commission of 5 per cent., to be computed upon the total selling price.

" 'That on or about the 5th day of March, 1920, the said defendant as broker and agent for the sale of said real estate, as aforesaid, entered into an agreement with these plaintiffs whereby the defendant agreed that, if the plaintiffs, or either of them, would find any one interested in the purchase of such a ranch, to whom the said defendant would be able to negotiate a sale thereof, or would introduce to said defendant any one to whom the said defendant would be able to negotiate a sale thereof, he (the said defendant) would pay unto the plaintiffs a sum of money equal to two-thirds of the gross commission which the said defendant might receive on account thereof.

" 'That thereafter these plaintiffs, relying on their said agreement with defendant, did procure and produce to defendant a prospective purchaser for the said real property, to whom the said defendant did thereafter and as such agent and broker negotiate a sale of the said real property, and on account of which sale the said defendant did, on or about the 26th day of October, 1920, receive, as a part of the compensation and commission aforesaid, the sum of five thousand seven hundred and fifty ($5,750) dollars.'

"Then follows an allegation of a demand upon defendant for the payment of their proportion of said commission and his refusal to pay any portion of it, and the complaint proceeds:

" 'That neither of said plaintiffs are, or ever have been, a real estate broker or real estate salesman within the meaning of the act of the Legislature of the state of California, defining a real estate broker and salesman, approved May 27, 1919, and that neither of said plaintiffs have at any time sold or offered to sell, bought or offered to buy, or negotiated the purchase or sale or exchange of real estate, or negotiated loans on real estate, leased or offered to lease, rented or placed for rent, or collected rent from any real estate or improvements thereof for others, either as a whole or partial vocation, and that neither of said plaintiffs have ever at any time or in any manner acted as a broker or salesman or agent for the purchase, sale, or exchange of real estate of or for another, and that at no time other than the time herein mentioned have the plaintiffs or either of them ever engaged for a compensation to find, procure, or introduce to any person, another person, firm, or corporation to whom or with whom a contract of sale, purchase, or exchange might be made.'

"It is conceded that the demurrer to the complaint raised the point and was decided upon the ground that plaintiffs by their allegations disclosed an attempt to induce the defendant to violate an express mandate of law and that the enforcement of their demand would be against public policy.

"Section 1 of said real estate act (Stats. of 1919, p. 1252), provides: 'It shall be unlawful for any person, copartnership or corporation to engage in the business, or act in the capacity of a real estate broker, or a real estate salesman within this state without first obtaining a license therefor.'

"Section 2 provides: 'A real estate broker within the meaning of this act is a person, copartnership or corporation who for a compensation, sells, or offers for sale, buys, or offers to buy, or negotiates the purchase or sale or exchange of real estate * * * for others as a whole or partial vocation. A real estate salesman within the meaning of this act is one who for a compensation is employed by a licensed broker to sell, or offer for sale, or to buy, or to offer to buy, or to negotiate the purchase or sale or exchange of real estate, * * * as a whole or partial vocation.'

"Section 17 provides the penalty for acting as a broker or salesman without license, and section 18 is as follows: 'It shall be unlawful for any licensed broker to pay a commission for performing any of the acts herein specified to any person who is not a licensed broker, or a licensed salesman.'

"Section 20 provides: 'No person, copartnership or corporation engaged in the business or acting in the capacity of a real estate broker or a real estate salesman within this state shall bring or maintain any action in the courts of this state for the collection of compensation for the performance of any of the acts mentioned in section two hereof without alleging and proving that such person, copartnership or corporation was a duly licensed real estate broker or real estate salesman at the time the alleged cause of action arose.'

"As to the validity of said act, no question, is raised by appellants. Indeed, the Supreme Court has recently upheld it as a legitimate example and exercise of the police power of the state. Riley v. Chambers, 181 Cal. 592, 185 Pac. 855, 8 A. L. R. 418. It was declared that even lawful and useful occupations may be subjected to regulation in the public interest and that the proper test as to whether the Legislature has exceeded its authority is whether the purpose and effect of the regulation 'go no further than throwing reasonable safeguards in the public interest around the exercise of the right'; and the conclusion was reached that 'the single primary purpose of the act is to require of real estate brokers and salesmen that they be honest, truthful, and of good reputation' and that said legislation embodies a legal and reasonable scheme for that purpose. It is conceded that the measure was enacted for regulation and not for the purpose of revenue, and it is to be observed that the license fees are of nominal consideration and are imposed only for the purpose of defraying the expense attached to the administration of the law. But it is the claim of appellants that the act which they were employed to perform does not bring them within the purview of a broker or salesman as these terms are defined in said statute." Real Estate Brokers' Act (Stats. 1919, p. 1252).

[1] With this contention as a basis, it is argued that the complaint does state a case of action and was, therefore, proof against demurrer. We are in accord with this contention. The complaint does not on its face show that plaintiffs were engaged in the business, or acting in the capacity, of a real estate broker or real estate salesman when they performed the act for which they seek compensation. In order to come within the definition of real estate broker or real estate salesman, a party must "sell or offer to sell, buy or offer to buy, or negotiate the purchase or sale or exchange of real estate. * * *" By the terms of their contract as pleaded the plaintiffs were only required "to find" or "to introduce" to defendant a person "interested" in purchasing and who subsequently did purchase, in order to recover the sum agreed by defendant to be paid to them. By the terms of the contract, as set forth in the complaint, the "negotiation" of the sale was to be left entirely to defendant. Plaintiffs' only duty was to produce a prospective purchaser. This, the complaint alleges, they did. The complaint expressly negatives any further act or acts on the part of plaintiffs which might tend to bring them within the scope of the definition, denying specifically and in practically the identical words of the statute itself that they "sold or offered to sell, bought or offered to buy, or negotiated the sale * * * of real estate. * * *" The truth of this allegation is admitted by demurrer. The acts of plaintiffs, therefore, as alleged in the complaint, fall short of those defined by the Real Estate Brokers' Act, as constituting either a real estate broker or real estate salesman.

In Schomig v. Keiser (Cal. Sup.) 209 Pac. 550, it was held that any employment by any person of another, to collect payments on an agreement which had already been negotiated, did not make the party a real estate broker, or real estate salesman. By a parity of reasoning, the employment of any person to perform an act preceding the negotiation of a sale does not, in the absence of subsequent assistance rendered in the ultimate negotiation of the sale constitute the party thus employed a real estate broker, or real estate salesman.

It may be that, upon a trial of the case, the defendant may be able to prove that plaintiffs did in fact actually assist in negotiating the sale. If he can do this, it is a good defense. But for the purpose of passing upon a demurrer it is not permissible to predicate a ruling upon the presumption that plaintiffs did actually assist in the subsequent negotiations which ultimately resulted in the sale.

[2] The question of whether or not a single act can be held to constitute a "partial vocation" need not, under the view which we have taken of the facts pleaded in the plaintiffs' complaint, be decided.

Moreover, a consideration of that question is immaterial in this particular case, by reason of the provisions of section 18 of the Real Estate Brokers' Act (Stats. 1919, p. 1259), which provides that:

"It shall be unlawful for any licensed broker to pay a commission for performing any of the acts herein specified to any person who is not a licensed broker, or a licensed salesman."

In view of this section, it follows as a matter of course that, although it be conceded that it was but a single act, nevertheless if the plaintiffs' participation in the transaction in question was in fact that of a salesman or broker, as defined by the act, then, of course, payment for the service rendered in that behalf could not be enforced under the provisions of this section. It, therefore, makes no difference whether a single act does or does not amount to a partial vocation.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to the court below to overrule the demurrer, with leave to defendant to answer within a designated time.

1. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⟹92 — Complaint to restrain use of plaintiff's business name held to state sufficient facts.

A complaint alleging that plaintiff had been engaged in business under a fictitious name, that he had filed the certificate as required by statute, and that the individual defendants had organized a corporation having the same name, which corporation was also made a defendant, and were about to engage upon an extensive campaign to advertise its business under that name, thereby causing injury to plaintiff by inducing people to believe defendant corporation was plaintiff, and thereby injuring the good will which he had established, held to state sufficient facts, in addition to conclusions of law, to entitle plaintiff to the injunction sought.

2. Injunction ⟹118(2)—Complaint need not describe at length injury inevitably resulting from defendants' acts.

Where the situation is such that injury or damage will inevitably accrue to plaintiff if defendants are permitted to do the threatened acts, plaintiff is not required to describe in extenso such injuries.

3. Injunction ⟹146—Verified complaint held to support injunction in view of admissions in answer.

Where a verified complaint alleged positively all facts contained therein except that defendants were about to engage in extensive advertising of their business under the name under which plaintiff had been doing business, which was alleged only on information and belief, an answer admitting defendants intended to advertise their business in the usual way, and denying only that the advertisement would be as extensive as alleged by plaintiff, was sufficient to entitle plaintiff to an injunction under the rule that, where a verified complaint is relied upon as the basis for an injunction, its allegations must stand the test to which oral testimony would be subjected.

4. Injunction 🔑146 — Temporary injunction not always denied because verified answer denies every allegation of complaint.

It is not an invariable rule that a temporary injunction must be denied in all cases where the verified complaint is unsupported by affidavits and all its allegations are denied by the verified answer.

5. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition 🔑95(2)—Temporary injunction against use by another of plaintiff's established business name held proper.

Where it appeared from positive averments that plaintiff was first in engaging in business under a particular name, and had been conducting his business for six or seven years before defendants entered the field, and had expended much time and energy in building up his business, he is entitled to a temporary injunction against the use by defendants of that name, notwithstanding a denial by their verified answer of the allegations of his complaint.

6. Injunction 🔑135—Right to temporary injunction rests within discretion of trial court.

The granting, denying, dissolving, or refusing to dissolve a preliminary or temporary injunction rests in the sound discretion of the trial court.

7. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition 🔑68—Right to prevent use of trade-name does not depend on trade-mark.

Plaintiff's right to prevent defendants' use of the name under which plaintiff had been engaged in business for seven years does not depend upon an exclusive right to the use of a trade-mark or a trade-name altogether, but rests upon the broad equitable ground that the use by defendants would be unfair competition in commercial dealings.

8. Injunction 🔑114(3)—Officers of corporation can be joined with it as defendants.

There was no misjoinder of parties in joining as defendants the officers of defendant corporation in a suit to enjoin the use by the corporation of plaintiff's trade-name.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Suit by A. Lutz, doing business under the fictitious name of the Western Iron & Metal Company, against the Western Iron & Metal Company and others. From an order overruling a demurrer to the complaint and continuing in force a temporary restraining order against the use of plaintiff's firm name, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Joseph L. Lewinson, of San Francisco, and William A. Barnhill, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

R. F. Church and Timon E. Owens, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. This is an action by respondent, doing business under the fictitious name of Western Iron & Metal Company, for an injunction against the Western Iron & Metal Company, a corporation, and Albert K. Lucas, Lester W. Roth, and David H. Miller, organizers and, as shown by the answer, officers of said corporation, praying that the latter be enjoined from using the name Western Iron & Metal Company and from conducting business thereunder in the city of Los Angeles and elsewhere, and from using said name in any manner whatsoever, and for general relief and costs. No special damages are pleaded or claimed. Relief is sought on the ground of unfair dealing on the part of defendants.

A temporary restraining order was granted upon the verified complaint without notice, respondent being required to file a bond in the sum of $1,000. After hearing on the order to show cause the trial court made an order continuing in effect the restraining order to abide a decision of the cause on its merits. The action of the court in this respect was equivalent to the granting of a temporary injunction.

The complaint sets out the acts complained of with considerable elaboration. Demurrers, both general and special, were interposed to the complaint, which were overruled by the court. A verified answer was filed by appellants.

This appeal is taken from the order overruling said demurrers and continuing said restraining order in force as aforesaid.

The only ground of demurrer which we are required to pass upon at this time is whether or not a cause of action is stated by the complaint. That a cause of action is stated we entertain no serious doubt. It is not necessary to set out the allegations of the complaint in full. The portions descriptive of respondent's business are:

> That on the 1st day of October, 1915, he commenced business in said city of Los Angeles, and ever since said time has been and is still engaged in conducting in said city "an extensive and profitable wholesale and retail iron, metal, and machinery business, both new and secondhand, and a general iron and scrap iron business; that in said business respondent buys and sells all kinds of machinery and supplies and acts as agent in buying and selling all kinds of machinery and necessary supplies therefor both manufactured and unmanufactured; that he is also engaged in the business of buying and selling new and secondhand engines, boilers, machinery, grading equipment, tools, machine shops, and electrical supplies and appliances, foundry and factory supplies, and hardware of all kinds in all parts of the state of California, and several of the principal cities of the United States west of the Rocky Mountains; that by reason of the competent and efficient manner in which respondent has ever since October, 1915, and does now conduct said business, and by reason of advertising said business under said fictitious firm name of Western Iron & Metal Company, respondent has acquired and now commands an extensive patronage in the city of Los Angeles and throughout the state of California, and that he has acquired under said name and now enjoys a good will therein of great value."

The usual allegations of damage and injury that would accrue to respondent if appellants, a competitor, be permitted to do business under the same name heretofore adopted by respondent and to advertise said business under said name, follow:

It is admitted that appellant said Western Iron & Metal Company was duly incorporated on January 7, 1922, with its principal place of business at the city of Los Angeles; that thereupon David H. Miller was elected president, Lester W. Roth, vice president, and Albert K. Lucas, secretary and treasurer of said corporation. Said defendant corporation had not at the time of filing its answer been granted permission by the state corporation commissioner to issue or sell any of its capital stock upon its application made January 18, 1922. Appellant corporation denied that it is about to engage in an extensive campaign of advertising its said business under the name of the Western Iron & Metal Company, but does admit that it intends to advertise its name and its said business in the manner usually employed by persons conducting a business of a similar character.

Before bringing the action respondent filed with the county clerk of Los Angeles county a certificate setting out the name in full of his business, the place of business, and gave due notice of publication of said certificate as required of every person transacting business in this state under a fictitious name by the provisions of section 2466, Civil Code.

On the 16th day of January, 1922, before appellants made application to the corporation commissioner to issue or sell any stock, they were notified by respondent that, by reason of the latter having conducted the business heretofore described for a great many years prior to said day last above named under the name of Western Iron & Metal Company, he had acquired the right to use the same, and demanded that appellants and each of them refrain from using said name, but appellants have at all times refused to refrain from using said name.

[1] As an answer to the earnest objection made by appellants that the complaint is lacking in necessary and substantial averments, and that no allegations of ultimate facts are set out, but conclusions of law merely are pleaded, we deem it sufficient to quote therefrom. It alleges:

> That appellants "organized said corporation and adopted said name therefor with the intent and for the purpose of defrauding plaintiff and appropriating for their own use and benefit the good will of plaintiff's business and deluding and deceiving plaintiff's customers and the public in general into the belief that the business of plaintiff conducted at said city of Los Angeles would be and was being conducted by defendants. Plaintiff is informed and believes, and on that ground alleges, that defendants are about to commence and to continue, unless restrained by this court, an extensive campaign of advertising their said business under said name of Western Iron & Metal Company, and that, if said defendants so advertise their said business, they will actually mislead many customers of the plaintiff both actual and prospective to patronize said defendant Western Iron & Metal Company in the belief that the said persons were and are patronizing the plaintiff.
> "That, if the defendants herein and each and all of them are permitted to carry on business under the corporate name of Western Iron & Metal Company at said city of Los Angeles, or elsewhere, the prospective customers of plaintiff and the public in general will, at all times be deceived, misled, and defrauded into believing that the business so conducted by defendants is the business of plaintiff, all of which is and will be to the injury and damage of plaintiff and to the public in general.
> "That, unless restrained from so doing by the court, the defendants will continue and proceed to carry on their said business under the said name of Western Iron & Metal Company, a corporation, for and with the express purpose of deceiving plaintiff's customers and the public in general into the belief that plaintiff's business is defendant's business; that the name adopted by said defendants was at all times, and is now, calculated and intended to deceive customers of plaintiff herein, together with the public in general; that each and all of the acts of said defendants so made with the intention and purpose of defrauding and deceiving and influencing the business and injuring plaintiff have created and will continue to create much confusion in plaintiff's said business; that plaintiff gave to his said business the fictitious firm name of Western Iron & Metal Company, and for more than five years last past has conducted said business under said name; that plaintiff has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law, and that actions at law will not afford plaintiff plain, speedy, and adequate remedy for said continuing unlawful acts of said defendants, and that the remedy hereby sought is necessary to prevent a multiplicity of judicial proceedings; that plaintiff has had for many years the prior and exclusive right to the said name of Western Iron & Metal Company, for which reason the said defendants herein and none of them have any right to use said name Western Iron & Metal Company."

[2] It is true that conclusions of law, strictly speaking, are to be found within the quoted portions of the complaint, but nevertheless sufficient allegations of fact appear to save the complaint from total demolition because of a few apparent infirmities. From the nature of the situation the injury or damage that will accrue to respondent if appellants are permitted to do the threatened acts in the name attempted to be appropriated is plain. A pleader is not required to describe in extenso by a superfluity of words a result that must inevitably follow, provided the premises of a stated proposition be acceded to. Can there be any doubt as to the natural and logical effect the competition described in the complaint would have on respondent's business? Our attention has been called to the fact that the allegations of the complaint before us follow very closely, and confessedly were patterned after, the allegations of the complaint in Mills v. Conservatory of Music, 47 Cal. App. 300, 191 Pac. 546. We regard them as sufficient.

[3] Appellants contend quite vigorously that, where a verified complaint is the basis for injunctive relief, the facts stated therein must stand the test to which oral testimony would be subjected; and, further, where all the material allegations of the complaint are denied, and there are no affidavits supporting the complaint or other proof, the injunction should be dissolved. As an answer to the first statement of the rule it will be observed that all of the material allegations of the complaint except one are positive and direct, while several of the denials made of important allegations are on information and belief. The exception to the allegation in the complaint above mentioned is in respect to the allegation that appellants intend to advertise their competitive business under the same name that respondent is conducting and has heretofore conducted his business. Appellants admit that they actually intend to do the act alleged on information and belief, denying only that the advertising was to be as extensive as alleged. The admission, which is an important one, supplies the failure to plead in positive terms. There are sufficient indisputable facts alleged in the complaint to have justified the court in the exercise of its discretion in continuing in force its order.

[4] It is not in every case that a temporary injunction will be dissolved or refused for a failure of a plaintiff to meet a verified answer specifically denying every material allegation of the complaint.

> "There may be," said this court in Kendall v. Foulks, 180 Cal. 171, 179 Pac. 886, "peculiar circumstances in a case [and which we think exist in the instant case] justifying a temporary injunction even in the face of the absolute denials of the answer."

[5, 6] We think the case before us is a proper one for the granting of injunctive relief. It appears from positive averments that respondent was first in time in business and first in the selection of a combination of words as a designation of a business which he had established and conducted some six or seven years before appellants entered the field, and which business was extensive, and to the development of which respondent had expended much time and devoted energy and doubtless some skill. The complaint upon its face brings the instant case within the exception stated in Kendall v. Foulks, supra. We think the case last above cited fully disposes of appellants' contention that the court should have dissolved the temporary restraining order. It is there said:

> "It is a rule so universally followed and so often stated as to need only to be referred to that the granting, denying, dissolving, or refusing to dissolve a preliminary or temporary injunction rests in the sound discretion of the trial court upon a consideration of all the particular circumstances of each individual case. White v. Nunan, 60 Cal. 406; Marks v. Weinstock, Lubin & Co., 121 Cal. 53, 53 Pac. 362; Piper v. Hawley, 179 Cal. 10, 175 Pac. 417; 22 Cyc. 746. * * * 'The granting or denial of a preliminary injunction does not amount to an adjudication of the ultimate rights in controversy. It merely determines that the court, balancing the respective equities of the parties, concludes that, pending a trial on the merits, the defendant should or that he should not be restrained from exercising the rights claimed by him.'"

We cannot say that the court here abused its discretion in granting the temporary injunction.

[7] The case of the respondent does not depend upon an exclusive right to the use of a trade-mark, or, indeed, a trade-name, altogether, but rests upon the broad equitable ground that the methods employed by appellants fall under the ban and are denounced as unfair competition in commercial dealings. Unquestionably the public would be misled, deceived, and confused as to respondent's identity, and he would be placed at a greater business disadvantage than he could possibly otherwise be placed if the competition was conducted along the lines of ordinary legitimate business competition.

A discussion of the facts of this case is not to be confused with the principle announced in the line of cases which discuss the exclusive right to the use of trade-marks. The principle of law here invoked is entirely separable from the principles controlling trademark cases, the intermixing of which has sometimes confused the issue.

Upon a full consideration of the case as presented we are of the opinion that the temporary injunction against a continuance of the existing and threatened acts was properly granted.

[8] There is no misjoinder of parties defendant. It is admitted that the individual defendants named in the caption of the complaint are officers of the corporation.

The temporary injunction is broader that it should have been made, but doubtless there will be no attempt to enforce it without the limits of the state.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

The question whether statements made by the accused to a deputy sheriff while wounded and in hospital were free and voluntary is in the first instance for the trial court.

2. Criminal law 🔑406(5), 741(3)—Admissions of accused competent as against objection that statement did not refer to fatal difficulty, and question was for the jury.

In a prosecution for murder, a statement of the accused to an officer, made while accused was lying in the hospital wounded, held admissible as against objection that it was not apparent from the statement that the accused referred to the fight in which deceased came to his death, it being for the jury to determine from the whole case whether his statement referred to the killing in question.

3. Criminal law 🔑409—Evidence held to warrant jury in concluding that admission of accused referred to killing of deceased.

Evidence, in a prosecution for murder, tending to show that deceased was lying down at the time he was shot, that a struggle thereafter ensued, during which the deceased was repeatedly wounded, being shot twice in the neck and six times in the back, together with other circumstances, held to warrant the jury in finding that a certain admission by accused to an officer referred to the killing of deceased.

Jung Sam was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Zabala & Sargent, of Salinas, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WILBUR, C. J. The defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to be hanged. Soo Hoo Kay was murdered between 10 and 10:30 p. m. on the evening of May 20, 1922, at the old American Hotel, in the town of Castroville, Monterey county, Cal. A dozen or more shots were fired into the body of the deceased. These shots were heard by people in the neighborhood, and almost immediately after the shooting three Chinamen were seen to come out of the alley leading from the rear of the hotel and jump into an automobile. This same automobile was finally stopped near San Jose after an exciting chase, during which the automobile was driven almost 60 miles an hour. At the time of the arrest three Chinamen were found in the machine. The defendant Jung Sam was lying in the rear of the machine. He was wounded by a bullet in his right arm near the elbow, another in his breast, and a third in his right side near the edge of the rib. These three Chinamen were arrested for the murder, and were tried jointly. Wong Yuen and Lee Sing were acquitted.

It is unnecessary to state in detail the many circumstances leading to the conclusion that the three defendants were the same persons who fled from the rear of the American Hotel immediately after the shooting. Suffice it to say that at the time of the arrest some loose Smith & Wesson 38-caliber cartridges were found in the automobile, and were of the same caliber as those extracted from the body of the deceased; that a pair of tennis shoes were found in the machine, and that these fitted the tracks found in the rear of the American Hotel at Castroville immediately after the murder, and that the defendant had on a pair of unlaced leather shoes.

[1, 2] The only matter complained of by the appellant is the introduction of a statement made by him while he was in the hospital, and it is claimed that the injurious character of this evidence is made manifest by the fact that his co-defendants were acquitted while he was convicted. It should be noted in this connection that the fact that the defendant was wounded by bullets and that he was wearing unlaced shoes tended more definitely to connect him with the murder than the evidence with reference to his codefendants. However that may be, it is clear that the evidence was amply sufficient to sustain his conviction, and this is not seriously controverted by the defendant.

It is unnecessary to repeat in detail the evidence which is objected to. The witness Eastwood, who was at the hospital as a representative of the sheriff, to prevent the escape of the defendant, testified that he stated to the defendant:

> "Sam, you damn poor gunman. You miss your man three times; all three shots miss his head and go into the baseboard, and he jump up and fight like hell. What you do when he jump and fight?"

To this statement the defendant replied:

"I push him back and hold him."

Two objections are made to the introduction of this testimony: First, it is claimed that no proper foundation was laid, in that it did not appear that the statement was freely and voluntarily made. This matter was primarily for the consideration of the trial court. The witness was closely interrogated and cross-examined upon the subject, and it is clear from his testimony that the statement was free and voluntary. The other objection made is that it is not apparent from the statement made that the defendant referred to the fight with the deceased. It is true that the name of the deceased was not mentioned, and that the circumstances of the killing were not stated, but under the circumstances it was proper to admit the testimony, and the jury were to determine from the whole case whether or not it applied to the killing of the deceased.

[3] It appeared from the evidence that three bullet holes were found in the baseboard of the room in which the deceased was apparently sleeping at the time he was assaulted. The circumstances introduced in evidence tended to show that the deceased was lying down at the time he was shot, and that a struggle thereafter ensued, during which the deceased was repeatedly wounded. The deceased was shot twice in the neck and six times in the back.

From these circumstances the jury was justified in concluding that the conversation between the witness Eastwood and the defendant related to the shooting of the deceased. We find no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

WALKER v. WALKER. (L. A. 6741.)

Divorce 🔑221—Order requiring plaintiff husband to pay defendant wife's court costs and attorney's fees held proper.

In an action by a husband for divorce, where he pleaded and the court found that defendant was his wife, and he admitted that he was able to pay her court costs and attorney's fees, and that she was wholly without means, the court was authorized, under Civ. Code, § 137, to require the husband to pay the wife's court costs and attorney's fees to enable her to defend the action.

Clark & Law, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank B. Amend, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, J. Appellant, who is the plaintiff, brought an action against the respondent, who is his wife, for a divorce. After answer filed and due proceedings therefor had the court made an order that appellant pay to respondent the sum of $100 on account of court costs and attorney's fees incurred in defense of the action. This appeal, which is without merit, is from that order.

The appellant alleged in his complaint that he and the respondent intermarried at the place and time stated, "and ever since said date last mentioned have been, and now are, husband and wife." The trial court found that the defendant was the wife of plaintiff, as alleged by him. On the hearing of the motion it was established—in fact, the appellant admitted—that he was well able to pay the costs and attorney's fees awarded by the court, and the court found that the defendant was wholly without means. Under such circumstances section 137 of the Civil Code in terms authorizes the court at any time during the pendency of an action for divorce, in its discretion, to require the husband to pay as alimony any money necessary to enable the wife to prosecute or defend the action. PACIFIC SEASIDE HOME FOR CHILDREN v. NEWBERT PROTECTION DISTRICT. (L. A. 6788.)

1. Levees and flood control 🔑10—Protection district liable for negligent diversion of waters.

The Newbert protection district is a public corporation (St. 1907, p. 16) entitled to maintain and defend actions in law and in equity (section 25), and is liable for the negligent diversion of storm waters upon the property of another.

2. Levees and flood control 🔑11—Complaint against protection district held to state cause of action.

A complaint alleging that defendant protection district constructed channels for the water of the Santa Ana river so defectively and negligently that they would not carry the waters of the stream, and that, had the defendant not changed the natural course of the river or in any wise interfered with its natural flow, its waters would have flowed on into the ocean and no damage would have accrued to the plaintiff, held to state a cause of action for damage.

Action by the Pacific Seaside Home for Children against the Newbert Protection District. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 49 Cal. App. 326, 193 Pac. 169.

James Donovan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clyde Bishop, of Santa Ana, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. This is an action for damages done by flood water. The appeal was taken upon a typewritten transcript prepared in accordance with the provisions of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. The appellant does not print any part of the record in its brief. The respondent has filed no brief whatever. Appellant requests us to look in the record upon another appeal taken from an order sustaining a demurrer and dismissed by us for the reason that such an order was not appealable. The appellant states:

> "The theory upon which the court must have sustained the demurrer is that the defendant was a municipal corporation and that it was exempt from any liability, and that a cause of action could not be stated against the defendant upon the facts alleged in the plaintiff's third amended complaint. The trial court, as appellant maintains, erred in holding that the defendant was exempt from liability. That the defendant is not a municipal corporation, within the meaning of that term, is clearly established in the citations in our original brief."

[1, 2] The plaintiff undertakes to state a cause of action based upon damages to its real property resulting from the negligent construction of the levees erected by the defendant whereby water was diverted on to the defendant's land. The defendant was a public corporation (Stats. 1907, p. 16) entitled to maintain and defend actions in law and in equity (Stats. 1907, p. 16, § 25) and would be liable for the negligent diversion of storm waters upon the plaintiff's property. Elliott v. County of Los Angeles, 183 Cal. 472, 475, 191 Pac. 899. The gist of the plaintiff's complaint is that the defendant constructed channels for the water of the Santa Ana river so defectively and negligently that they would not carry the waters of the stream. Plaintiff alleges that—

> "Had the defendant not changed the natural course of the Santa Ana river, or in any wise interfered with its natural flow, the waters of the Santa Ana river would have flowed on into Newport Bay and no damage would have accrued to the plaintiff had the said river been permitted to flow as it naturally would had not the defendant constructed its channel to divert the same. * * *"

It is further alleged in effect that the injury occurred to the plaintiff by reason of the fact that the defendant negligently turned the waters of the Santa Ana river into a channel which was too small, and which was negligently constructed and maintained, and that by reason thereof it was damaged.

These facts sufficiently state a cause of action.

PEOPLE v. PARISI. (Cr. 2524.)

Criminal law ⟹661—Defendant's admission does not prevent prosecutor from proving guilt.

That the proof showed that defendant killed deceased and that defendant admitted that he killed deceased did not make it error for the district attorney to insist on introducing in evidence deceased's dying declaration, as against the contention that the only effect that the dying declaration could have was to prove that fact and put into the record testimony concerning deceased's children, which could only excite the minds of the jury.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and B. W. Gearhart, Dist. Atty., of Fresno, for the People.

WILBUR, C. J. The defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree and sentenced to be hanged. The jury was justified in believing that the defendant laid in wait for the deceased, Felix Paladino, in the vicinity of Fresno and H streets, Fresno, Cal., about 6 p. m., May 17, 1922; that the decedent was returning from his work, carrying a crate of strawberries, which he was taking home; that the defendant stopped the decedent, spoke to him, and then drew a revolver and began firing at him. The deceased dropped the crate of strawberries and fled as fast as he could, while the defendant followed him, firing at him as he ran, and finally overtook him. The defendant, having used all his ammunition, began beating the deceased over the head. Two firemen, Earl Hartman and R. M. Hicks, and a special police officer named J. T. Kennedy, intervened while the defendant was beating the deceased over the head with the butt of his revolver and placed the defendant under arrest and sent the deceased to a hospital, where he died as a result of his wounds. Four shots struck the deceased, one of which penetrated the lower abdomen, resulting in peritonitis, from which the decedent died. The defendant testified that when he met the deceased an altercation ensued, during which the deceased slapped him in the face and told him he would like to kill him; that the deceased then reached toward his hip pocket and drew a gun, but that the defendant succeeded in shooting first; and that a revolver duel ensued. A number of witnesses testified that at the time of the arrest of the defendant a bystander, who had been shot in the leg during the fusilade, ran up and struck the defendant in the face. The jury undoubtedly believed that the blow in the face which the defendant attributed to the deceased was in fact delivered by this bystander under the circumstances related by at least four witnesses.

[1, 2] The appellant's sole claim on appeal is that he should have been convicted of manslaughter, and that the verdict of murder in the first degree was the result of passion and prejudice induced in the jury by the admission of evidence which tended to incite the jury and led them to bring in the verdict of murder in the first degree. In support of this contention the appellant quotes some of the testimony adduced by the district attorney as a foundation for the introduction of the dying declaration of the decedent. It is not claimed that these statements or that this evidence was immaterial, but the ground advanced for the charge of misconduct on the part of the district attorney is as follows:

> "As a matter of fact there was no necessity for a dying declaration, or rather there was proof sufficient connecting the defendant with the killing without any dying declaration. As a matter of fact it was admitted, and all the dying declaration could do was to prove that fact, and therefore the persistent and continued and long drawn out attempts to get this dying declaration into the record and the testimony concerning his poor little children, etc., could only have been for the purpose of exciting the minds of the jury, and in our opinion it had the desired effect. We believe that the strongest critic of the conduct of the defendant and appellant would not say that he should be hung for the offense."

It is a sufficient answer to this claim to say that an admission by the defendant does not prevent the district attorney from presenting proof of the fact admitted. There is no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

CROCKETT v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.

1. Master and servant 🔑361—Workmen's compensation employment may be dual in character.

Employment may be dual in character, and, in so far as the employee acts in one capacity, he may be within the provisions of the Compensation Act, and in so far as he works in another capacity his employment will be exempt from its provisions.

2. Master and servant 🔑375(1)—Workmen's compensation; injury held received in "course of employment"; "household domestic service."

Where employee, engaged as carpenter to assist employer in converting barn into residence, was asked by employer's wife to clean away cobwebs and dirt which covered floor joists above a place where she wished to set a stove, and while doing so some dirt fell in his right eye, injuring it, held, that the Commission's conclusion was justified that the injury was compensable under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 6, in that the employee was performing services growing out of and incidental to his employment, and had not departed from his regular duties and engaged in household domestic service, excluded from compensation by section 8.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Course of Employment.]

3. Master and servant 🔑417(7)—Workmen's compensation; Commission's finding conclusive.

Whether or not an employee when injured was engaged in an excluded employment is a question of fact for the Commission, whose finding, if supported by any rational view of the evidence, is beyond judicial review.

4. Master and servant 🔑405(6)—Evidence held to support finding of complete loss of eye.

In compensation proceeding, evidence held to support finding of the Commission that employee had completely lost the sight of one eye.

In Bank.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by J. B. Smith, employee, opposed by P. M. Crockett, employer. Award by the Industrial Accident Commission to applicant, and employer brings certiorari. Affirmed.

Fred A. Watkins, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, J. Petitioner is here seeking an annulment of an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. An application for an adjustment of claim having been filed, the Commission found that—

> "J. B. Smith, applicant, while employed as a carpenter on November 2, 1920, at Los Angeles, by defendant, P. M. Crockett, sustained injury occurring in the course of and arising out of his employment, as follows: While sweeping down some walls in defendant's residence at the request of defendant's wife, a foreign body entered his eye, resulting in ulceration and complete loss of sight of right eye."

As, at the time of the injury, both the employer and employee were subject to the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, an award was made in favor of the applicant in the amount of $2,041, with an additional sum for medical expenses.

The circumstances surrounding the employment and injury, as found by the Commission, were as follows: Crockett, the employer, was engaged in converting a barn into a residence. He hired Smith as a carpenter to assist him in that work. Crockett and his family occupied the structure as a residence during the time the alterations were being made, the structure not being entirely habitable until the completion of the alterations. The contract of hire, contemplating employment for more than 10 working days, and at a labor cost of more than $100, was not, therefore, casual in its nature. In the course of his employment Crockett directed Smith to comply with any orders or directions which might be given him by Mrs. Crockett, petitioner's wife. It appears that during the progress of the work, while the principal task assigned to Smith was that of carpentry, yet due to the fact that he was the only man employed upon the place, he was called upon by Crockett to do a number of incidental jobs which would ordinarily, on a larger job, be performed by some one else. The record shows that Smith frequently went to a nearby lumber yard and transported lumber on his shoulders from that yard to the place where he was working. He cleaned up the débris which accumulated as the old portions of the barn were torn down. He also cleaned up the litter from the work performed by him. Under Crockett's specific orders he assisted in unloading a wagon of furniture, and on an occasion other than that of the time of the injury, under Crockett's specific direction, he cleaned cobwebs from the studding. On the day that the injury occurred Crockett, having an errand elsewhere, left the place, but before going gave Smith certain specific instructions as to carpentry work he wished performed, and then directed Smith to do whatever Mrs. Crockett might demand of him. While Smith was engaged upon the carpentry work Mrs. Crockett stated to him that she wished to move the cooking stove from the yard into the building, and asked him to clean away cobwebs and dirt which covered the floor joists above the place where the stove was to be set. She gave Smith a long-handled broom, and showed him where she wished the sweeping of the joists to be done. Smith accordingly undertook the task, and while engaged therein some dirt or foreign substance fell into his right eye, which resulted in the injury complained of.

[1] Employment may be dual in character. In so far as the employee acts in one capacity, he may be within the provisions of the Compensation Act; and in so far as he works in another capacity, his employment will be exempt from its provisions. George v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 178 Cal. 733, 174 Pac. 653; Kramer v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 31 Cal. App. 673, 677, 161 Pac. 278.

[2] On the theory that the facts narrated present such a case, the petitioner contends that when Smith stopped his carpentry work and began sweeping off the floor joists he departed from his regular duties, and engaged in household domestic service, and therefore, under the rule of excluded employments contained in section 8 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, he is not entitled to any recompense for his injury. The petitioner relies upon the two decisions last cited. In the first George was employed as janitor and gardener. He was injured while trimming a tree. The Commission found that it was while he was solely employed in doing a gardener's work that he was injured, and therefore not subject to compensation under the act because engaged in horticultural labor. In the second case the applicant was engaged in the capacity of a janitor for a dancing hall, and as a gardener to look after and care for the grounds. He was injured while pruning a tree, and the Commission concluded that he also was not entitled to the benefit of the act because engaged in horticultural labor. These cases are not in point under the facts here. When Crockett hired Smith, he had in contemplation the remodeling and reconstruction of the old barn. While Smith was by occupation a carpenter, events prove that it was the real intention of Crockett that Smith should do whatever was necessary and incidental to the work at hand. The findings and conclusions of the Commission on questions of fact are conclusive and binding, and are not subject to review.

[3] Whether or not at the time of his injury Smith was engaged in an excluded employment was a question of fact to be determined by the Commission. Its finding, if supported by any rational view of the evidence, is beyond review here. George v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 178 Cal. 733, 735, 174 Pac. 653. In the light of the testimony in the record, it cannot be said that the conclusion of fact in this case was an unreasonable or improper one. At the time of the injury Smith was performing services growing out of and incidental to his employment. He was acting within the course of his employment, as found by the Commission, and the injury was proximately caused thereby. On this basis he was entitled to compensation. Workmen's Compensation, etc., Act, § 6 (St. 1919, p. 912).

[4] Petitioner claims that there is no evidence to support the finding of complete loss of the sight of the eye. The eye injured was "the master eye." The specialist who examined and treated the applicant testified that the injury caused an infected ulcer of the cornea, and resulted in the loss of vision of the right eye. He thought the patient could distinguish light. From the certificate of permanent disability filed with the Commission by the same specialist when the maximum restoration of the function of the injured eye had been attained, it appears that Smith has no acuteness of sight for far, near, or any working distance. He has vision of objects only. Glasses will afford no relief for the injured eye. The evidence fairly and substantially supports the finding of the Commission.

The award is affirmed.

McILLMOIL v. FRAWLEY MOTOR CO. et al. (S. F. 10286.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 7, 1923. Rehearing Denied April 5, 1923.)

1. Contracts 🔑153—Law leans against destruction of contract because of uncertainty.

The law leans against the destruction of contracts because of uncertainty, and it will, if feasible, so construe contracts as to carry into effect the reasonable intentions of the parties if ascertainable.

2. Contracts 🔑9(1)—Enforceable, though description of subject-matter is indefinite.

Though the description of the subject-matter of a contract may be indefinite, the contract is enforceable if the subject-matter is capable of being identified and rendered definite and certain by evidence outside the contract.

3. Sales 🔑1(4)—Contract for sale of old automobile and purchase of new one held not void for uncertainty.

Where defendants were automobile dealers selling all models of new M. cars, the prices of which were standard and fixed, a contract wherein plaintiff authorized defendants to sell his old M. car for a price of $1,000 to himself and retain $500 as a deposit on a new M. car, which plaintiff agreed to buy, was not void as being uncertain, though it failed to state the model or the price of the new car.

4. Sales 🔑82(2)—Where instrument is silent, time of payment is time of delivery.

Where a written contract of sale is silent as to the terms of payment, the law will supply the deficiency, and require that payment be made at time of delivery.

5. Contracts 🔑169—Circumstances surrounding parties at time of contracting may be considered in ascertaining intent.

"'That said plaintiff insists upon payment to him of the said entire sum of $1,000, the price paid defendants on the sale of said 1917 Mitchell roadster, * * * but said defendants claim the right to retain and do retain $500 of said sum of $1,000 as a deposit on the sale to plaintiff of a new Mitchell car as provided in said contract. * * *

"'That on said 6th day of November, 1920, and for a long time prior thereto, and ever since then, the defendants have been, and now are, dealers in new Mitchell cars of different models and prices, and at all times have been ready and willing to sell and deliver to the plaintiff a new Mitchell car to be by him selected and for a price to be agreed upon by the plaintiff and defendants and payable on such terms and conditions as might be agreed upon by said parties.

"'That the plaintiff has since the said 6th day of November, 1920, failed to agree to purchase a new Mitchell car, and has failed and refused to agree upon a price for a new Mitchell car, and has failed and refused to agree on any terms or conditions on which the purchase price is to be paid by him for a new Mitchell car.

"'That the prices of new Mitchell cars are all standard and fixed.

"'That the selection of the car will determine the price to be paid.

"'That on said 6th day of November, 1920, and long prior thereto, and ever since then, there have been more than three different classes or varieties of Mitchell new cars, each variety or class having a different price.

"'Plaintiff claims that he is entitled to a judgment against the defendants for $1,000, the entire sum received by defendants on account of the sale of plaintiff's old Mitchell car, for the reason, as he contends, that the agreement, above referred to, is void and unenforceable, being nothing more than an agreement to enter into an agreement, the terms of which have not been determined, and concerning a subject-matter itself yet to be ascertained and selected by future negotiations and consent of the parties.

[1, 2] "'The law does not favor, but leans against, the destruction of contracts because of uncertainty; and it will, if feasible, so construe agreements as to carry into effect the reasonable intentions of the parties if that can be ascertained. Sutleff v. Seidenberg, S. & Co., 132 Cal. 63, 64 Pac. 131, 469. The description of the subject-matter of agreement may be indefinite, and yet, if it is capable of being identified and rendered definite and certain by evidence aliunde, the contract is enforceable. Mebius & Drescher Co. v. Mills, 150 Cal. 229, 88 Pac. 917; Elliott on Contracts, § 179.

[3, 4] "'Applying this rule to the facts of this case, we think the contention of plaintiff that the contract is void for uncertainty cannot be sustained. It is true that the written contract did not specify the particular model of new Mitchell car which the plaintiff was to purchase, nor the price to be paid therefor, nor the time of payment; but in law "that is certain which may be made certain." Here the plaintiff had agreed to purchase from the defendants a new Mitchell automobile. The particular car to be taken was not thereafter a subject of negotiations, all that remained to be done in this behalf being the selection by the plaintiff of one of the various models of Mitchell cars on sale by the defendants. Nor was the price to be paid therefor a subject of future agreement, since, the prices of the various models, according to the agreed statement of facts, being fixed and standard, the selection by plaintiff of the car desired determined the price and made the contract definite in that respect also. As to the terms of payment, the written contract being silent upon this point, the law itself supplies the deficiency, and requires that payment shall be made at the time of delivery.

"'"Where one buys personal property at an agreed price, he, by implication of law, agrees to pay the price, and if no time of payment is agreed upon, the law fixes the time of delivery as the time of payment. If the time of delivery is postponed until the occurrence of some act to be done by the seller, the time of payment, if not otherwise provided for, will be postponed, by implication of law, to the time of such delivery. This rule applies to cases where the time of payment of part of the price is specifically fixed and the time of the payment of the remainder is left unprovided for." Gilfallan v. Gilfallan, 168 Cal. 23, 141 Pac. 623, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 784.

"' It is true that in the agreed statement of facts it is stated that the defendants "were ready and willing to sell and deliver to the plaintiff a new Mitchell car to be by him selected and for a price to be agreed upon by plaintiff and defendants payable on such terms and conditions as might be agreed upon by said parties. That plaintiff * * * has refused to select for purchase a new Mitchell car, and has failed and refused * * * to agree upon any terms or conditions on which a new Mitchell car is to be sold to him, * * * nor the conditions on which the purchase price is to be paid by him for a new Mitchell car." An argument is made by the appellant based upon this part of the statement of facts that the terms of delivery and payment were left to future negotiation; but it will be observed that the language in question merely describes what the defendants did or attempted to do, and what the plaintiff refused to do after the agreement to purchase the car (which was in writing) was made. The respective obligations of the parties are to be found by reference to the contract itself, and not by what one or other of the parties thereto might be willing to do in order to induce the other to comply with its terms. Evidently the defendants were willing to go much farther than their contract compelled them, and in their anxiety to consummate the transaction endeavored to agree with the plaintiff upon a price and terms of payment which should be satisfactory to him. But the inclusion in the agreed statement of facts of these matters did not alter the rights of the parties. The defendants could have insisted upon the list price and cash on delivery; and an argument based upon their complaisance in this regard comes with bad grace from a person denying any obligation under the contract.

"'As we have seen, the alleged uncertainty of the contract in the matter of the particular car to be taken and the price to be paid therefor disappears upon the performance by the plaintiff of an act which he under the contract was compelled to do, namely, select the particular car desired by him; and the omission of the contract to state any terms of payment merely furnished the occasion to apply thereto the principle of law that payment is to be made upon delivery.'

"We have examined all of the long list of authorities collated by appellant in his petition for a hearing by this court, and find in them nothing contrary to the conclusions here expressed, with the single exception of one Alabama case which appears to be at variance with settled decisions of this state, and which we do not feel impelled to follow. The real controversy herein is not as to the rules of the law, but only as to their application to the present situation.

"It is to be noted that the defendants are not here seeking specific enforcement of the contract or damages for its breach. They are not asking the court to decree a forfeiture, or adjudge a penalty or award damages; neither are they seeking to be relieved from the contract. They have performed their part, so far as they have been permitted to do so, and they stand ready to complete their performance whenever the plaintiff will enable them to do so. We are here confronted with the peculiar situation of a plaintiff, while retaining the benefits which have accrued to him from the contract, asking the court to secure to him the fruits of his own violation thereof; the contract having been entered into in entire good faith, at least on the part of the defendants.

[5] "It is nevertheless true, as plaintiff contends, that, if the contract leaves some essential element undetermined, and provides no means for the determination thereof, but leaves it to the future negotiation and agreement of the parties, it is void, and the plaintiff is entitled as a matter of law to the relief here sought. But we are satisfied such is not here the case. The contract being silent as to the time of performance and the terms of payment, the law supplies these elements, and specifies a reasonable time for the performance, and cash on delivery as the terms of payment. This leaves only the question as to the subject of the sale, and the price. For the purpose of arriving at the true intent of the parties, a contract is always to be construed in the light of the circumstances surrounding them at the time of its making. Here it is admitted that the defendants were dealers selling all models of new Mitchell cars; 'that the prices of new Mitchell cars are all standard and fixed; that the selection of the car will determine the price to be paid.' (Italics ours.) It is thus obvious that the parties contracted with reference to those standard and fixed prices. The contract then is to be construed as if it read, with respect to plaintiff's promise, as follows: 'I will buy (from the defendants) a new Mitchell car of one of the following described models, to be selected by me, at the price hereinafter set opposite the description thereof. I will make the selection within a reasonable time hereafter, and will pay the balance of the said purchase price in cash on delivery' followed by a description of the different models with the price of each.

"It thus appears that the contract herein is identical in all essential respects with that which was held valid and binding in Mebius & Drescher Co. v. Mills, 150 Cal. 229, 88 Pac. 917. As was there said by way of illustration: 'Reduced to simpler terms, if a man should say to a seller, "I will take from you three dozen pocketknives of one or all of three described kinds," the price for each kind being specified, "but I want you to agree to give me a week in which to determine which of the kinds I will select," it would come with some astonishment to a merchant to be told that such an agreement was void in law for uncertainty. It is probably safe to say that a million of such transactions take place every month throughout the country without question or the possibility of question as to the legality of the agreement.'"

The transaction above related presents a situation that is doubtless common to the business world, and particularly so to the business of buying, selling, and exchanging automobiles. The agreement was to purchase an automobile of the Mitchell type or make from defendants, who were dealers in and the agents for the sale of said cars. Undoubtedly the agreement to purchase a Mitchell car was the consideration that moved the said agents to undertake to dispose of plaintiff's used Mitchell car at a price that would net the latter $1,000. In effect, it was agreed that $500 of the sum realized by the efforts of said dealers should be retained by them as a deposit to be applied to the purchase of a Mitchell car thereafter to be selected by plaintiff. The fact that plaintiff requested and was given wide range in the matter of selection could not have affected the question of certainty as to his right or privilege to make his election. The seating capacity or pattern of the automobile was in the absolute control of plaintiff. The moment he exercised his volition, that moment the price became fixed, or, better expressed, the fixed price attached.

From what has been heretofore said we are unable to see that plaintiff was in any way deceived or prejudiced by his contract if he really intended to comply with it. It must be presumed that he will be as fairly treated in the transaction into which he chose to enter as would any other purchaser. It must further be presumed that he will be dealt with on the same terms as are extended to the general business public dealing with like concerns. No presumption of oppression or unfairness on the part of defendants can be indulged against them. Should they attempt unconscionably or unfairly to oppress plaintiff the law provides a remedy.

We feel that the essential elements of certainty are to be found in the contract or irresistibly flow from its terms. The sale and purchase of a standard make of automobile, to wit, a Mitchell, was the subject of the contract. Plaintiff knew or had means of knowing the fixed price of the type, pattern, or capacity of the car that he wished to purchase. He also knew that, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, the price would be the fair market price of any car he might select. Placing ourselves in the position of the parties at the time the contract was made, we feel convinced that a compliance with its terms works no hardship against plaintiff, and that it may be equitably performed.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re SUTTER-BUTTE BY-PASS ASSESSMENT NO. 6 OF SACRAMENTO & SAN JOAQUIN DRAINAGE DIST. (Sac. No. 3405.)

1. Constitutional law 🔑329—Constitutional right to appeal cannot be destroyed nor delimited by legislative enactment.

If the right of appeal is constitutionally granted in any given case, such right cannot be destroyed nor delimited by legislative enactment.

2. Constitutional law 🔑56—Supreme Court cannot be deprived of constitutional grant of appellate jurisdiction, through creation of new remedy by Legislature.

The Legislature cannot, by the creation of a new remedy, deprive the Supreme Court of its constitutional grant of appellate jurisdiction conferred by Const. art. 6, § 4, in all cases in equity and at law involving the legality of any tax or assessment, if the right involved in the execution of the remedy is of a character which in its very essence is equitable and was of an equitable nature and character at the time of the adoption of the constitutional provision conferring appellate jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the remedy.

3. Appeal and error 🔑36, 41(1)—Supreme Court held to have appellate jurisdiction of judgment as to validation of drainage assessment; "case"; "special proceeding"; "action."

A proceeding to validate an assessment by a drainage district, created by St. 1913, p. 252, amendatory of St. 1911 (Ex. Sess.) p. 117, being one to establish the validity of an assessment, is a "case" and not a "special proceeding," which has reference only to such proceedings as may be commenced independently of a pending action by petition or motion upon notice, in order to obtain special relief, and the Supreme Court has jurisdiction of an appeal from a judgment therein by Const. art. 6, § 4, conferring on the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction in all cases in equity and in all cases at law, which involve the legality of any tax, assessment, etc., notwithstanding that the statute (St. 1919, p. 1094, § 8) forbids an appeal.

Proceedings to validate Sutter-Butte By-Pass Assessment No. 6 of the Sacramento & San Joaquin Drainage District. On motion to dismiss appeal from a judgment in the proceeding. Motion denied.

Thomas Rutledge, Brown & Albery, and Seth Millington, Jr., all of Colusa, Theodore Chester, of Sacramento, George Clark, of Los Angeles (Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck and Burke Corbet, all of San Francisco, A. B. Cox, of New Orleans, La., K. C. Partridge and John S. Partridge, both of San Francisco, Elston, Clark & Nicols, of Berkeley, and Devlin & Devlin, amici curiæ), for appellants.

Frank Freeman, of Willows, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal taken to this court from a judgment in "a judicial proceeding" (Stats. 1919, p. 1093, § 4) brought and heard in the superior court in and for the county of Sutter, three judges sitting, upon the ground that the judgment is final and not appealable, either to this court or to a district court of appeal. If the judgment is an appealable one and the appeal lies in the first instance to a district court of appeal, the appeal may be transferred by this court to the proper District Court of Appeal, as provided in article 6, § 4, of the Constitution (People v. McKamy, 168 Cal. 531, 533, 143 Pac. 752), or retained in this court pursuant to the power possessed by this court to order a transfer to it, either before or after judgment given in any case pending in a District Court of Appeal (Keech v. Joplin, 157 Cal. 1, 7, 106 Pac. 222).

The case now here upon a perfected appeal involves the validation of an assessment, aggregating in value some $8,000,000, of the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district, a governmental agency created by the special act of May 26, 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 252), which is amendatory of the act of December 24, 1911 (Stats. 1911 [Ex Sess.], p. 117). No contention is made that the said district was not legally organized and, indeed, no such contention could be made, for the circumstances attending its creation are as adequate to justify such legislation for the creation of a drainage district as they were in People v. Sacramento Drainage District, 155 Cal. 373, 103 Pac. 207, where similar legislation was upheld.

The act of May 27, 1919, authorized the issuance and sale of bonds of the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district (Stats. 1919, p. 1092), and provided that after an assessment had been levied by the reclamation board, upon lands within the district, the board had authority to determine that it would be best to issue bonds to pay the cost of the works, etc., and that, if the board did so determine, it should commence "a judicial proceeding for the validation of said assessment" in the superior court for the county "within which the largest acreage of land affected by said assessment is situate" (section 5), and that three judges should sit and act in the proceeding. Athearn v. Nicol, 187 Cal. 86, 200 Pac. 942. After taking the statutory steps enumerated, the board instituted such a proceeding as the one outlined in the superior court of Sutter county, which resulted in a judgment validating the assessment, which was rendered by a unanimous vote of the three judges. Thereupon the appeal from that judgment, here sought to be dismissed, was perfected, notwithstanding a provision of the statute that:

> "The decision of a majority of said court shall be final and conclusive, and no motion for a new trial of said proceeding shall be allowed, and no appeal from the judgment given and made by said court shall be had." Stats. 1919, p. 1094, § 8.

The provision forbidding an appeal is plain and unambiguous, and beyond question is applicable to the appeal here sought to be dismissed. We are relieved, therefore, from any difficulties respecting the interpretation or applicability of the provision purporting to prevent an appeal to the motion to dismiss now before us.

The motion to dismiss turns upon the solution of the question of whether or not the provision of the statute in question, denying an appeal, contravenes a claimed constitutional right of appeal. All of the several arguments of the appellants may be merged into the one proposition, that they have a constitutionally guaranteed right of appeal, and it will only be necessary for us to discuss and decide but one of the contentions made in that behalf, and that is that the validating proceeding provided for by the act in question is in its essence either a suit in equity or one at law, involving the validity of an assessment, and therefore falls within the appellate jurisdiction conferred upon this court and guaranteed to litigants by that constitutional provision which provides that this court shall have appellate jurisdiction "on appeal from the superior courts * * * in all cases in equity; * * * also, in all cases at law which involve the * * * legality of any tax, * * * assessment," etc. Const. art. 6, § 4.

[1] Concededly the right of appeal from the judgment of an inferior to a higher court must be found either in the state's Constitution or statutes, and it is the settled rule of law that, if the right of appeal is constitutionally granted in any given case, such right cannot be destroyed nor delimited by legislative enactment.

> "The courts of this state derive their powers and jurisdiction from the Constitution of the state. The constitutional jurisdiction can neither be restricted nor enlarged by legislative act. An attempt to take away from the courts judicial power conferred upon them by the Constitution * * * is void." Pacific Telephone, etc., Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 690, 137 Pac. 1119, 1138 (50 L. R. A. [N. S.] 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822).

The case last cited, and other cases assembled and referred to therein, recognize that litigants have a constitutionally guaranteed right of appeal in all litigated matters within the express jurisdiction of appellate courts. And if the Legislature cannot take away this right by direct enactment, neither can it accomplish the same result by any indirect devise. While the Legislature has, ordinarily, the power to create a new remedy for the enforcement of a right or a defense against a wrong, it cannot, under the guise of creating a new statutory remedy, deprive a litigant of an existing constitutionally guaranteed right to defend, even unto a court of last resort, against the enforcement of an alleged right. This right to so defend, once existing, continues, regardless of the form in which the Legislature may cast the remedy. In other words, as was said in the case of People v. Perry, 79 Cal. 105, 108, 21 Pac. 423, 424:

> "This court retains jurisdiction of the case, notwithstanding the Legislature may have changed the procedure, enlarged the remedy, and given it a new name. To hold otherwise would be to admit a power in the Legislature to abridge our jurisdiction, and take from parties the right of appeal, by the easy device of a change of procedure, in many cases, where the right and jurisdiction are unquestioned."

[2] In other words, the Legislature cannot, by the creation of a new remedy, deprive this court of its constitutional grant of appellate jurisdiction, if the right involved in the execution of the remedy is of a character which in its very essence is equitable and was of an equitable nature and character at the time of the adoption of the constitutional provision, which gave to this court appellate jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the remedy. It follows, therefore, that, if the proceeding before us is included in that class of cases, in contradistinction to special proceedings, over which appellate jurisdiction has been given by the Constitution, the appellants have a constitutionally guaranteed right of appeal of which they cannot be deprived.

The phrase "special proceeding" is used in the code practice in contradistinction to "action." That phrase has no reference to provisional remedies in actions at law or in equity. It has reference only to such proceedings as may be commenced independently of a pending action by petition or motion upon notice, in order to obtain special relief. Carpenter v. Jones, 121 Cal. 362, 53 Pac. 842; State v. District Court, 28 Mont. 227, 72 Pac. 613. And, generally speaking, any proceeding in a court of justice which was not, under the common-law or equity practice, either an action at law or a suit in equity, is a special proceeding. In re Central Irrigation District, 117 Cal. 382, 387, 49 Pac. 354. See, also, In re Joseph's Estate, 118 Cal. 660, 50 Pac. 768. The proceeding in question here would seem at first blush to be a special proceeding—one sui generis, and designed to constitute a remedy in itself, complete and entirely different from, and independent of, the remedies ordinarily afforded to the state for the enforcement of an assessment or to a taxpayer for relief from a void assessment.

But, in dealing with the subject-matter involved in the proceeding below, we must have regard to substance rather than to form. Even though the Legislature created in the instant case what is seemingly a new remedy, if it be in effect a proceeding to adjudicate old rights which are equitable in their nature or a proceeding which, in substance, is an action at law, it will be treated as a "case" rather than a special proceeding. Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, 113 Pac. 147; McNeil v. Morgan, 157 Cal. 373, 108 Pac. 69.

In the Estate of Cheda, 187 Cal. 322, 202 Pac. 133, we recognized the justice and obvious propriety of this conclusion. In that case there was an order made in probate which, considered strictly as a probate order, was not appealable. Nevertheless we held it to be appealable because, in substance and practice, it was, in effect, an action for specific performance, and hence a case in equity, and therefore within the constitutionally guaranteed jurisdiction of this court.

[3] We cannot escape applying the same rule here, for, after all is said and done, the proceeding before us is one to establish, pro tanto at least, the validity of an assessment, and moreover, it has all the characteristics of a case, somewhat after the manner of a suit in equity, to quiet title to land. The purpose of the proceeding is to establish the validity of an assessment with a view to a bond issue. Once the steps taken in the process of levying the assessment are adjudged in the proceeding in question to be legal, the obligation to pay will follow almost as a matter of course.

The proceeding instituted in the court below is undoubtedly a judicial proceeding. The statute creating and permitting the institution and prosecution of that proceeding declares and defines it to be a judicial proceeding; and it has been determined by this court to be a judicial proceeding in the case of Athearn v. Nicol, 187 Cal. 86, 200 Pac. 942. The proceeding in question has all the earmarks of a "case" in the ordinary acceptation of the term. The proceeding is instituted by the filing of what is practically a complaint; the parties to be affected thereby are brought into court by what is in effect a substituted service; a hearing is had in a court by a court composed of three judges; findings must be made and a judgment rendered and entered thereon; and, as was stated in Athearn v. Nicol, supra:

> "It is very clear that the Legislature contemplated a court proceeding. It provided that the judicial proceedings to validate the assessment should be commenced in the superior court. * * * And it is manifest throughout that the whole scheme was to have a judgment of the superior court affirming the validity of the bonds before they were issued and to permit no other attack thereon."

Clearly, therefore, it can be said to be a "case" in the general sense, and if it be a case, as we think it is, then it certainly is one involving the legality of an assessment and therefore well within the letter and spirit of the constitutional provision which grants to this court and guarantees to litigants the right, beyond legislative control, to an appeal in all cases, either at law or in equity, involving the validity of any tax or assessment.

The motion to dismiss is denied.

LONDON GUARANTEE & ACCIDENT CO., Limited, v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 10335.)

1. Master and servant ⟹375(2)—Workmen's compensation; injuries going to and from work not compensable.

Generally, injuries sustained while an employee is traveling to and from his place of employment are not within the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, but the rule does not apply to cases where an employee, either in his employer's or his own time, is going to or from his place of employment on some substantial mission for his employer growing out of his employment, where such mission is the major factor of the journey or movement and not merely incidental thereto.

2. Master and servant ⟹375(2)—Workmen's compensation; injury at home after doing work for employer there and after meal there held not compensable.

Where employee, with master's consent, took computing work home in order to figure at a quieter place than the office, and, after finishing his calculations, ate a light lunch, and slipped on the floor of his house while leaving to go to the office, fracturing his hip, the injury was not compensable; his object in going to the house for computing having been completed, and the carrying of the computations to the office being merely incidental to his main purpose of returning there.

Lawlor, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Proceeding before the Industrial Accident Commission under the Workmen's Compensation Act by M. Schottik, employee, opposed by Hinz & Landt, a corporation, employer, and the London Guarantee & Accident Company, insurance carrier. The proceeding was dismissed as to the employer, award was made to the employee, and the insurance carrier brings certiorari. Award annulled.

Rehearing denied; Lawlor and Seawell, JJ., dissenting.

Carroll S. Bucher and Walter H. Linforth, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an application for a writ of review of an award of the Industrial Accident Commission, made to defendant M. Schottik, an employee of Hinz & Landt, a corporation doing business in San Francisco, and against the petitioner, London Guarantee & Accident Company, the insurance carrier. The proceeding before the Commission was dismissed as to the employer.

The pertinent facts may be stated to be that M. Schottik was employed by Hinz & Landt in the capacity of assistant manager. He was injured on April 1, 1922, under the following circumstances: Having some important figuring to do for his employer, and desiring a quieter place than the office of his employer in which to do it, he, with such employer's approval, took the work to his home. He arrived there at about 11 o'clock in the forenoon, and he had finished his calculations about 12:30 o'clock. He then ate his lunch, and as he was approaching the outer door of his home to leave the premises for the purpose of returning to the office he slipped on the hardwood floor and sustained a fracture of the hip, the accident occurring a little before 1 o'clock. It was not his habitual custom to go home for lunch, but it was not an unusual occurrence for him to do so.

In support of its application for a writ of review, the petitioner urges that the accident having occurred after the completion of the work upon which Mr. Schottik was engaged for his employer and during the time that he was devoting to his ordinary midday cessation of activity for the purpose of taking lunch, it cannot reasonably be said to have arisen in the course of his employment, notwithstanding the fact that the purpose which had brought him to his home was to perform work for his employer, and hence is not a compensable injury under the terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831).

[1] According to the provisions of that act an employee, in order to be entitled to compensation, must have been injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. As a general rule injuries sustained while an employee is traveling to and from his place of employment are held not to come within the provisions of the act (O. A. & G. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 173 Cal. 313, 159 Pac. 1041, L. R. A. 1917B, 336; Bradbury's Workmen's Compensation, p. 468), although in a broad sense they may be said to be incidental to his employment. Exceptions to the general rule are cases where an employee, either in his employer's or his own time, is going to or from his place of employment on some substantial mission for his employer growing out of his employment. In such cases it is held that the employee is within the protection of the act. But the mission must be the major factor in the journey or movement, and not merely incidental thereto; that is to say, if incidental to the main purpose of going to or from the place of employment, it would not bring such person under the protection of the act. If, on the other hand, the main purpose of going or coming was to perform some act arising out of his employment, he would be under the protection of the act although, incident to the performance of such duty, he might be going or coming from his home.

[2] In the case at bar, if the injury had occurred while he was on his way to or from home, he intending to take lunch after his return to the office with the computations, we think his presence in his home would have been attributable entirely to the performance of the work which had taken him there; but under the circumstances of this case it must be held that, having remained in his home after the completion of the work for the purpose of taking his lunch, his object in going there was accomplished, and his service to his employer was not resumed until his return to his place of employment; and that the carrying of the computations to the office was merely incidental to his main purpose of returning there. He is in no different position than if he had gone to a restaurant for his lunch and had there slipped on the floor, or if he had finished his work in his home late in the afternoon, and had remained at home until the following morning, intending to take the computations with him to the office at that time. We think therefore that his injury, suffered under the circumstances detailed, was not one coming within the provisions of the act.

The author of Bradbury's Workmen's Compensation, in the chapter of his work devoted to the question of what injuries may be said to arise out of and in the course of the employment, cites a number of cases in which the injury was held not to be within the protection of the act. Thus a boy employed in a general store was accustomed on going to work each morning to buy vegetables for his employer at a market located on the direct route from his home to the store. He was accidentally injured by a collision with a street car while on his way to work and before reaching the market.

A laundry driver, after putting up his team for the night, was injured while riding home on his bicycle. It was held that the accident did not arise out of his employment; that the rights of the parties were not affected by the fact that the laundry driver was accustomed, after putting up his team for the night, to gather and leave laundry at residences while riding home on his bicycle, when, as a matter of fact, he was not performing these services on the evening of the accident; nor were the rights of the parties affected by the fact that the employee was taking his employer's account books home at night for the purpose of working on them, instead of doing this work at the employer's office, where desk room was furnished for the purpose. (Id., p. 469.)

An employee whose duty it was to mail letters on her way to the train while returning home at night from her place of work, while crossing the track after mailing the letters was struck by a train and injured, and it was held that the injury did not arise out of the employment. (Id., p. 470).

A police judge, under the terms of his employment, was expected to give only part of his time for such work, being allowed the remainder of the time for his private practice as a lawyer. He had no understanding with the city as to the exact number of hours he was to give it, what hours of the day he was to be available for public business, or what hours should be reserved for his private affairs. In fact, he set his own hours for holding court, and allowed himself to be interrupted at any time of the day or night to dispose of judicial duties arising outside the courtroom. He was accustomed to draw papers, fix bail, hear small cases, etc., at his private office or elsewhere whenever called upon. At the time of the accident he was returning to his private office from luncheon at his home, intending to get some police court papers at his office, where they had been prepared, and, about an hour afterwards, to go directly to the courtroom to call his calendar. While crossing the street in going toward his own office, he was struck by an automobile and severely bruised and injured. It was held that the injury did not arise out of his employment. (Id., p. 489.)

We think it follows from what we have said that the Industrial Accident Commission acted without its jurisdiction in making the award in question. The award should be annulled, and it is so ordered.

We concur: WILBUR, C. J.; WASTE, J.; MYERS, J.; LENNON, J.; SEAWELL, J.

LAWLOR, J. I dissent. In my opinion this is a case in which it may be said the employee's mission for his employer at the time of his injury was the "major factor in the journey." It was found that—

> "He sustained a fracture of the hip by reason of accidentally slipping and falling upon the floor of his own home as he was in the act of leaving it during the noon hour in order to return to the premises of employment, several blocks away, which he had quit about two hours previously in order to make certain exacting computations of prices, required by his employment, under the conditions of quiet offered by his home and not available at the place or vicinity of employment, and which computations he had finished just prior to partaking of a hurried luncheon immediately before starting for the place of employment."

The evidence offered on behalf of the employee, which is not contradicted, discloses that the employee often, with the full permission and authority of his superior in the company, took data home to figure prices from; that it was necessary he have a quiet place in which to do that particular work; that the office was too noisy; and that he had no place in which he could work quietly other than his home. He frequently would take the papers to his residence during the day, complete the work, and return to the office. No question is raised but that it was proper for him to do the figuring at home on the day of the accident. It does not appear that he was customarily required to take his lunch at any particular time. On the contrary, it does appear that his time was his own and that he came and went as he pleased, working at such hours as he saw fit.

On this occasion he had, an hour and a half before eating, gone home for the purpose of doing the figuring. It was not his custom to go home to lunch; he did so only five or six times a month, and he testified that on the day in question he would have taken lunch in a restaurant downtown had he not gone home on his employer's business. That his lunch on that day was a matter of minor import is shown by the fact that he ate only a piece of bread and cheese and that he got ready to go back to the office, washed his hands, ate lunch, and started, all in less than half an hour.

From these facts it seems clear that this is not similar to an ordinary case wherein an employee is injured while on his way to or from work, or while out at his meals. In the case at bar the employee, as part of his duty, had gone to the office, procured the papers on which he was to work, and had proceeded to his home because of the necessity of figuring on the prices in quiet. It was also necessary for him to return to the office with the completed calculations. If the figuring had been done at any time of the day, either at the office or at his home, and no other element were present, it would not be claimed the employer was not liable. It is conceded that if he had not stopped to eat the accident would be brought within the provisions of the act. It is asserted that because the employee had stopped to take lunch, the time of taking which was within his own volition, what followed was not in the course of and did not arise out of his employment and that the return trip was at his own risk. I know of no other authority which goes to this extent. This is not a case where the employee has departed from the course of travel for purposes of his own. The rights of the employer were not prejudiced in any way by the incident of the lunch, for when the employee picked up the papers to leave he proceeded back to the office just as he would have, had he left the house without eating. It is not claimed that the act of eating was an efficient cause of the accident, and the risk was the same whether he ate or not. But because he may have deviated slightly, notwithstanding such deviation was in no way connected with the injury and he had resumed his employment when the accident occurred, it is held the rest of the journey would be at his own risk. In other words, it is held that because there may not have been an unbroken line of action by the employee after the figuring was completed he must be denied compensation for his injury. Under the rule laid down in the majority opinion, it would be difficult to conceive of a case where the slightest lack of continuity in the work in hand would not relieve the employer of liability. Such a result is entirely opposed to the spirit of the compensation act and tends to a subversion of its beneficent purposes.

CITY OF SAN BERNARDINO v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA.

1. Railroads ⊂⇒95(2)—Statute giving Railroad Commission power over municipalities to determine terms of maintenance of railroad viaduct crossings held constitutional.

Public Utilities Act, § 43, as amended by St. 1917, p. 320, giving the Railroad Commission authority over municipalities to determine the terms of maintenance of railroad viaduct crossings, held not unconstitutional as exceeding the authority given the Legislature by Const. art. 12, § 22, in view of article 11, §§ 6, 8.

2. Railroads ⊂⇒95(6) — Order of Railroad Commission apportioning cost of maintenance of viaduct over tracks between city and railroad held proper.

Under Public Utilities Act, § 43, as amended by St. 1917, p. 320, order of the Railroad Commission, apportioning, between city and railroad, the cost of maintenance of a viaduct over tracks at a crossing, held proper, although the viaduct had already been constructed, and although the viaduct was not so out of repair as to interfere with the operation of the railroad.

In Bank.

Application by the City of San Bernardino for a writ of review to annul an order of the Railroad Commission of California apportioning cost of maintenance and repair of a viaduct. Order affirmed.

William Guthrie, of San Bernardino, for petitioner.

Hugh Gordon and William W. Clary, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

Robert Brennan, of Los Angeles, for Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co.

MYERS, J. Writ of review to annul an order of the Railroad Commission apportioning between the petitioner and the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company the cost of maintenance and repair of a viaduct over the railway tracks of the latter.

In 1907, and for a long time prior thereto, Mt. Vernon avenue was a public highway in the city of San Bernardino, which was crossed, at grade, between Third street and Fourth street, in said city, by three or more tracks of the railway company. The latter, being desirous of laying additional tracks to extend its switching yards, entered into negotiations with the city authorities which resulted in an agreement or understanding to the effect that the city should vacate that portion of Mt. Vernon avenue between Third and Fourth streets, in consideration whereof the railway company should erect over the portion thus vacated a viaduct for highway purposes, on condition that the city should thereafter maintain the same "so long as the same shall be used by the public for travel thereon." This agreement was carried out. The city by ordinance abandoned and vacated that portion of the highway, on the expressed condition that the railway company should construct the viaduct in accordance with plans and specifications therein referred to, and when completed should convey the same to the city; "said deed or conveyance to be upon condition that the expense of maintaining said viaduct will thereafter be borne solely by said city." The viaduct was constructed and conveyed to the city by deed of conveyance containing the above-quoted condition and the city by resolution accepted the same. Upon the completion of the viaduct there were 15 tracks laid across the land which previous to the closing had been Mt. Vernon avenue. In 1916 the railway company desiring to further extend its yards, negotiations resulted in a further agreement, or understanding, similar to the first, as a result of which an additional portion of Mt. Vernon avenue was vacated by ordinance. The railway company constructed an addition to the viaduct, extending the same approximately 300 feet further south, and conveyed the extension thereof to the city by deed. With respect to this extension, however, so far as the evidence discloses, nothing was said, either orally or in writing, upon the subject of the cost of future maintenance thereof. After completion of the extension to the viaduct there were approximately 38 tracks crossing thereunder. The viaduct consisted of a steel structure with a wood floor, constituting an elevated highway about 20 feet in width, in addition to the sidewalk thereon, and at a height sufficient to permit the operation of trains underneath. In 1920 the plank roadway of the old portion of the viaduct was and for three years had been, very badly out of repair, so much so that it constituted a danger to traffic passing over it.

In this situation the railway company filed an application before the Railroad Commission setting forth the facts above outlined and praying that the Commission after a hearing "make such orders and directions with respect to the maintenance and care of said viaduct as may be just." The city filed an answer and an amendment thereto, substantially admitting the facts alleged in the petition, but denying the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission in said matter, and alleging that the city had no power or authority to enter into the agreement therein referred to for the maintenance of the viaduct by it. After hearings therein the Commission made the order which is now up for review, wherein it found as a fact that public safety, convenience, and necessity require the maintenance and repair of the viaduct, and require the making of an order apportioning the cost of such maintenance and repair between the railway company and the city, and ordered that the railway company shall maintain "at its sole cost and expense" the new portion of the viaduct, and that the city shall maintain "at its sole cost and expense" the old portion thereof.

With respect to petitioner's contention that its agreement with the railway company for the maintenance of the viaduct was ultra vires, it is to be noted that the Commission while taking cognizance of this agreement, expressed no opinion as to the validity thereof as between the parties thereto, but being of the opinion that even though valid as between the parties it would not be binding upon the Commission, it predicated its order not upon this agreement but upon its finding that the apportionment made by it was just and equitable. For this reason we are not called upon to determine the question of the binding effect of that agreement as between the parties thereto.

[1] Petitioner contends that the Commission was without jurisdiction to make the order in question and that it exceeded its jurisdiction in so doing. The authority vested in the Legislature by section 22 of article 12 of the Constitution to confer upon the Commission additional powers "which are not inconsistent with the powers conferred upon the Railroad Commission in this Constitution," and which authority is "expressly declared to be plenary and unlimited by any provision of this Constitution," has been held to be limited only by the authority conferred upon municipal corporations by the more specific provisions of sections 6 and 8 of article 11 with respect to municipal affairs (Civic Center Ass'n v. Railroad Comm., 175 Cal. 441, 449, 166 Pac. 351), and by the qualification that "the powers conferred * * * must be such as are cognate and germane to the * * * regulation and control of public utilities" (Pac. Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 656, 702, 137 Pac. 1119, 1143, 50 L. R. A. [N. S.] 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822).

Pursuant to this plenary authority, the Legislature, in 1915 (St. 1915, p. 115), enacted the Public Utilities Act, and provided in section 43 thereof, as amended in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 320), as follows:

> "(a) No public road, highway or street shall hereafter be constructed across the track of any railroad corporation at grade, nor shall the track of any railroad corporation be constructed across a public road, highway or street at grade, nor shall the track of any railroad corporation be constructed across the track of any other railroad or street railroad corporation at grade, nor shall the track of a street railroad corporation be constructed across the track of a railroad corporation at grade, without having first secured the permission of the Commission; provided, that this subsection shall not apply to the replacement of lawfully existing tracks. The Commission shall have the right to refuse its permission or to grant it upon such terms and conditions as it may prescribe.
> "(b) The Commission shall have the exclusive power to determine and prescribe the manner, including the particular point of crossing, and the terms of installation, operation, maintenance, use and protection of each crossing of one railroad by another railroad or street railroad, and of a street railroad by a railroad, and of each crossing of a public road or highway by a railroad or street railroad and of a street by a railroad or vice versa, subject to the provisions of section two thousand six hundred and ninety-four of the Political Code so far as applicable, and to alter, relocate or abolish any such crossing, and to require, where in its judgment it would be practicable, a separation of grades at any such crossing heretofore or hereafter established and to prescribe the terms upon which such separation shall be made and the proportions in which the expense of the construction, alteration, relocation or abolition of such crossings or the separation of such grades shall be divided between the railroad or street railroad corporations affected or between such corporations and the state, county, municipality or other political subdivision affected. It shall be the duty of each corporation and political subdivision to which any of the expense is apportioned to pay from the funds available therefor in its treasury the amount apportioned to it at the time and to the parties specified by the order of the commission. * * *" (All italics herein are ours.)

The contention that the section is void in so far as it attempts to vest the Railroad Commission with power over municipalities was raised and disposed of in City of San Jose v. Railroad Commission, 175 Cal. 284, 289, 165 Pac. 967, 969, wherein it was said:

> "That the control of the manner of constructing [and, a fortiori, of maintaining] railroad crossings is a vital and material part of the regulation of railroads and is germane to that subject is too evident to need supporting argument."

It is true that in that case the court did not consider whether or not the regulation of such a crossing is a municipal affair because the city of San Jose had elected to transfer its control over public utilities to the Railroad Commission, and the city of San Bernardino has not done so; but it has since been determined that such regulation is a state affair, not a municipal affair (Civic Center Case, supra, 175 Cal. 450, 166 Pac. 351), a determination which applies with even greater force to the instant case wherein it appears that the maintenance of both the railroad and the highway are matters of much more than local concern. The San Jose case is therefore authority herein, if authority be needed for a conclusion so obvious, and we conclude that section 43, as to the respects in which it is here challenged, is a valid exercise of the legislative authority.

[2] But, it is urged, section 43 is here inapplicable because, the separation of grades having been already accomplished, and the portion of the highway at the railroad level having been vacated we have not the case of "a crossing of a highway by a railroad"; but the case of "a highway passing over a railroad." It was held in the Civic Center Case, supra, that the city has power to "alter the construction of its streets, at such crossings, by elevating them upon a viaduct so as to pass over the railroad, or by making a subway passing under the railroad," without let or hindrance from the Railroad Commission. But it does not at all follow that the Commission would thus be deprived of its power to apportion the cost of maintenance of such a viaduct after its construction. It was also said by this court, in that connection:

> "But if it does interfere [with the operation of the railroad], either at the time or afterward, whether by natural causes or lack of repair of the street as changed, or by reason of changes in the construction or use of the railroad subsequently directed or approved by the Commission, the city must conform to the orders of the Commission so as to avoid such interference."

This is claimed to be obiter. Perhaps it was in the sense that it was not strictly necessary to the decision. But it was said in the course of a most carefully prepared opinion, for the guidance of the Commission in its hearing and determination of a great number of crossing cases, which this court was then directing it to proceed with. Viewed in this aspect, it was analogous to the rules which this court lays down for the guidance of the court below in sending a case back for retrial.

But it is not necessary to rest our conclusion upon this authority. A consideration of the language of section 43 above quoted, with particular reference to the words there italicized, compels the conclusion that the Legislature intended the provisions of subdivision (a) to apply only to crossings at grade, and that it equally intended the provisions of subdivision (b) to apply to all crossings including those at which the grades had been separated as well as those at grade; and that with respect to both sorts of crossings, it meant what it said, to wit:

> "The Commission shall have the exclusive power to determine and prescribe * * * the terms of * * * maintenance * * * of each crossing of a public road or highway by a railroad."

There can be no doubt that the viaduct in question is, and ever since its construction and acceptance by the city has been, a public highway. Neither is there room for doubt that the primary object sought and effected by the city and the railroad company by means of the various transactions above outlined was, in substance and effect, the separation of grades at that crossing; and the situation resulting therefrom is that of "a crossing of a public highway by a railroad," though not at grade.

It is urged, upon the authority of the Civic Center Case, that, conceding the authority of the Commission to apportion the cost of maintenance of the viaduct, it cannot exercise that authority unless or until the viaduct actually interferes with the operation of the railroad. That case does not so hold. Nor are we persuaded to adopt so narrow a view. To hold that the Commission, having this authority, may not exercise it until, perchance, a passenger train shall be derailed by a broken plank fallen from a viaduct which has been "badly out of repair," and unrepaired, for three years, would be, in large measure, to defeat the purpose of the act which conferred the authority. It is true that in the instant case the city repaired the viaduct before the Commission entered its order. But it is significant that no repairs were made until after this proceeding was instituted and a hearing had before the Commission.

Petitioner objects to the form of the order, requiring it to maintain its portion of the viaduct at "its sole cost and expense," which it construes to mean that the cost thereof must be paid out of the general or street fund of the city; thus precluding it from proceeding under any of the street improvement acts. We do not construe the order as having that effect. Having first determined that the public safety, convenience, and necessity required that it should apportion the cost of maintenance of the viaduct, the sole remaining question before the Commission was as to the manner in which that cost should be apportioned, as between the two parties who were interested in its maintenance, namely, the railroad company on the one hand and the city on the other. All of the repairs immediately necessary had been made. All that was determined by the order was that thereafter the burden of maintaining a specified portion of the structure should rest upon the city, as distinguished from the railroad company. The city was left free to provide the funds necessary thereto by any appropriate method available to it under the law.

The order is affirmed.

APARTMENT BLDG. CO. v. DAUGHERTY, Com'r of Corporations. (L. A. 7617.)

Corporations ⚷66—Profit-sharing securities held in effect preferred stock.

Contemplated profit-sharing securities to be issued by an apartment building corporation held in effect preferred stock without the right to vote which would increase the capital stock of a corporation without compliance with laws relating to such increase of stock.

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandamus by the Apartment Building Company, a corporation, to be directed against Edwin M. Daugherty, Commissioner of Corporations. Writ denied.

Fickeisen & Richardson, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for writ of mandamus to compel the respondent to pass upon petitioner's application for approval of a plan for issuing profit-sharing securities. The Attorney General has held that such profit-sharing securities are in effect preferred stock without the right to vote. In short, that the scheme proposed is a scheme for the increasing of the capital stock of the corporation without compliance with the laws relating to such increase of stock. In this we think he is correct.

TARPEY et al. v. McCLURE, State Engineer, et al. (S. F. 10411.)

1. Statutes ⚷123(6)—Provision of Water Storage District Act within subject in title.

Matters provided for by Water Storage District Act held not to constitute different subjects within Const. art. 4, § 24, limiting an act to a single subject to be expressed in title; the object of the act being reclamation and use of waste water, and incident thereto reclamation and use of waste land.

2. Statutes ⚷123(7)—Repeal of former statute not foreign to subject-matter.

Provision of Water Storage District Act for repeal of Irrigation Act of 1915 and its amendments is not foreign to the subject-matter of the later act, but a natural incident thereto; this act having had its origin in the earlier act.

3. Statutes ⚷64(10)—Water Storage District Act not voided by section not within title.

Even if Water Storage District Act, § 65, providing method by which a district may be dissolved, deals with a subject not embraced in the subject, it does not void the remainder of the act, as its failure would not affect the remaining provisions.

4. Statutes ⚷125(1)—Relative to subject and title, Water Storage District Act does not attempt to create new state officers.

Relative to subject and title, Water Storage District Act does not attempt to create new state officers; the executive directors therein provided for being employés.

5. Statutes ⚷97(1)—Water Storage District Act not local and special because of alternative methods of petition.

Water Storage District Act is not local and special because providing for initiation of proceedings, either by petition signed by holders of a majority in value of the lands in the proposed district, or by not less than 500 landowners representing not less than 10 per cent. in value of the land.

6. Constitutional law ⚷205(2)—Special privileges and immunities not granted by Water Storage District Act.

Water Storage District Act does not grant to one class of citizens privileges or immunities which on the same terms are not granted to all, in contravention of Const. art. 1, § 21, because authorizing petition for organization of a district to be signed by holders of a majority in value of the lands in the proposed district, or by not less than 500 landowners representing not less than 10 per cent. in value of the land.

7. Constitutional law ⚷232—Equal protection of law not denied by Water Storage District Act.

Equal protection of the law is not denied, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, by Water Storage District Act, because it authorizes petition for organization of a district to be signed by holders of a majority in value of lands in the proposed district, or by not less than 500 landowners representing not less than 10 per cent. in value of the land.

8. Waters and water courses ⚷226—"May" in Water Storage District Act does not mean "must."

In view of the legislative history of Water Storage District Act there is no merit in the claim that "may," in the provision that a district "may include the major portion of the lands in two or more district agencies of the state," should be construed to mean "must."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, May.]

9. Statutes 🔑64(5) — Unconstitutionality of part of Water Storage District Act would not destroy remainder.

If the provision of Water Storage District Act, § 6, making the state engineer's finding in certain matters conclusive against all except the state, be held unconstitutional, it would not destroy or render useless the remainder of the act.

10. Statutes 🔑97(1) — Water Storage District Act not special because of another act covering the same field.

There is no merit in the point that Water Storage District Act is special legislation because there is another act in effect which covers the same field of legislation.

11. Statutes 🔑85(4) — Water Storage District Act not special because making affidavit sufficient evidence of genuineness of signature to petition.

Water Storage District Act is not special because providing that an affidavit shall be sufficient evidence of the genuineness of signatures to petition.

12. Constitutional law 🔑60—Creation of water storage district nondelegable legislative act.

Creation of a water storage district is a legislative act, performance of which may not be delegated by the Legislature to an executive or judicial officer.

13. Constitutional law 🔑60—Matters which Legislature may intrust to other agency in creation of water storage district.

The Legislature may enact conditions, on the performance of which a water storage district shall be regarded as organized with the powers mentioned and described in the act, and intrust the doing of an act or the determination of a fact on which those conditions depend to some other agency.

14. Constitutional law 🔑62—Arbitrary power or uncontrolled discretion in creation of water storage district not to be vested in administrative officer.

Any attempt by the Legislature to vest in an administrative officer arbitrary power and authority, or an uncontrolled and unguided discretion, in matters essential to the creation of a water storage district is void.

15. Constitutional law 🔑62—Discretion controlled by prescribed rules vestable in administrative officer in creation of water district.

The Legislature may confer on an administrative officer a large measure of discretion in matters essential to the creation of a water storage district, if the exercise thereof is controlled and guided by rules prescribed therefor, even though in exercising the discretion he may be called on to exercise judgment of a high order.

16. Constitutional law 🔑62 — Assistants whom Water Storage Act authorizes state engineer to employ not officers relative to method of creating offices.

Relative to constitutionality of Water Storage District Act, § 1, authorizing the state engineer to employ such engineers, attorneys, and other assistants as he may deem necessary, such assistants are not officers, but mere employees.

17. Constitutional law 🔑62 — No unguided discretion given state engineer by Water Storage Act in employing assistants; "such as he may deem necessary."

Water Storage District Act, § 1, authorizing the state engineer to employ "such engineers * * * as he may deem necessary," does not give unguided discretion as to number to be employed; it being implied that there shall be facts reasonably justifying his conclusion.

18. Constitutional law 🔑62, 80(1)—Provision of Water Storage Act for state engineer ascertaining and determining practicability not delegation of legislative or judicial power.

Water Storage District Act, § 5, providing that the state engineer "shall ascertain and determine the practicability, feasibility and utility of the proposed projects," is not an attempted delegation of legislative or judicial power, but rather calls for performance of administrative functions, intended only for information and guidance of voters; no consequences being made to depend on such determination or to result therefrom.

19. Taxation 🔑28—Commitment to state engineer of uncontrolled and unguided discretion whether to levy assessment delegation of legislative power to levy taxes.

Water Storage District Act, § 5, providing that the state engineer may require certain preliminary expenses of a project to be paid by the proponents of the district, "or he may issue warrants therefor," in connection with section 16, requiring the board of directors to levy an assessment to pay such warrants, amounts to giving the engineer an uncontrolled and unguided discretion as to whether an assessment shall be levied; a prohibited delegation of legislative power to levy taxes.

20. Statutes 🔑64(5) — Water Storage District Act not unworkable because of unconstitutional provision for assessment.

Unconstitutionality of the delegation to the state engineer by Water Storage District Act, §§ 5, 16, of uncontrolled and unguided discretion to determine whether an assessment shall be levied for certain preliminary expenses of a proposed project, does not render the act unworkable; the act authorizing the engineer to require such expenses to be paid by the proponents of the project.

21. Constitutional law 🔑62—Authority given state engineer as to boundaries of proposed water storage district not delegation of legislative power.

The authority as to boundaries of a proposed district given the state engineer by Water Storage District Act, § 6, does not give him such arbitrary power as to amount to delegation of performance of the legislative act of creating a district, he being given power, other than to make recommendations, only, on objection, to exclude land not of the character described in the act, and to include other land, when in response to petition of its owners, he finds it is of the character described in the act.

22. Constitutional law 🔑62—No arbitrary authority conferred on state engineer as to dividing proposed water district into divisions and precincts.

Provision in Water Storage District Act, §§ 6, 7, for the state engineer dividing a proposed district into 5 to 11 divisions "possessing the same general character of water rights or interests," and establishing "a convenient number" of election precincts, do not confer arbitrary authority, but a controlled and guided discretion, dependent on the facts ascertained.

23. Statutes 🔑64(5)—Practical operation of water district act not dependent on validity of grant of power to engineer as to abandonment and investigations.

The remainder of Water Storage District Act is not affected by any invalidity in the provisions of sections 18, 53, authorizing the state engineer, under certain conditions, to declare the project abandoned, and to determine when public interest requires certain investigations.

24. Constitutional law 🔑284(2)—No "taking of property without due process" by provision of water district act for levy of preliminary assessments without hearing as to benefits.

Provisions of Water Storage District Act, § 16, for levy of assessments at a flat rate per acre on all the lands of the district to defray its preliminary expenses without any prior hearing on benefits, do not constitute a "taking of property without due process," the Legislature by sections 3, 5, laying down a fixed rule by which the boundaries of the district may be determined, with a hearing thereon before the state engineer, amounting to a legislative declaration that all the lands of the described character will be uniformly benefited to the extent of the necessary cost of organization and investigation work, and such legislative action not being grossly unequal in its application to a landowner who has a perfected and adequate water right, as he may be benefited by conservation and storage works serving to increase the total available supply of water in the district.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Taking (In Eminent Domain).]

25. Constitutional law 🔑284(2)—Notice of hearing of objections to assessment for water storage district need not state assessment roll has been filed.

Water Storage District Act, § 19, having required the assessment roll for the main assessment for cost of a project determined on, to be filed in the office of the state engineer before the giving of notice of hearing by the adjustment board of objections to the assessment made, it is not necessary for due process that the notice state that it has been so filed.

26. Constitutional law 🔑284(1)—No failure of due process because Water Storage District Act does not require filing of assessment roll in each county.

Absence of requirement in Water Storage District Act, § 19, that copies of the assessment roll, to be filed in state engineer's office, be filed in each county of the district, does not constitute failure of due process.

27. Constitutional law 🔑284(2)—Failure of Water Storage District Act to specify length of notice of increase in assessment not fatal.

Failure of Water Storage District Act to specify length of notice that must be given property owners of proposed increased assessment, is not fatal; they, in the absence of statute, being entitled to time to have full and fair hearing.

28. Eminent domain 🔑14—No taking of private property for private use by Water Storage District Act.

Water Storage District Act, not contemplating the sale of water or hydro-electric power to others than the inhabitants of the district, to whose use it is dedicated (except as to a possible surplus), does not provide for taking of private property for private use.

29. Taxation 🔑28—No attempted inhibited taxation or delegation of tax power in Water Storage District Act.

Const. art. 11, §§ 12, 13, inhibiting the Legislature from imposing or delegating to any special commission or individual power to impose taxes for certain purposes, is not violated by Water Storage District Act; its attempt to confer on the state engineer power to issue warrants which should automatically result in the levy of assessments being nugatory, and it giving the adjustment board power not to levy assessments, but merely to apportion them.

30. Waters and water courses 🔑216—"State engineer" in Water Storage District Act refers to Department of Public Works and appropriate officers.

In view of the provisions of St. 1921, pp. 1022, 1039, reorganizing the state department of public works, changing the office of state engineer to part of such department, and going into effect three days before, though pending at the same time as, Water Storage District Act, that, when, by any statute now in force, "or that may hereafter be enacted," a duty is imposed or authority conferred on any of said officers, it is hereby imposed on and transferred to such department and the appropriate officers thereof, "as though the title of said department had been specifically set forth and named therein," the words "state engineer" in Water Storage District Act are to be treated as referring to the "Department of Public Works and the appropriate officers thereof."

MYERS, J. This is a proceeding in mandamus to compel the respondents to receive and act upon a petition for the organization of a water storage district under the California Water Storage District Act (Stats. 1921, p. 1727). It is submitted upon demurrer, the effect of which is to challenge the constitutionality of the act.

[1] It is urged that the act violates the provisions of section 24, art. 4, of the Constitution, in that it embraces more than one subject. It would be impracticable to attempt here to set forth even an outline of its comprehensive provisions. It must suffice to say that it provides for the organization, operation, maintenance, and government of water storage districts; for the acquisition by various means, and the storage, conservation, and distribution of water for irrigation, and for drainage and reclamation connected therewith; and for the generation and disposition of hydro-electric energy developed incidental thereto. It also provides for the repeal of the California Irrigation Act of 1915 and all acts amendatory thereof. The conservation of water by means of flood control works to restrain flood waters which otherwise would overflow the land and go to waste, and, incident thereto, the reclaiming of the lands which otherwise would be overflowed and rendered useless, the storage and distribution of such water for purposes of irrigation, and, incident thereto, the generation and use of hydro-electric energy as a by-product of such storage and distribution, all seem to us to be so legitimately and intimately connected one with another as not to constitute different subjects within the purview of the Constitution. It may be said that in these respects the act has but a single object, to wit, the better control and utilization of water, or, stated differently, the reclamation and use of waste water, and, incident thereto, the reclamation and use of waste land.

[2] A somewhat different question is presented by the provision for the repeal of the act of 1915 and the acts amendatory thereof. It is suggested that, while these two acts occupy, in general, the same field of legislation, neither of them need be an exclusive occupant thereof, and there is no reason why they should not both subsist, side by side, and that, therefore, the provision for the repeal of the former is foreign to the subject-matter of the latter, and constitutes a different subject. However, it fairly appears from the history of the legislation that the present act had its origin in the act of 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1173), which was amplified by the statute of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 1068), substantially re-enacted in 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 671), its re-enactment being held unconstitutional in Mordecai v. Board of Supervisors, 183 Cal. 434, 192 Pac. 40, and finally enacted in its present form in 1921. So regarded, it is apparent that the repeal of the former acts is merely a natural and proper incident to the present enactment.

[3, 4] We do not think the act can fairly be said to embrace any subject not expressed in its title, with the possible exception of the provisions for dissolution contained in section 65 (the provisions of section 68 being concededly nugatory). Section 18 does not provide for the dissolution of a district, but rather specifies the conditions under which the organization of a proposed district may fail of completion. Section 65 does purport to provide the method by which such a district may be dissolved, and does, therefore, deal with a subject not embraced in the title, unless, as suggested, that subject may be said to be comprehended within the term "maintenance." It is not necessary to decide this question, because the failure of section 65 would in no way affect the remaining provisions of the act. The remaining "subjects" specified as not expressed in the title are not additional subjects, but mere incidents to those which are expressed. The act does not attempt to create new state officers. The executive directors therein provided for are employees, not officers. Of course the title does not state all of the details found in the body of the act. To do so would involve restating the entire act in the title.

[5-7] The act cannot be said to be local and special in that it provides for the initiation of proceedings, either by a petition signed by the holders of a majority in value of the lands within the proposed district, or by not less than 500 landowners representing not less than 10 per cent. in value of the land. It is obvious that in a very large district it would be impracticable to secure the signatures of a majority of the landowners, and that in a very small district the signatures of 10 per cent. of the owners might not be regarded as sufficient evidence of the merits of the proposal. The line had to be drawn somewhere between these two differing conditions, and it cannot be justly said that the Legislature acted "arbitrarily" in placing it where it did. Neither can it be said that this provision violates section 21 of article 1, in that it grants to one class of citizens privileges or immunities which upon the same terms are not granted to all, or that it violates the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution, in that it denies to certain persons equal protection of the law. This court cannot say, nor could the Legislature determine in advance, that it will require either greater or less effort to procure the signatures of a majority in one sort of district than it will to obtain the signatures of 10 per cent. in the other sort.

[8] In view of the legislative history of this act, there is no merit in the claim that, in the provision that the district, "may include the major portion of the lands situated within two or more district agencies of the state," the word "may" should be construed to mean "must."

[9-11] If the provision in section 6, making the finding of the state engineer in certain matters conclusive against all persons except the state, should be held unconstitutional, it would in no way destroy or render useless the remainder of the act. There is no merit in the point that this act is special because there is another act in effect which covers the same field of legislation. Los Angeles v. Leavis, 119 Cal. 164, 51 Pac. 34. Neither can it be said to be special because it provides that an affidavit shall be sufficient evidence of the genuineness of signatures to the petition. There are many provisions in the general laws and in the Codes making affidavits competent evidence for specified purposes.

[12-15] We come now to a more serious and difficult group of questions, presented by the claim that the act attempts to delegate legislative power to the state engineer in violation of section 1 of article 4 of the Constitution, and that it requires him to exercise both legislative and judicial powers in violation of article 3 thereof. Unquestionably, the creation of such a district is a legislative act, the performance of which may not be delegated by the Legislature to an executive or judicial officer. People v. Parks, 58 Cal. 624; Tulare Water Co. v. State Water Comm., 187 Cal. 533, 202 Pac. 874; Matter of Peppers (Cal. Sup.) 209 Pac. 896. On the other hand, it is equally well settled that the Legislature may enact conditions, upon the performance of which the district shall be regarded as organized with the powers mentioned and described in the act; and it may intrust the doing of an act or the determination of a fact, upon which those conditions depend, to some other agency. Inglin v. Hoppin, 156 Cal. 483, 105 Pac. 582; Fallbrook Irr. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 17 Sup. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369; Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 12 Sup. Ct. 495, 36 L. Ed. 294; In re Madera Irr. Dist., 92 Cal. 296, 28 Pac. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106. If, as claimed by respondents, this act attempts to vest in them arbitrary power and authority, or an uncontrolled and unguided discretion, in matters essential to the creation of the proposed district, it is, to that extent, void. People v. Parks, supra; Tulare Water Co. v. State Water Comm., supra; Riley v. Chambers, 181 Cal. 589, 595, 185 Pac. 855, 8 A. L. R. 418. On the other hand, the Legislature may, without violating any rule or principle of the Constitution, confer upon an administrative officer a large measure of discretion, provided the exercise thereof is controlled and guided by rules prescribed therefor (Arwine v. Board of Medical Examiners, 151 Cal. 499, 91 Pac. 319; Hall v. Geiger-Jones Co., 242 U. S. 539, 553, 37 Sup. Ct. 217, 61 L. Ed. 480, L. R. A. 1917F, 514, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 643), even though, in exercising that discretion, he may be called upon to exercise judgment of a high order (Frasher v. Rader, 124 Cal. 132, 56 Pac. 797; Cook v. Civil Service Comm., 160 Cal. 589, 592, 117 Pac. 663; Suckow v. Alderson, 182 Cal. 247, 187 Pac. 965; People v. Sacramento Drainage Dist., 155 Cal. 373, 103 Pac. 207).

[16, 17] The difficulty herein lies not so much in the ascertainment of the settled rules of constitutional law as in their correct application to the various provisions under consideration. The provision in section 1 authorizing the State Engineer to employ such engineers, attorneys, and other assistants as he may deem necessary, and to fix their compensation, does not contravene the rule in Farrell v. Board of Trustees, 85 Cal. 408, 24 Pac. 868, for two reasons: First, because the assistants here provided for are not officers, but mere employees; second, because the discretion as to the number to be employed is not unguided, as it was in the Farrell Case. The phrase "such as he may deem necessary," as here used, is precisely analogous to the provision under consideration in the case of Riley v. Chambers, supra, and which was there held not to confer arbitrary power. It was there said:

> "While the commissioner has the power to refuse a license if he is not satisfied as to the character of the applicant, his discretion is not arbitrary. There must exist facts which reasonably justify his conclusion that the applicant is not of good character and reputation."

Yet the law there under consideration did not expressly so state. This requirement was implied therein.

[18] It is provided in section 5 that the engineer "shall ascertain and determine the practicability, feasibility and utility of the proposed project." This does not appear to be an attempted delegation of legislative or judicial power, because no consequences are made to depend upon such determination or to result therefrom. It calls rather for the performance of administrative functions, evidently intended only for information and guidance of voters.

[19, 20] It is also provided that he may employ all necessary engineers, attorneys and assistants; that the cost thereof shall be deemed a part of the expense of said project, and that he "may require the same to be paid by the proponents of said district, or he may issue warrants therefor." Section 16 requires the board of directors to levy an assessment of an equal amount per acre upon the land of such district to pay such warrants. This amounts, in effect, to an attempted delegation to the engineer of the legislative power to levy taxes. If he elects to issue the warrants, a mandatory duty is thereby imposed upon the directors to levy an assessment sufficient to pay the same; but if he elects to require these expenses to be paid by the proponents of the district the assessment will not be levied. Thus the decision to levy or not to levy this assessment is committed wholy to the discretion of the engineer, and in the exercise of this discretion he is uncontrolled and unguided by anything to be found in the act. If the act had made it the mandatory duty of the engineer to issue warrants for these necessary expenses and the mandatory duty of the directors to levy an assessment to pay those warrants, then it might well be said that such assessment was in fact levied, not by the engineer or by the directors, but by the Legislature itself. But where, as here, the power to decide whether or not a given tax shall be levied is committed to the uncontrolled and unguided discretion of an executive officer, it amounts to such a delegation of legislative power as is prohibited by the Constitution. It follows that the provision for the levy of an assessment for the payment of such warrants is void. This does not, however, render the act unworkable, because the engineer may require the necessary cost of these investigations to be paid by the proponents of the project.

[21] Section 6 provides that, upon the final hearing, the engineer shall make an order affirming the sufficiency of the petition and notice of hearing, and determining the practicability, etc., of the project, and "shall also in his said order establish the boundaries of the proposed district or describe the lands included therein, specify the location proposed for the storage of water to be used for any of the purposes of this act, and provide an estimate of the probable cost of the proposed project; and in so doing shall make such changes in any of the matter or proposals set forth in said petition as he may deem advisable. * * *" It is claimed that these provisions purport to vest in the engineer the arbitrary power to make such changes in the boundaries of the proposed district, or in the location and character of the proposed works therein, as he may see fit, thus bringing this situation within the rule of People v. Parks, supra. We do not so construe the act. It seems apparent from a consideration of its various provisions, particularly those contained in sections 3, 5, and 6, that, in establishing the boundaries of the proposed district, the engineer can make changes in the boundaries of the district as proposed in but two classes of cases: (1) He can exclude land therefrom when in response to objections filed by the owners thereof he finds as a fact that it is not of the character described in the act, i. e., "already irrigated or susceptible of irrigation from the common source and by the same system of storage and irrigation works"; (2) he can include other land therein when in response to petition filed by the owners thereof he finds as a fact that it is of the character described in the act. The authority to make changes other than these was evidently intended to apply only to the proposal or recommendation of such changes, in connection with providing an estimate of probable cost. It is obvious, for example, that the locations for the storage of water, either as proposed in the original petition, or as recommended by the engineer, would at the most be merely advisory upon the board of directors, and subject to change thereafter as the directors should deem best.

[22, 23] The provisions for the division of the district into 5 to 11 divisions "possessing the same general character of water rights or interests," and for the establishment of "a convenient number" of election precincts, confer not arbitrary authority, but a controlled and guided discretion, dependent upon the facts ascertained. It is not necessary herein to determine whether the provisions of section 18, authorizing the engineer, under certain conditions, to declare the project abandoned, and the provisions of section 53, authorizing him to determine when the public interest requires the making of certain investigations, are or are not valid. The practical operation of the law is in no way dependent upon either of them.

[24] We come now to the contention of respondents that the provisions of section 16, for the levy of assessments at a flat rate per acre upon all the lands of the district to defray the general expenses of the district, prior to any hearings on the question of benefits, require the taking of private property without due process of law. The general rule on this subject is that a hearing as to benefits must be provided at some time before the land is finally burdened by the assessment. Fallbrook Irr. Dist. v. Bradley, supra; Nickey v. Stearns Ranchos Co., 126 Cal. 150, 58 Pac. 459. But this general rule is subject to an equally well established exception, the existence of which is recognized by respondents and well stated in the following language from their brief:

> "Of course, when the Legislature itself determines the boundaries of the district, either by describing them or by laying down a fixed rule by which they may be determined, the property owners affected are not entitled to a hearing for they are conclusively presumed to have been heard through their representatives in the Legislature." (Italics ours.)

See Hadley v. Dague, 130 Cal. 207, 219, 62 Pac. 500; Duncan v. Ramish, 142 Cal. 686, 76 Pac. 661; Ross v. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co., 158 Cal. 37, 109 Pac. 883; Larsen v. San Francisco, 182 Cal. 1, 14, 186 Pac. 757; Miller & Lux v. Drainage Dist., 182 Cal. 252, 265, 187 Pac. 1041; Houck v. Little River Drainage Dist., 239 U. S. 254, 36 Sup. Ct. 58, 60 L. Ed. 266, 274; N. P. R. R. Co. v. Pierce County, 51 Wash. 12, 97 Pac. 1099, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 286. The Legislature herein has done precisely that thing. It has itself determined the boundaries of the district "by laying down a fixed rule by which they may be determined." It provided, in sections 3 and 5 of the act, in substance, that the district shall include those lands, and only those lands, which are "already irrigated or susceptible of irrigation from a common source and by the same system of storage and irrigation works," and it provided for a hearing before the state engineer upon this question, after notice, at which each property owner affected might appear and present his claim to be either excluded from or included in the proposed district. This amounts to a legislative declaration that all the lands of the described character will be uniformly benefited to the extent of the necessary cost of the organization and investigation work of such a district. Such legislative determination is conclusive, "unless the state's action has been palpably arbitrary or grossly unequal in its application to the persons concerned." Miller & Lux Drainage Dist., supra. The claim here made that the act is grossly unequal in its application to the landowner who now has a perfected and adequate water right is the same which was there made with respect to the landowner whose land had already been fully reclaimed. As it was pointed out there that such an owner might be benefited by works resulting in the lowering of the flood plane and thereby decreasing the general danger of destructive floods, so it is apparent here that the owner who now has an adequate water right may nevertheless be benefited by conservation and storage works which serve to increase the total available supply of water within the district. The provisions for preliminary assessments, being thus predicated upon a valid legislative determination as to benefits, do not constitute a taking of property without due process. The case of Redman v. Kyle, 76 Fla. 79, 80 South. 300, is in direct conflict with Miller & Lux v. Drainage Dist., supra, and therefore is not to be followed here.

[25-27] As to the provisions of section 19, providing for the levy of what may be called the main assessment, the contentions of respondents that the act does not provide for a hearing as to benefits and does not specify the rules by which the board is to proceed in modifying or amending the assessment are substantially the same as those which were raised and disposed of in Fallbrook Irr. Dist. v. Bradley, supra. It is not necessary that the notice of hearing shall expressly state that the assessment roll has been filed in the office of the state engineer. The law requires that it must be so filed before the notice is given. It may be unfortunate that the act does not require copies of the assessment roll to be filed in each county within the district, but the absence of such requirement does not constitute failure of due process. The failure of the act to specify the length of notice which must be given the property owners of a proposed increased assessment is not fatal.

> "In the absence of a controlling statute fixing the time of notice the property owner must be given time to have and must have a full and fair hearing." Huntley v. Board of Trustees, 165 Cal. 298, 304, 131 Pac. 859, 862.

It is not here necessary to determine the validity of the provisions of sections 22 and 23 for the levying of additional assessments.

[28] We do not understand that the act contemplates the sale of water or hydroelectric power to others than the inhabitants of the district, to whose uses it is dedicated (except as to a possible surplus thereof), and it does not appear, therefore, to provide for a taking of private property for a private use.

[29] The act is not violative of sections 12 or 13 of article 11 of the Constitution, because, as we have seen, the attempt to confer upon the engineer the power to issue warrants which should automatically result in the levy of assessments is nugatory. The adjustment board is given no power under the act to levy assessments, but merely to apportion them.

The act does not violate section 24 of article 1 or section 1 of article 2, in that it denies to any but landowners the right to vote at district elections. It is true that this court, in the case of In re Madera Irr. Dist., 92 Cal. 296, 321, 28 Pac. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106, used language strongly intimating that such a provision would be unconstitutional as applied to an irrigation district. It is interesting to note that the court was there considering the claim that the Wright Act was unconstitutional because it did not limit the voting right to the landowners. However, it is now clear, in the light of the later decisions, that those provisions of the Constitution "refer to the qualification of electors entitling them to vote at the ordinary elections, local and general, held in the course of the usual functions of civil government." Wheeler v. Herbert, 152 Cal. 224, 232, 92 Pac. 353, 357. See, also, Martinelli v. Morrow, 172 Cal. 472, 156 Pac. 1017; Board of Directors v. Peterson, 64 Or. 46, 128 Pac. 837, 129 Pac. 123.

> "By this and like provisions, the Legislature is not dealing with elections, with suffrage, or with the ballot, within the meaning of the Constitution and the election laws of the state. The formation of this and similar districts is a function pertaining purely to the legislative branch of the government. * * * Wherefore, it may do so by giving such persons as it may think best an opportunity to be heard." Potter v. Santa Barbara, 160 Cal. 349, 355, 116 Pac. 1101, 1103.

The decisions of the Idaho court to the contrary, based upon the view that these districts are political subdivisions of the state, are out of harmony with the decisions of this state. This disposes also of the contention that the act violates section 5, art. 2, of the Constitution, providing for the secrecy of the ballot.

The claims that the act confers judicial powers upon the state engineer, that in the adjustment board it has attempted to create a court, and that this board is called upon to exercise judicial powers, are well answered by what was said by this court in People v. Sacramento Drainage Dist., 155 Cal. at pages 387, 388, 103 Pac. 207. It is of interest to note that nearly all of the objections presented by respondents were urged against the constitutionality of the Wright Act in Re Madera Irrigation District, 92 Cal. 296, 28 Pac. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106, and in Fallbrook Irrigation District v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 17 Sup. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369.

[30] We do not find the act here in question to be unconstitutional in any of the provisions essential to its practical operation, and it remains only to consider the question of misjoinder of parties, raised by the special demurrer. Respondents contend that the department of public works and A. B. Fletcher, as director of public works, should be dismissed as parties herein for the reason that neither of them has any duties to perform in this connection, and that the state engineer is given original, complete, and final authority under the terms of this act. The state department of public works was reorganized by the 1921 Legislature (chapters 602 and 607), the office of state engineer, as it theretofore existed was thereby abolished and merged in the department of public works, and a new office of state engineer was thereby created as chief of the division of engineering and irrigation of the department of public works. Respondents contend that, inasmuch as the reorganization acts, chapters 602 and 607, went into effect three days before the Water Storage Act, the references in the latter to the "state engineer" must be held to refer to the office newly created by the former acts, and not to the pre-existing office, the powers and duties of which had been transferred to the department of public works. We are not inclined to this view. Chapter 607 provided that—

> "Whenever by the provisions of any statute or law now in force or that may hereafter be enacted a duty or jurisdiction is imposed or authority conferred upon any of said bodies, offices, officers, deputies or employees, or upon any other person by any statute, the enforcement of which is transferred to the department, such duty, jurisdiction and authority are hereby imposed upon and transferred to the department of public works and the appropriate officers thereof, with the same force and effect *as though the title of said department * * * had been specifically set forth and named therein.*" Section 363e. (Italics ours.)

A similar provision is found in chapter 602. Although these two chapters actually went into effect three days before the Water Storage Act, they were all pending in the Legislature at the same time, and all went to the Governor on the same day. No one in the Legislature, or out, could foretell which of them might be signed first. It is thus apparent that the italicized provisions above quoted were probably inserted to cover just such a situation as here arose, and that the words "state engineer" wherever they appear in the Water Storage Act should be held to refer to the "department of public works and the appropriate officers thereof." This conclusion harmonizes with the evident policy of that Legislature to consolidate and co-ordinate the various administrative departments of the state government and to centralize the authority and responsibility therein.

Respondents' demurrer is overruled, and it is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue herein as prayed.

1. Master and servant ⚷405(2)—Evidence held to show casual employment within Compensation Act.

Evidence of a workman's employment, not in the course of employer's business, held to show that he was to do only carpentry work on buildings repaired, and that his work as an employee, excluding that done as independent contractor, would not take 10 days, the period required by Workmen's Compensation Act, § 8 (c), to take his employment out of the casual class and bring him within the protection of the act.

2. Master and servant ⚷362—Employment held "casual" within Compensation Act, limiting time for completing "work contemplated."

The words "work contemplated," as used in Workmen's Compensation Act, § 8(c), providing that the term "casual" shall be taken to refer only to employments where the work contemplated is to be completed in not exceeding 10 working days, without regard to the number of men employed, and where the total labor cost of such work is less than $100, are used in direct connection with the previous word "employment," and mean the work contemplated as the object of the employment; and where one employed to do only carpentry work on a building repaired under employment, not in the course of employers' business, and it would take him less than 10 days to do the work, his employment was casual, though all the work by different craftsmen, would take more than 10 days, and entail a labor cost exceeding $100.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Casual.]

In Bank.

Petition by George Rissman and another, for a writ of review, to consider an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission of California to George O. Smith. Award annulled.

Hass & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco (Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an application for a writ of review, to consider an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission to George O. Smith, who was injured while engaged in certain work for George Rissman and Henry J. Rissman, the petitioners. The injury was the result of an accidental fall from a ladder while Smith was constructing a beaver board ceiling in a house owned by petitioners, and consisted in a fracture of the left hip.

The petitioners desired to renovate for the purpose of sale two houses situated upon one lot in Los Angeles. The work in contemplation included plumbing and painting. With these, however, the applicant, Smith, had no concern, his employment embracing the carpentry work only. This work consisted of three separate matters: (1) Certain repairs to the roof of the front house, to do which he entered into a contract at an agreed price of $53.50, this figure covering the cost of both labor and material; (2) certain repairs to the roof of the rear house, at an agreed price of $20 for the labor, the owners to furnish the materials; (3) certain miscellaneous repairs, to both houses not included in the work aforementioned, at an agreed wage of $5 a day.

It was contended at the hearing before the board that the employment of the applicant was casual, and that accordingly he was not entitled to compensation for his injury. The board held against this contention, and, in support of the award, counsel for the respondent claim that, in construing section 8 (c) of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Stats. 1917, p. 835), the phrase "work contemplated" employed in said section refers to the entire piece of work in connection with which a given person is employed, although it may consist of different sorts and be parceled out under different contracts, and notwithstanding that the participation of said person is confined to one branch only of said work; and that, as the work which the petitioners were having done upon said buildings occupied more than 10 days in its performance and necessitated the expenditure of more than $100, the employment of the applicant was not casual; and they further contend that, even excluding all parts of the work in the performance of which the applicant was not personally concerned, the remainder which was to be done by him required more than 10 days for its doing, thus bringing him within the protection of the act.

The petitioners, on the other hand, claim that the applicant was to do only certain carpentry work, which was given to him under several independent contracts, in the performance of which he, as an independent contractor, would not come within the protection of the act, and that, if it be held that any part of his work was not embraced in such a definite contract, such part did not require for its execution more than 10 working days and did not involve a labor cost of $100; that the applicant's employment upon work not included in a definite contract was therefore casual, and as such not covered by the compensatory provisions of the act in case of injury.

The relevant portions of the act read as follows:

> Section 8 (a). "* * * But excluding any person whose employment is both casual and not in the course of the trade, business, profession or occupation of his employer. * * *"
> Section 8 (b). "Any person rendering service for another, other than as an independent contractor, or as expressly excluded herein, is presumed to be an employee within the meaning of this act. * * *"
> Section 8 (c). "The term 'casual' as used in this section shall be taken to refer only to employments where the work contemplated is to be completed in not exceeding ten working days, without regard to the number of men employed, and where the total labor cost of such work is less than one hundred dollars. * * *"

The finding of the Commission, after referring in detail to the work which the petitioners were causing to be done, refers to the applicant's connection with it in the following terms.

> "Such work as contemplated was of a character which required, and in performance actually consumed, more than 10 working days and a total labor cost exceeding $100; it was contemplated that applicant's labor should be concerned in all of such work; applicant performed the work upon the front roof in the capacity of independent contractor, but the remainder of the aforesaid work was, or was expected to be, performed by him in the capacity of defendant's employee; the work upon the rear roof covered 2 working days, the miscellaneous carpentry work 2 working days; and the plumbing work in connection with the bathtubs 8 working days; the portion of said total work not performed by applicant by reason of said injury was performed by other workmen in approximately the time which would have been consumed by applicant and his assistants had he continued working, and consisted for the most part of such plumbing. Therefore, said applicant's employment was not casual, though not in the course of defendant's business."

The defense of casual employment is not available unless the employment was not only casual as defined by the act, but also not in the trade, business, profession, or occupation of the employer. If either of these conditions be present, the employee comes within the provisions of the act. The Commission having found, and it being conceded, that the employment was not in the petitioners' business, trade, etc., we are concerned only with the factor of casual employment.

The Commission correctly found that the labor performed on the replacement of the roof of the front house was done by the applicant in the capacity of an independent contractor, so the time consumed in doing that work was properly excluded from the computation of the number of days that it took or would take to do the carpentry work as an employee.

[1] Accepting the view that the remainder of the work to be done by applicant was in the capacity of an employee, it clearly appears from the findings of the Commission and the evidence in the case that such work would not and did not consume 10 working days. According to those findings, the work on the roof of the rear house took 2 days, the miscellaneous carpentry work 2 days, and the balance of the work not performed by the applicant by reason of his injury but performed by other persons took 8 days, but consisted for the most part of plumbing work. The evidence is clear, and the applicant himself admits that his employment did not include the plumbing. The unfinished work to be completed by the applicant at the time of his injury and the plumbing were subsequently done by the same man, and his uncontradicted testimony is that the plumbing took 6½ days, which would leave, as he testified, 1½ days to finish the work contemplated, from which it results that the work to be done by the applicant, excluding that under contract, was completed in 5½ days. As above noted, the Commission found that the unfinished work to be performed by the applicant consisted for the most part of plumbing. The conclusion of the Commission that the work contemplated in the employment of the applicant occupied more than 10 days is only arrived at by including in the unfinished work the plumbing. The Commission lumped this with the unfinished carpentry work and found that the two together occupied 8 days, most of it consisting of the plumbing. The time, therefore, occupied in completing the unfinished carpenter work, even according to the finding of the Commission, was less than 4 days. That period, added to the 4 days worked by the applicant before his injury, gives a total of but 8 days, i. e., less than the period required to take the employment of the applicant out of the casual class. It is not contended that the work in which the applicant was concerned as an employee would or did exceed a total labor value of $100.

[2] There is no merit in the contention of counsel for the respondents that the expression "work contemplated" found in section 8 (c), above quoted, refers to the total work done by any and all persons, whether under contract or not, upon a particular undertaking. While the award by the Commission was not made upon such a construction of the statute, still as it is sustainable thereby it is necessary to consider it.

The language contained in this section is:

> "The term 'casual' as used in this section shall be taken to refer only to employments where the work contemplated is to be completed in not exceeding ten working days," etc.

We think it plain that the words "work contemplated" are used in direct connection with the previous word "employment," and mean the work contemplated as the object of the employment. Counsel's argument to the effect that this construction would lead persons undertaking a large piece of work to divide it into small parcels for the purpose of avoiding employers' liability refutes itself, since to do so would entail upon them more trouble and expense than the payment of the insurance premium. Here the applicant was employed to do only the carpentry work, and the circumstance that all the work of different sorts, and performed by persons of different crafts, done or contemplated upon the two houses would take more than 10 days and entail a labor cost of more than $100 would not affect the question of whether or not the applicant's employment was casual. Such employment, as we have seen, was not in the course of the petitioner's trade, business, or profession; and, as it would take less than 10 days to do the work in which the applicant was concerned, he does not come within the benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

The award must therefore be and it is hereby annulled.

MORGAN v. MORGAN. (L. A. 7441.)

1. Limitation of actions 🔑39(1)—Statute of limitations held inapplicable to divorce suits.

Code Civ. Proc. § 343, as to four-year limitation for actions not otherwise provided for, is inapplicable to divorce suits, in view of Civ. Code, § 127.

2. Divorce 🔑69—Suit for divorce for intemperance held not barred.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 124–126, action for divorce for habitual intemperance was not barred by unreasonable lapse of time, where, although the cause of action arose nine years prior to suit, defendant was for nearly six years of such time in the custody and under the control of an institution for insanity, suffering from alcoholism.

3. Divorce 🔑69—Presumption, arising from delay in suing, may be rebutted without showing defendant's disability.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 124, 125, 126, as to unreasonable lapse of time before suing for divorce, and presumption arising from lapse of time, it is not necessary, to rebut the presumption of connivance, collusion, or condonation arising from long delay in suing, that a showing of defendant's legal disability be made, but evidence showing the delay was reasonable is sufficient.

4. Divorce 🔑11—Not encouraged.

It is not the policy of the law to encourage divorces.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Georgia Morgan against Richard Morgan. From judgment for plaintiff defendant appeals. Affirmed.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Willis Oliver Tyler, of Los Angeles, and W. M. Austin, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment granting to respondent herein a decree of divorce from her husband on the ground of habitual intemperance, and incidentally thereto adjudicating certain property rights. Plaintiff's alleged cause of action for divorce on the ground of habitual intemperance had accrued prior to October, 1912, at which time plaintiff and defendant separated, and have ever since lived separate and apart. The complaint alleged that—

> "Said defendant used intoxicating liquors for more than one year prior to the 22d day of October, 1912, to such an extent that he was wholly incapacitated from attending to any labor, work or business."

In December of 1912, the same year, defendant was apprehended on a complaint charging him with insanity, and was found to be suffering from alcoholism. He was committed to the state hospital for the insane at Patton, and remained there until June, 1913, at which time he was paroled. He immediately resumed the use of intoxicating liquors, and was recommitted to the institution in August, 1913, where he remained until the spring of 1917, when he was again paroled. In February, 1918, he was finally discharged.

The sole point presented in support of the appeal which comes here on the judgment roll alone is that plaintiff's cause of action was barred by section 124 of the Civil Code and section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] Section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that all actions other than those specified in the preceding sections of that Code relating to the time for the commencement of actions must be commenced within four years from and after the time of the accrual of the cause of action, has no application to divorce actions, for the reason that section 127 of the Civil Code, dealing specifically with actions for divorce, provides that there shall be no limitation of time for the commencement of actions for divorce except such as are contained in section 124 of the Civil Code.

[2] Section 124 of the Civil Code provides

that a divorce must be denied: (1) When the cause is adultery and the action is not commenced within two years after the commission of the act of adultery or after its discovery by the injured party; (2) when the cause of action is conviction of a felony, and the action is not commenced before the expiration of two years after a pardon or the termination of the period of sentence; and (3) in all other cases when there is an unreasonable lapse of time before the commencement of the action. It is upon the latter provision of course, that the appeal of defendant is based.

An unreasonable lapse of time is defined by section 125 of the same Code as "such a delay in commencing the action as establishes the presumption that there has been connivance, collusion, or condonation of the offense, or full acquiescence in the same, with intent to continue the marriage relations notwithstanding the commission of such offense." Section 126 provides that the presumption arising from lapse of time "may be rebutted by showing reasonable grounds for the delay in commencing the action."

[3] Having in mind the ground for divorce, habitual intemperance, and the fact of the incarceration of defendant in an institution for the insane for practically the entire period after the accrual of the action for divorce until the spring of 1918, there has not been, in our opinion, such an unreasonable lapse of time as makes it imperative upon the court to deny the decree of divorce. This is so notwithstanding the fact that plaintiff might, perhaps, have commenced suit against the defendant after he was committed to the institution and while he was still an inmate. Harrigan v. Harrigan, 135 Cal. 397, 67 Pac. 506, 87 Am. St. Rep. 118. It is not necessary, in order to rebut the presumption of connivance, collusion, or condonation that a showing of legal disability be made. If the evidence adduced tends to show that the delay, which in the absence of explanation would seen unreasonable, was in fact, under all of the circumstances, reasonable, that is sufficient.

Had there been merely an allegation of the accrual of a cause of action in October, 1912, the lapse of nine years unexplained would have raised the presumption of connivance, collusion, condonation, or acquiescence in the wrong. But in the case at bar this lapse of time is fully explained by circumstances which show reasonable grounds for the delay in commencing the action, and thus overcomes such a presumption.

[4] It is not the policy of the law to encourage divorces. Pereira v. Pereira, 156 Cal. 1, 103 Pac. 488, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880, 134 Am. St. Rep. 107. To hold that the aggrieved party cannot hope for reformation and exhaust all means for accomplishing it before attempting to break, judicially, the marriage bonds under penalty of forfeiting the right to a divorce if all efforts fail, is to place a premium upon undue haste to dissolve the marriage tie and to discourage that tolerance, patience, and forbearance which may lead to a permanent reconciliation and the preservation of the integrity of the marriage relation. To so hold would be contrary to the well-recognized interest of the state in the permanency of the relation of marriage. So, therefore, it may be said that the admitted fact that the defendant was for nearly six years in the custody and under the control of an institution for insanity, suffering from alcoholism, and that during that period he was actually incarcerated therein for nearly five years, adequately explains the delay occurring during that period in commencing the action. The inference deducible from that delay is not that there was connivance or collusion, but that there was simply a withholding by the plaintiff of either condonation or condemnation.

With reference to the remaining three years during which time the plaintiff might have instituted her action, it will suffice to say that the trial court found that there was no unreasonable delay in the bringing of the action. At least this is the finding to be implied from the findings in favor of the plaintiff, and which formed the basis of the decree of divorce. And in the absence of a record showing the evidence, the presumption is that there was evidence offered and received in the case fully supporting the findings of the trial court.

Judgment affirmed.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS

PEOPLE v. TROPEA et al. (Cr. 671.) (District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 11, 1923.) Appeal from Superior Court; San Joaquin County; D. M. Young, Judge. Sam Tropea was convicted of murder in the first degree, and John Trotta was convicted of murder in the second degree, and they appeal. Affirmed. Walter F. Lynch, of Stockton, for appellants. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendants were jointly indicted and tried on a charge of murder, alleged to have been committed on the 2d day of June, 1922. Tropea was convicted of murder of the first degree and the jury fixed his punishment at imprisonment in the state prison for life. Trotta was convicted of murder of the second degree. This appeal is from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial. The transcript on appeal was filed November 15, 1922. Appellants have filed no briefs in support of their appeal. The cause came on regularly for argument on the 4th day of January, 1923. No appearance was made for appellants and on motion of the Attorney General the appeal was submitted on the record. Notwithstanding the apparent abandonment of the appeal, in view of the serious consequences of the conviction, a careful examination of the record has been made. From such examination it appears that the defendants were ably represented at the trial and that their rights were scrupulously protected by the trial court. The evidence against them is so overwhelming that it is difficult to conceive of a rational theory upon which the jury could have based a verdict of acquittal. The judgment and order are affirmed.

FINCH, P. J. This appeal is from a judgment of conviction of the crime of "maintaining a place where alcoholic liquor is kept for sale and distribution" in no-license territory. The transcript on appeal was filed July 15, 1922. No brief has been filed on behalf of appellant. The appeal came on regularly for oral argument on the 3d day of January, 1923. No appearance was made for appellant. An examination of the transcript shows that the appellant was fairly tried and convicted on evidence which was conclusive of guilt. The judgment is affirmed.

1. Contracts ⚷127(2)—Rule as to validity of agreements to arbitrate stated.

An agreement to arbitrate all disputes thereafter to arise under a contract is invalid and unenforceable, as constituting an attempt to oust legally constituted courts of jurisdiction and to set up private tribunals, but, if the matter to be submitted was the mere finding of facts, the determination of which is essential to the accrual of the cause of action itself, such arbitration or finding becomes a condition precedent to the right to sue, and is not within the rule.

Provision of sale contract providing that any dispute arising thereunder should be immediately submitted to arbitration, the decision to be final and binding, being one covering all disputes thereafter to arise, and not being confined to the ascertainment of a fact essential to the existence of the cause of action, was invalid as an attempt to oust the courts of jurisdiction.

Action by the W. H. Blodgett Company against the Bebe Company and others. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Willard P. Smith, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Maurice E. Harrison, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages from the defendants for breach of contract, which was one for the sale and purchase of personal property. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence the defendants moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that the contract relied upon by the plaintiff provided that, should any dispute arise thereunder, it should be submitted to arbitration, and that the plaintiff's evidence failed to show that such arbitration had been had or that plaintiff had offered to arbitrate. The trial court granted the motion upon that ground, and the plaintiff appeals from the judgment entered thereon.

The question involved upon the appeal is whether the plaintiff was bound by its agreement for arbitration.

The provision of the contract concerning this question, so far as pertinent here, is in the following language:

> "Any dispute arising under this contract shall be immediately submitted to arbitration. * * * The decision shall be final and binding on both parties. * * * Each party hereby agrees that, in the event of his failure to comply with the award of the arbitrations within ten (10) days of date of such award, an action in court shall lie against him based upon such award."

The arbitration clause also designated the arbitrators, the place where the proceeding should he held, and a method of procedure, but it is not necessary here to refer to those matters in detail.

[1] It was early settled in the jurisprudence of this state, in conformity with that of practically all the states, that an agreement between parties to a contract to arbitrate all disputes thereafter to arise thereunder is invalid and unenforceable, as constituting an attempt to oust the legally constituted courts of their jurisdiction and to set up private tribunals, but that, if the matter to be submitted to the arbitrators was the mere finding of a fact or facts the determination of which is essential to the accrual of the cause of action itself, such arbitration or finding becomes a condition precedent to the right to sue, and is therefore not within the general rule. Judges and commentators have ascribed the origin of the rule to the jealousy of courts in the matter of their power and jurisdiction and have been somewhat inclined to criticize it on that ground. Another and better ground assigned for it is that citizens ought not to be permitted or encouraged to deprive themselves of the protection of the courts by referring to the arbitrament of private persons or tribunals, in no way qualified by training or experience to pass upon them, questions affecting their legal rights. Whatever may be the true origin of the rule, it is very generally established, and there can be no doubt that it prevails in California.

The question early arose and was considered at length in the case of Holmes v. Richet, 56 Cal. 307, 38 Am. Rep. 54, where the general rule was recognized, although the facts of that case brought it within the exception above noted. That action was based upon a claim for extra work under a building contract, which provided that should any dispute arise as to the amount to be paid for extra work it should be referred to two competent persons, and, if they could not agree, the services of an umpire were to be invoked. It was contended that this was a general agreement for arbitration, and therefore not enforceable. In the opinion the court said:

> "Was it competent for the parties to make such a stipulation? It has been frequently decided, and now seems to be the settled law, that an agreement to refer a case to arbitration will not be regarded by the courts, and they will take jurisdiction and determine a dispute between parties, notwithstanding such an agreement. But that is not this case. Here the parties simply agreed that the amount or value of certain extra work should be fixed in a certain manner, and was there any right of action in this case for and on account of said extra work until the value thereof was fixed according to the terms and conditions of the contract? In other words, was it not a condition precedent to any right of action that the value of the extra work should be determined in the mode provided by the contract? This question was very elaborately considered by the Court of Appeals of New York in the recent case of President, etc., v. Pennsylvania Coal Company, 50 N. Y. 250. The court there says: 'The distinction between the two classes of cases is marked and well defined. In one case the parties undertake by an independent covenant or agreement to provide for an adjustment and settlement of all disputes and differences by arbitration, to the exclusion of the courts; and in the other they merely, by the same agreement which creates the liability and gives the right, qualify the right, by providing that, before any right of action shall accrue, certain facts shall be determined, or amounts and values ascertained; and this is made a condition precedent, either in terms or by necessary implication. This condition being lawful, the courts have never hesitated to give full effect to it. * * *' 'When, as here, the agreement is that the covenantor shall pay such sum and only such sum as shall be determined by arbitrators, the procuring an award is as clearly a condition precedent to an action as if the parties had added, "and no action shall be maintainable until after the award of the arbitrators."'"

The rule thus announced has been uniformly followed in this state. See Loup v. Cal.

S. R. R. Co., 63 Cal. 97, 101; Old Saucelito L. & D. D. Co. v. Commercial Union Ass'n Co., 66 Cal. 253, 5 Pac. 232; Adams v. Ins. Co., 70 Cal. 198, 11 Pac. 627; Farnum v. Phœnix Ins. Co., 83 Cal. 246, 23 Pac. 869; M. E. Church v. Seitz, 74 Cal. 287, 15 Pac. 839; Davisson v. East Whittier Land, etc., Co., 153 Cal. 81, 96 Pac. 88; North American Co. v. Outer Harbor Co., 178 Cal. 406, 173 Pac. 756; Oakdale Irr. Dist. v. Beard et al., 47 Cal. App. 66, 190 Pac. 224.

It is also the general rule throughout the country, and is stated in 5 Corpus Juris, p. 20, in the following language:

> "Parties will not be permitted, by agreements to submit to arbitration, to oust the jurisdiction of the courts, whether the agreement relates to existing differences or to those which may arise in the future. In other words, the courts may disregard such agreements, assume jurisdiction, and determine the matters in dispute which constitute the subject-matter of the agreements, on the principle that the parties cannot deprive themselves of the right to resort to the proper legal tribunals for the submission of their controversies. The general principle that courts favor arbitrations and will indulge every reasonable presumption to uphold arbitration proceedings is strictly limited to proceedings which have resulted in an award, in consequence of which submissions to arbitration cannot be specifically enforced, and the parties to the submission may revoke it at any time before the award is made."

And the exception to the rule is stated in the following terms:

> "Where a contract contains a stipulation, not that all questions arising thereunder, whether as to the validity or effect of such contract or otherwise, shall be submitted to arbitration, but that the decision of arbitrators on a certain question or questions, such as the quantity, quality, or price of materials or workmanship, the value of work, the amount of loss or damage, or the like, shall be a condition precedent to the right of action on the contract itself, no fixed sum being stated in the contract, such stipulation will be enforced, because the parties to a contract have a right to adopt whatever method they see fit for determining such questions, and until the method adopted has been pursued, or some sufficient reason given for not pursuing it, no action can be brought on the contract. * * *" 5 Corpus Juris, p. 43.

And, in a note to Williams v. Branning Mfg. Co., 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 356, the general rule is referred to in the following terms:

> "Although the cases respecting insurance policies with agreements to arbitrate outnumber those concerned with other contracts, the latter are in full accord with the former as to the prevalence and application of the doctrine above stated. They all hold it to be settled law that agreements to arbitrate everything in dispute, and taking away from the courts jurisdiction over any controversy, are nullities"—citing cases.

It has indeed been doubted whether the cases coming within the exception to the general rule are true arbitrations, and not mere appraisements. Thus, in 3 Cal. Jur. § 15, p. 49, it is said:

> "It will, of course, be noted that many of the cases holding that the determination of value, loss, damage, etc., is a condition precedent to suit, deal in fact with appraisements, and not with true arbitrations. Indeed, the distinguishing feature which makes a statutory arbitration possible, namely, the existence of a controversy which may be made the subject of a civil action, operates in the main equally well to define those cases in which the court, ignoring an agreement to arbitrate, will take jurisdiction of the cause."

We have seen that the arbitrationn provision in the case at bar is very broad in its terms, requiring all disputes arising under the contract to be arbitrated, and is thus one which was not binding upon the parties; but the respondents seek to withdraw it from the application of the established rule by arguing that, reading the entire provision relating to arbitration, it is apparent that it was the intention of the parties that a resort to arbitration should be a condition precedent to the bringing of suit; and they thus endeavor to bring the case within the exception to the general rule, or, rather, within the terms of a very broad statement of the exception which is found occasionally in the cases, viz. that the general rule as to the invalidity of agreements to arbitrate all disputes does not apply where such arbitration is by the contract expressly or impliedly made a condition precedent to the bringing of suit.

This broad statement of the rule purports to be based upon that class of cases already referred to in which some fact is to be ascertained without which the cause of action is not complete. In such cases it has been said that arbitration is a condition precedent to the bringing of suit implied from the agreement itself; and if in such a case arbitration is also expressly made such condition, the added provision in no way changes the situation. But, if an attempt be made expressly to make arbitration of a dispute a condition precedent to the bringing of suit irrespective of whether from the nature of the fact to be found or arbitrated it is such condition precedent, it is apparent that we at once run counter to the general rule itself, and, by the mere addition of a phrase which in no manner changes the relative situation of the parties, endeavor to accomplish a result which, according to that rule, is not permitted, viz. oust the courts of jurisdiction.

[2] It is apparent that, where the cause of action is not complete until the establishment in a prescribed mode of a given fact, such fact is necessarily a condition precedent to the right of action; but, where the right of action is complete, the bringing of suit thereon is, of course, not impliedly subject to the condition that arbitration first be had, nor can it be expressly made so unless we are prepared to abandon the established rule. This is, we think, obvious from a consideration of the general rule itself, and the consequences necessarily flowing from its application. The rule is that an agreement for the arbitration of any dispute thereafter to arise under a given contract will not be enforced by the courts. But such an agreement is itself an attempt to make arbitration a condition precedent to the bringing of suit, and its effect is no different from that of an express stipulation that arbitration shall be such condition precedent. Assume that the latter is binding; what would be the course pursued under it? A dispute arises and arbitration is had. An award being made, can a party to the stipulation say:

> "I have submitted the question in dispute to arbitration and thus complied with the condition precedent. Now I will bring my suit upon my original claim and ignore the award."

Evidently not, for, if so, the arbitration would be an idle proceeding. His only right now is to enforce the award. But is not this precisely the effect of the bare agreement to arbitrate unaccompanied by the express provision that arbitration shall be a condition precedent? The answer to this question must be in the affirmative, for, if arbitration be had under such agreement, the rights and remedies of the parties thereunder are identical with those above indicated as arising from an arbitration had in pursuance of a stipulation that it shall be a condition precedent to the bringing of suit. In either case any suit thereafter brought must be upon the award.

> "It is the general rule that a valid award operates to merge and extinguish all claims embraced in the submission. Thereafter the submission and award furnish the only basis by which the rights of the parties can be determined, and constitute a bar to any action on the original demand, unless both parties have repudiated it." 5 Corpus Juris, p. 163.

We have considered this phase of the question somewhat at length for the reason that the respondents in support of the judgment —and upon, we think, the erroneous assumption that their contention is sound that the present agreement in effect provides that arbitration shall be a condition precedent to the bringing of suit—cited the case of Garcia & Maggini Co. v. Colvin (Cal. App.) 199 Pac. 1113, which, it must be admitted, upholds their contention that arbitration must first be had in any case where the parties have so agreed. In that case no question was raised as to the validity of the arbitration clause. Both parties to that action assumed its validity. The claim there made by appellant was to the effect that defendant, having repudiated the contract, was estopped to invoke the arbitration clause therein.

The arbitration clause in the case cited reads:

> "Any controversy arising under this contract shall be settled by arbitration, and the submission of such controversy to arbitration in accordance herewith by each party shall be a condition precedent to the right of such party to enforce this agreement."

Suit having been brought without such submission, a judgment of nonsuit granted upon the ground of such failure to arbitrate was upheld by the District Court of Appeal. in an opinion citing no authorities and containing no argument, the point being disposed of by the statement.

> "As arbitration or an attempt to effect arbitration was a condition precedent to the commencement of the action, the failure to allege and prove that such course had been followed, or that the plaintiff was excused from doing so was fatal to its cause of action, and the nonsuit on that ground was properly granted. * * *"

As the submission to arbitration in that case covered all disputes that might possibly arise, and was not confined to the establishment or ascertainment of a fact essential to the existence of the cause of action, thus making a resort to arbitration an implied condition precedent to the bringing of suit, it came within the general rule under which compliance with the agreement to arbitrate was not binding upon either party, notwithstanding the express attempt of the parties to make it so, and was therefore, in our opinion, incorrectly decided.

[3] The provision for arbitration in the case at bar, being one covering all disputes thereafter to arise under the contract, and not being confined to the ascertainment of a fact essential to the existence of the cause of action itself, comes clearly within the general rule that it is not binding upon either party to it. The plaintiff therefore, in the establishment of his case, was not called upon to prove that he had submitted his claim to the method of arbitration provided in the contract between the parties, and the trial court erred in granting the defendants' motion for nonsuit based upon plaintiff's noncompliance with such provision.

The judgment should therefore be reversed; and it so ordered.

1. Highways 🔑183—Negligent driving of auto by minor imputed to person signing his application for license.

Under Motor Vehicle Act, § 24, as amended by St. 1919, p. 223, § 14, declaring it unlawful for one to permit his child, ward, or employee to drive his auto on the highway without first obtaining a license for him, that application of a minor shall not be granted unless his parent or guardian sign it, and that negligent driving of a minor so licensed shall be imputed to the person signing his application, the minor's negligence is so imputed, though the one signing as "parent" merely stood in the relation of in loco parentis to the minor, and employed him to drive his machine.

2. Statutes 🔑121(1)—Terms and conditions of licensing minors to drive in Motor Vehicle Act germane to subject in title.

Provision of Motor Vehicle Act, § 24, as amended by St. 1919, p. 223, § 14, declaring the terms and conditions on which minors may be licensed to drive, held germane to the subject, within Const. art. 4, § 24, as to subject and title of acts.

3. Statutes 🔑72—Motor Vehicle Act's provision as to negligence of minor drivers of uniform application.

Provision of Motor Vehicle Act, § 24, as amended by St. 1919, p. 223, § 14, that negligence of a minor in driving shall be imputed to the parent or guardian signing his application for license, does not violate Const. art. 1, § 11, requiring general laws to have uniform application.

4. Constitutional law 🔑205(2)—No granting of special privileges by provision of Motor Vehicles Act as to negligence of minor drivers.

Const. art. 1, § 21, forbidding a grant of special privilege to one citizen or class of citizens not given on the same terms to all, is not violated by Motor Vehicle Act, § 24, as amended by St. 1919, p. 223, § 14, providing that negligence of a minor in driving shall be imputed to the parent or guardian signing his application for license.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by Augusta E. Buelke, special administratrix of August E. Buelke, deceased, against Nat Levenstadt and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Duke Stone and Perry F. Backus, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, J. The plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband, brought this action to recover for injuries resulting in the death of the decedent and caused by the negligent operation of a motor vehicle by defendant Nat Levenstadt, a minor. The automobile was owned by defendant Morris Levenstadt, uncle of Nat, whose relation to the boy was that of in loco parentis, and who, in order that Nat might procure a license to operate a motor vehicle, had signed the required application therefor. At the time of the accident the uncle was not present, and the boy was engaged upon an independent mission of his own. Special issues were submitted to the jury upon the answers to which the court entered judgment in plaintiff's favor, and against both defendants, who have appealed.

It is admitted at the outset of the presentation of the appeal that, as to the defendant Nat Levenstadt, the evidence of negligence was conflicting and that as to him there is no just ground for reversal. We shall therefore disregard him in the discussion of the case, and shall refer to the defendant Morris Levenstadt as the appellant. He was held liable solely by reason of the provisons of section 24 of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 411), as amended by St. 1919, p. 223, § 14, which provides for the licensing of persons operating motor vehicles, and imputes the negligence of a minor in the operation of an autombile upon the public highway to the person who shall have signed the application of such minor for such license. The section provides in brief that it shall be unlawful for any person to operate or drive such vehicle upon the public highways unless licensed by the motor vehicle department of the state. The concluding portion, the part germane to this discussion, is as follows:

> "Provided, that it shall be unlawful for any person to cause or knowingly to permit his or her child, ward or employee to operate or drive a motor vehicle upon the public highway, whether as a chauffeur or operator, without having first obtained such license as is hereinbefore specified; provided, that the application to the department of a minor to operate or drive a motor vehicle, whether as chauffeur or operator, shall not be granted by the department unless the parent or parents having the custody of such applicant or the guardian of such applicant shall have joined in said application by signing the same; and provided, further, that any negligence of a minor, so licensed, in operating or driving a motor vehicle upon the public highway, whether as chauffeur or operator, shall be imputed to the person or persons who shall have signed the application of such minor for said license, which person or persons shall be jointly and severally liable with such minor for any damages caused by such negligence."

[1] Appellant's first contention is that, as he is neither the parent nor guardian of Nat Levenstadt, he is not one of the persons required by the statute to sign a minor's application, and is therefore a mere volunteer, who cannot be held liable under the provisons of the act. To sustain such contention would be to countenance a fraud upon the people of the state. In order to procure a license for his minor nephew, appellant joined in the application of the boy to the motor vehicle department of California, in which he gave his relationship to the minor as "father." Upon the faith of this guaranty the license to the minor was issued. The evidence shows that Nat's parents died when he was 12 years of age. His sister and he then went to live with their uncle, this appellant, who had no children of his own, and the record conclusively establishes that from that time on appellant stood in the relation of in loco parentis to both children. He conducted a grocery store and owned a delivery truck for use in his business. Nat drove this truck for him. He testified that "no one else had anything to do with the driving of the truck except Nat." For these services appellant paid the boy, who was about 19 years of age, $8 a week and his board. Had appellant permitted Nat, regarded either as a son or as an employee, to operate or drive a motor vehicle upon the public highway without first having obtained a license as required by the act, he would have been guilty of a misdemeanor. In order to avail himself of Nat's services, he was compelled by law to join with the minor in the application to the department for the proper license. He did so, misrepresenting his relationship to the applicant. It is quite apparent why he did so, and we are not constrained to assist him in evading the liability he assumed over his own signature by any nicety of construction or regard for technical use of words.

But, aside from this attitude, it is the well-settled law that one standing in loco parentis to those held out as members of his family is entitled to all the rights of a parent. Whitaker v. Warren, 60 N. H. 20, 49 Am. Rep. 302. He also incurs the same liability with respect to them that he is under to his own children. Starkie v. Perry, 71 Cal. 495, 497, 12 Pac. 508; Larsen v. Hansen, 74 Cal. 320, 322, 16 Pac. 5. The relation being established the reciprocal rights, duties and obligations pertaining to it arise between them the same as if he was their natural father. Eickhoff v. Sedalia, etc., Ry. Co., 106 Mo. App. 541, 544, 80 S. W. 966; 1 Schouler's Domestic Relations (6th Ed.) §§ 686, 687. We see no reason, therefore, why one standing in such relation may not voluntarily assume the liability imposed by the statute in the same manner and with like effect as though he were a natural father.

[2] It is next contended that the portion of section 24 of the Motor Vehicle Act under consideration is violative of section 24 of article 4 of the state Constitution, which provides that "every act, shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title." All that is required in that connection is that the subject must be in some way indicated by the title of the act, or be logically germane to it, and included within its scope. Pratt v. Browne, 135 Cal. 649, 653, 67 Pac. 1082. As said in another case, there must be a reasonably intelligent reference to the subject to which the legislation of the act is addressed. Estate of McPhee, 154 Cal. 385, 389, 97 Pac. 878. Numerous provisions having one general object, fairly indicated by the title of the act, may be united. The general purpose of the statute being declared the details provided for its accomplishment will be regarded as necessary incidents. Ex parte Liddell, 93 Cal. 633, 637, 29 Pac. 251. The title of the Motor Vehicle Act declares that it is one enacted (among other things) "to regulate the use and operation of vehicles upon the public highways and elsewhere; * * * to provide for the licensing of persons operating motor vehicles; to prohibit certain persons from operating vehicles upon the public highways." The mere statement of appellant's objection is sufficient to refute it. While the provision declaring upon what terms and conditions minors may be licensed to operate motor vehicles is not carried in the title, the subject is germane to the general subject there expressed, and forms a part of the comprehensive scheme provided. It is an appropriate method of effecting one of the main objects of the law. Robinson v. Kerrigan, 151 Cal. 40, 50, 90 Pac. 129, 121 Am. St. Rep. 90, 12 Ann. Cas. 829; Pritchard v. Whitney Estate Co., 164 Cal. 564, 567, 129 Pac. 989.

[3, 4] Appellant's final contention is that the provision of the act is unconstitutional, because it is unreasonable and discriminatory, and is not uniform and general in its application. The application of the law to minors in a class by themselves is not unreasonable or arbitrary. The argument that the law attempts to put into a class by themselves all minors, irrespective of their age, experience, ability to drive, or their financial responsibility, is one that should be presented to the legislative department and not to the courts. In re Stork, 167 Cal. 294, 296, 139 Pac. 684. While some minors are more apt at learning to run motor vehicles than others—possibly more apt than many adults—the fact remains that they are minors. They are in position to be, and in a vast number of cases are, intrusted with the control and operation of motor vehicles upon the public highways. While an automobile is not, in and of itself, a dangerous machine, it may become such in the hands of a careless and indiscreet person. The statute prohibiting the operation of motor vehicles upon the public highways by minors, without their first having obtained licenses which can only be procured upon an assumption of liability for their negligence by parent or guardian, is in effect a determination by the Legislature that minors have not that discretion and judgment which entitles them to unrestrained permission to operate such vehicles upon the public thoroughfares, freed from all parental liability for their negligence except in those cases where it can be established that they are acting as the agent or servant of the owner of the car causing an injury. Daily v. Maxwell, 152 Mo. App. 415, 425, 133 S. W. 351. The Legislature no doubt had in mind the fact that the authorities are in accord in holding that, as a general rule, in an action based on the negligent running of an automobile, the owner of the car who was not present at the infliction of the injury cannot be held liable, except it be shown that the person in charge not only was the agent or servant of the owner, but also was engaged at the time in the business of his service. Daily v. Maxwell, supra; Bryant v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 737, 742, 164 Pac. 385. In this state it is now firmly established, also, that in the absence of a statute creating a liability, the rule applies when the driver is a minor child, and the father is the owner of the car, and all courts recognize the general rule that a parent is not liable for the torts of his child. Spence v. Fisher, 184 Cal. 209, 211, 212, 193 Pac. 255, 14 A. L. R. 1083.

We may assume, also, that the law-making body was fully cognizant of another rule of law relating to the torts of minors which is somewhat in the nature of an exception, and that is that a parent may become liable for an injury caused by the child, where the parent's negligence made it possible for the child to cause the injury complained of, and probable that it would do so. Schultz v. Morrison, 91 Misc. Rep. 248, 154 N. Y. Supp. 257, 258; Hoverson v. Noker, 60 Wis. 511, 514, 19 N. W. 382, 50 Am. Rep. 381; Chaddock v. Plummer, 88 Mich. 225, 50 N. W. 135, 14 L. R. A. 675, 26 Am. St. Rep. 283. This liability is based upon the rules of negligence rather than on the relation of parent and child (Doran v. Thomsen, 76 N. J. Law, 754, 760, 71 Atl. 296, 19 L. R. A. [N. S.] 335, 131 Am. St. Rep. 677) and finds support in the direct relation of cause and effect. Elmendorf v. Clark, 143 La. 971, 79 South. 557, L. R. A. 1918F, 802. In the case of an injury by an automobile, the liability rests, not alone upon the fact of ownership, but upon the combined negligence of the driver in the operation of the automobile, and of the owner in intrusting the machine to an incompetent driver. Berry on Automobiles (2d Ed.) § 603; Parker v. Wilson, 179 Ala. 361, 371, 60 South. 150, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 87.

The Legislature has now declared that under a given state of facts a liability exists where none existed before. The right of action here provided for is, in effect, a modification of the common-law rule exempting a parent from liability for the torts of his minor child, joined with the other rule that a parent may become liable for an injury caused by the child, and made possible, and probable, through the parent's negligence. Its creation does no violence to the provision of the Constitution (article 1, § 11) requiring general laws to have uniform operation, nor that (article 1, § 21) forbidding a grant of special privileges to one citizen, or class of citizens, which are not given on the same terms to all. Pritchard v. Whitney, supra, 164 Cal. 568, 129 Pac. 989.

The objection that the law attempts to create a liability on the part of a parent or guardian signing a minor's application, without regard to any inherent liability of such parent or guardian, and without regard to their negligence or fault, is answered by what we have already said. The statute involved in Daugherty v. Thomas, 174 Mich. 371, 140 N. W. 615, 45 L. R. A. (N. S.) 699, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1163, so strongly relied upon by the appellant, is not the same as the one here. The court there had under review an act of the Legislature which made the owner of an automobile liable for any injury caused by the negligent operation of his car by any person who might obtain possession of it, even though it be without his consent or knowledge. In declaring such provision repugnant to the Constitution, the court said it was not then dealing with "the question of the responsibility, be it moral or otherwise, of the owner of an automobile who has placed it in the hands of an irresponsible person to use." 174 Mich. 379, 140 N. W. 618, 45 L. R. A. (N. S.) 699, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1163.

The judgment is affirmed.

LOGAN v. SHIELDS, County Auditor. (S. F. 10528.)

Counties ⚷61—County board of supervisors held not authorized to appoint or pay traffic officers; "public officer."

A traffic officer, whose duty it is to regulate traffic on the public streets of a county, is to that extent exercising a part of the sovereign power of the state, and is a "public officer," as distinguished from a mere employee, and the county board of supervisors has no authority to create such an office, nor to pay his salary; the power to create such office being exclusively vested in the Legislature by Const. art. 11, § 5.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Officer.]

In Bank.

Application by James B. Logan for a writ of mandate prayed to be directed to J. J. Shields, as County Auditor of the County of San Mateo, requiring him to audit petitioner's demand as traffic officer. Writ denied.

Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, for petitioner.

Franklin Swart and John H. Machado, both of Redwood City, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. This is an original proceeding in mandamus. The petitioner has been employed as a traffic officer or employee by the board of supervisors of San Mateo county at a salary of $150 per month. A claim for that amount for the months of November and December, 1922, was audited and approved by the board of supervisors and was presented by the petitioner to the respondent auditor for his warrant. The auditor having refused to issue his warrant, petitioner brought this proceeding to compel the issuance of the warrant. It appears from the return herein that for a period of about 10 years the board of supervisors of San Mateo has, by resolution and by appointment thereunder, employed and paid a number of persons known in the resolution and in the report as traffic officers or "traffic cops." The petitioner was appointed or employed under such resolution, and by virtue thereof seeks by this proceeding to secure his compensation.

If the petitioner is an officer within the meaning of article 11, § 5, of the Constitution, it is clear under decisions rendered shortly after the adoption of the Constitution that the Legislature of the state alone has power to create such an office, and that the board of supervisors of the county can neither provide for such officers or their compensation under the police power granted directly by the Constitution to the counties in article 11, § 11, nor by authority expressly granted by the Legislature. The rule was thus stated in County of El Dorado v. Meiss, 100 Cal. 268, 274, 34 Pac. 716, 717:

> "The duty of providing for the election or appointment of the particular officers named in section 5 of article 11 of the Constitution, 'and such other county officers * * * as public convenience may require,' and to prescribe their duties and fix their terms of office, is by this section vested exclusively in the Legislature of the state, and can be exercised by no other body. The Legislature cannot divest itself of this duty by any delegation of the power. 'This provision of the Constitution,' said this court in Welsh v. Bramlet, 98 Cal. 219, 'is mandatory, and must be construed, not only as giving to the Legislature the exclusive authority to provide for the officers in the several counties, fix their terms of office, and prescribe their duties, but also as declaring that such provision must be made "by general and uniform laws," and that any law which the Legislature may enact upon these subjects must be uniformly applicable to all the counties in the state.'"

It was therefore held in that case that an ordinance creating the office of license tax collector was void in so far as it attempted to create such office, because of want of power in the board of supervisors to create such an office. In the case of People v. Wheeler, 136 Cal. 652, 69 Pac. 435, this court held that a county physician was not an officer within the meaning of the constitutional provision above quoted. With reference to the question as to whether or not an office was created by the appointment of the county physician it was said:

> "It may be added that if the act could be thus construed, it would be clearly unconstitutional. For the effect of the act would then be to delegate to the board of supervisors the power to create an indefinite number of public officers, with varying duties and compensation; which cannot be regarded as within the constitutional powers of the Legislature. 'The Legislature cannot commit to the discretion of others the important function of creating public offices in unlimited or indefinite number.' Ford v. Harbor Commissioners, 81 Cal. 37; Farrell v. Board of Trustees, 85 Cal. 415. Still more obviously would this be the case if the supposed office be regarded as a county office, as, 'if an office at all,' it should be. People v. Harrington, 63 Cal. 260. For with relation to county offices, it is the constitutional duty of the Legislature not only to provide for the election of the officers, but also to fix their terms of office, to prescribe their duties, and to regulate their salaries or compensation; and this duty could not be delegated to the board of supervisors or others. (Const. art. 2, § 5; Ventura v. Clay, 112 Cal. 70; County of El Dorado v. Meiss, 100 Cal. 274; Farrell v. Board of Trustees, 85 Cal. 415–416; County of Los Angeles v. Lopez, 104 Cal. 258; People v. Johnson, 95 Cal. 471; Dougherty v. Austin, 94 Cal. 601; Dwyer v. Parker, 115 Cal. 544."

In the statute considered in Coulter v. Pool, 187 Cal. 181, 201 Pac. 120, the Legislature attempted to delegate to the board of supervisors the power to employ a county engineer. Although such officer was designated as an employee in the statute it was held that he was in fact an officer and that the attempted delegation of power was void. The court there said:

> "* * * 'The label placed by the Legislature upon its work cannot be permitted to give it a meaning not fairly contemplated within its terms.' In other words, a legislative declaration, whether contained in the title or in the body of a statute, that the statute was intended to promote a certain purpose is not conclusive on the courts, and they may and must inquire into the real, as distinguished from the ostensible, purpose of the statute, and determine the fact whether, after all has been said and done by the Legislature, the statute, in its scope and effect, departs from the declared legislative design and contravenes the fundamental and supreme law of the state. Matter of Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 110 [50 Am. Rep. 636]; State v. Redmon, 134 Wis. 89, 107 [126 Am. St. Rep. 1003; 15 Ann. Cas. 408, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 229, 114 N. W. 137]; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623 [31 L. Ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273. See, also, Rose's U. S. Notes]. * * *"

The court then said:

> "Its definition and application depend not upon what the particular office in question may be called, nor upon what a statute may call it, but upon the power granted and wielded, the duties and functions performed and other circumstances which manifest the true character of the position and make and mark it a public office, irrespective of its formal designation. Knox v. Los Angeles County, 58 Cal. 59; Mechem on Public Offices, § 4; Hartigan v. Board, 49 W. Va. 14 [38 S. E. 698]. * * *"

In determining whether or not the county engineer was a public officer, one of the rules for the determination of that question is thus stated in Coulter v. Pool, supra:

> "A public officer is a public agent, and as such acts only on behalf of his principal, the public, whose sanction is generally considered as necessary to give the act performed by the officer the authority and power of a public act or law. The most general characteristic of a public officer, which distinguishes him from a mere employee, is that a public duty is delegated and entrusted to him, as agent, the performance of which is an exercise of a part of the governmental functions of the particular political unit for which he, as agent, is acting. * * *"

As we said in Ex parte Daniels, 183 Cal. 636, 639, 192 Pac. 442, 444 (21 A. L. R. 1172):

> "The streets of a city belong to the people of the state, and every citizen of the state has a right to the use thereof, subject to legislative control. People v. County of Marin, 103 Cal. 223, 232 [26 L. R. A. 659, 37 Pac. 203]; Elliott on Roads and Streets (3d Ed.) §§ 25, 505, 543, 544, 1112, 1115; 3 Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) § 1122. The right of control over street traffic is an exercise of a part of the sovereign power of the state. Elliott on Roads and Streets, sections cited supra. * * *"

It clearly follows that as the duty of the petitioner herein was to regulate traffic upon the public streets of the county of San Mateo, he was to that extent exercising a part of the sovereign power of the state, and for that reason was a public officer, as distinguished from a mere employee, such as a street sweeper or laborers upon the highway. It is clear, then, that the supervisors had no authority to pay or authorize the payment of the petitioner's salary and for that reason the petition must be denied. It is unnecessary to determine whether or not the petitioner was acting as a peace officer, and thus performing the duties of a constable or sheriff, and for that reason his employment was unauthorized, because it would be of assistance to the sheriff or constable, and thus an increase of compensation to such sheriff or constable. We express no opinion upon that point, basing our judgment upon the proposition that the petitioner was an officer and that the supervisors were without power to create such office.

Petition denied.

HELLMAN COMMERCIAL TRUST & SAVINGS BANK v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al. STOREY v. SAME. IJAMS et al. v. SAME. (L. A. 6890–6892.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 20, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑837(6)—Instructions must be considered in light of evidence.

In determining whether the instructions correctly state the law applicable to the case, the facts as presented in the evidence must be borne in mind, and the assailed instructions must be considered in the light of the evidence.

2. Waters and water courses 🔑49—Instructions as to when water courses exist held correct when construed with the evidence.

Instructions as to what constitutes a natural water course, and stating that a channel possessing the elements of a water course may be a natural water course, even though of comparatively recent formation, and even though formed by the change of course of an older stream from natural causes, held not erroneous as permitting the jury to find that a natural water course may exist merely through the fact that a stream, through the action of its storm waters, has cut a new channel, when considered with the evidence which showed practically without dispute that the channel in question had been in existence for a long period of time.

3. Waters and water courses ⚷78—Owner cannot divert flood waters from established natural water course.

If a wash has become a permanent and established natural water course, no one has the right to divert either the usual or torrential, or even the exceptional and unprecedented, flow of the waters in such channel.

4. Waters and water courses ⚷38—Uninterrupted flow for period of prescription is unnecessary to establish water course.

Though a landowner has a right to dam a new channel washed by flood waters across his land before such channel has become an established water course, it is not necessary that the water shall have flowed uninterruptedly through such channel for the full period of prescription, five years, before it becomes an established water course.

5. Waters and water courses ⚷171(2)—Unprecedented flood no defense to liability for damming natural water course.

Where defendants dammed a natural water course through which the flood waters of a stream were accustomed to run, and thereby caused such water to flow through another channel upon plaintiff's land, it is no defense to defendants' liability that the storm causing the flood was unprecedented so as to be an act of God.

6. Waters and water courses ⚷171(3)—Party assisting in construction of dam does not escape liability by conveying property before flood.

A land company which agreed with a railroad company that the latter should construct a dam across an established water course, and that the land company should pay a percentage of its cost, is not relieved from liability for injuries resulting from flood waters thereby diverted into another channel because it had sold its lands prior to the time the actual damage was caused by the flood.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Three separate actions by the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, by Thomas H. Storey, and by Isaac C. Ijams and others, against the Southern Pacific Company and others. Judgment for plaintiffs in each case, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Henry T. Gage, W. I. Gilbert, and Anderson & Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

George H. Moore, C. Elliott Miller, and Tobias R. Archer, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LENNON, J. A rehearing of the three above-entitled causes after decision by this court, sitting in bank, in one of said causes (L. A. 6890) was granted primarily because, in the petitions for rehearing, it was insisted that the opinion, delivered in the first instance by Mr. Justice Richards, of the First District Court of Appeal, sitting in this court pro tem., failed to definitely deal with and directly dispose of appellants' contention that certain instructions were erroneous and grievously prejudicial in this, that they permitted the jury to find that a new natural water course might in certain circumstances be created "ipso facto, eo instanti"—that is to say, that such a water course might be created overnight. This contention seemed at first blush to be possessed of much merit, and it was so plausibly and earnestly presented that we were constrained, out of abundance of caution, to grant the rehearing prayed for. However, a further and more minute consideration of the case had immediately following the close of intensive and illuminating oral reargument, pro and con, of the phase of the case immediately in discussion, satisfies us that the opinion rendered in the first instance by Mr. Justice Richards, which is herein and hereby adopted as the opinion of the court, adequately deals with, definitely determines, and correctly decides every contention made by the appellants. The opinion of Mr. Justice Richards is as follows:

"This action was instituted for the recovery of damages for the alleged diversion of flood waters from one of the alleged natural channels of a certain stream known as the Tejunga river to another channel thereof, with the resultant overflow of the plaintiff's land, and also for injunctive relief against such diversion. The Tejunga river takes its rise in two branches, known as the Big and Little Tejunga, in the mountains lying to the eastward of the San Fernando valley in the county of Los Angeles; these have their confluence near the mouths of their respective canyons, and thereafter the Tejunga river flows out across the San Fernando valley and into the Los Angeles river; in so doing there have been created in previous years three separate washes or channels, through one or all of which the waters of the Tejunga river were accustomed to flow in times of high water on their way across the valley. The line of the Southern Pacific Railroad into that region was surveyed in about the year 1873, and work upon the construction thereof commenced, which resulted in its completion and in the inception of its operation in about the year 1876. In its general southerly course it crossed the Tejunga river, for which it made provision by means of trestle bridges of various lengths, depending upon the width of these several washes or channels at the point of its passage; these have been changed, rebuilt, or improved from time to time, and have been supplemented by dikes and dams and embankments having for their purpose the protection of the railroad line and trestles from the storm flow of the Tejunga river.

"The complaint herein alleges that for many years prior to January, 1914, and at all times since, there were three natural channels or water courses of the said Tejunga river at or near and also below the point of passage of the railroad, and which are designated in said complaint as wash No. 1, wash No. 2, wash No. 3, and which carry off the rain and storm waters of said stream; that of these wash No. 1 carried off the major portion of said rain and storm waters, conveying them to the southward of plaintiff's lands and premises, while said wash No. 2 carried off a minor portion of the rain and storm waters of said stream, conveying them to the northwest of plaintiff's lands and premises and those of its assignors; that during the year 1912 defendants constructed and caused to be erected certain dikes and embankments of earth, rock, and cement across the mouth of said wash No. 1, which were intended to divert the rain and storm waters of said stream which had been wont to flow down said wash No. 1 into wash No. 2, and which had the effect of such diversion during the winter season of 1914, when the rain and storm waters of said stream, which would otherwise have mainly flowed down the channel of wash No. 1, and would thus have passed a mile or more to the eastward of plaintiff's said lands, and without any damage thereto, were forced to and did flow down and along wash No. 2, and were precipitated upon the westerly portion of plaintiff's said lands, depositing large quantities of boulders, sand, gravel, and other detritus thereon, and washing away a considerable portion thereof, thus destroying and rendering unfit for cultivation or sale the portions of plaintiff's lands thus invaded, to their great damage; wherefore the plaintiff prayed for injunctive relief preventing the defendants from maintaining or reconstructing the dikes and other obstructions across said wash No. 1. The plaintiff also prayed for a mandatory order requiring the defendants to rebuild and repair dikes Nos. 2 and 3 so as to effectually prevent the rain and storm waters of said stream from entering the channel cut by it into wash No. 2, to and crossing plaintiff's land. The plaintiff also prayed for damages in a large sum for injury to the several tracts of land damaged by the said diversion, and for general relief.

"The defendants in their answer denied most of the material allegations of plaintiff's complaint; they particularly denied, for want of information and belief, the averments of plaintiff's complaint that the wash or channel designated therein as wash No. 1 ever was a natural water course of said stream, or that it ever collected or carried off large quantities of the rain and storm waters thereof, or that prior to the erection of the defendants' dams and dikes, described in said complaint, said wash No. 1 carried off the major portion of the rain and storm waters thereof, or that said wash No. 2 carried off a minor portion of said rain and storm waters. They deny that whatever dams and dikes they had caused to be constructed along or across said stream were erected for the purpose of diverting said waters down or along said wash No. 2, or that thereby said waters were forced to flow down wash No. 2, as they would not otherwise have done; they denied that said waters were caused thus to flow through any faulty or negligent construction of said defendants' dikes, dams, or embankments, or that any damage was caused to said plaintiff thereby. They allege affirmatively that the rainfall in 1914, with its consequent torrential outflow of said stream, was unprecedented, and was an act of God for which the defendants were not to be held liable. Wherefore the defendants prayed that the plaintiff take nothing by its said action. The cause proceeded to trial upon the issues as thus framed, before a jury. No special issues were framed or submitted to the jury, but upon submission thereof the court expressly confined their deliberations to the sole issue of damages. The jury returned a verdict in the plaintiff's favor fixing the damages at the sum of $10,000. Upon the return of this verdict the trial court ordered that judgment be not entered thereon at the time, but thereafter took additional evidence as to the right of the plaintiff to injunctive relief, after which it filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law adopting the verdict of the jury, but also making full and detailed findings upon all of the issues and facts involved in the case, and thereupon rendered its judgment awarding the plaintiff damages in the sum of $10,000 as found by the jury, and further granting plaintiff injunctive and mandatory relief substantially as prayed for in its complaint. It is from such judgment that this appeal has been taken.

[1, 2] "The several contentions which the appellants urged upon this appeal relate to the instructions given or refused by the trial court to the jury. The first of these contentions is that the court erred in its instructions to the jury as to what constituted a natural water course. The body of the court's instructions in this regard had several references to the east wash, or wash No. 1, the main issue before the jury being as to whether that particular wash, prior to the construction of the defendants' dikes, dams, and embankments, had during the past history of the outflow of the Tejunga river become such a natural water course thereof that the defendants could not lawfully obstruct or divert the flow of the waters of said stream therein to the plaintiff's damage. In determining whether the instructions of the trial court state correctly the law applicable to a particular case, the facts of the case as presented in the evidence to the jury must be borne in mind, and the assailed instruction must be borne in mind, and the assailed instruction must be considered in the light of the evidence in the case. Essanay Film Co. v. Lerche (C. C. A.) 267 Fed. 353; Hale Bros. v. Milliken, 5 Cal. App. 344, 90 Pac. 365. In the case before us the instructions of the trial court were very full and exhaustive, particularly in their bearing upon the question as to what would constitute a natural water course. The appellants, in criticising these instructions, have selected certain excerpts therefrom which, taken alone and apart from the general body of the court's instructions, would seem to be subject to the criticism which the appellants aim at them. That criticism is that the court has thereby instructed the jury that a natural water course may be created and may exist merely through the fact that a stream through the action of its storm waters has cut a new channel through which its waters, if unprevent-ed, would either continually or intermittently flow. This, of course, is not the law, and, if the whole body of the court's instructions, when taken together, were found to be subject to this interpretation, they would undoubtedly be so prejudicially erroneous as to compel a reversal of this case. It is inconvenient to reproduce the entire body of the court's instructions for the purpose of showing that the appellants' foregoing criticism is unsound, but a few excerpts therefrom may serve to show that it is so.

"The court begins its instructions upon this subject with the following words: 'To constitute a natural water course, there must be a stream usually or periodically flowing in a particular direction. It must flow in a definite channel having a bed, sides, or banks, and usually discharges itself into some other stream or body of water.'

"Again the court says: 'If a stream has a permanent or at a least a periodical source of supply, and runs in a definite channel along a considerable distance, it may then break up into numerous small channels, or percolate into the soil, and sink away and still be, in legal contemplation, a natural water course for the distance that it flows from its source of supply to the point where it breaks up or percolates away or sinks away. If the conformation of the country is such that water flows in large quantities after heavy rains or when the snow melts, at regular seasons, through a well-defined channel which the force of the water has made for itself, and which is the accustomed channel through which it flows periodically, or would so flow when not interfered with by artificial dikes or dams, such channel is to be considered as a natural water course. In determining whether any channel or stream is a natural water course, its size is not a controlling element, either in respect to the volume of water carried or the length of its course, and, while the element of permanence is necessary, great age is not an essential attribute of a water course. If a channel has defined banks, with such characteristics as cause the water to flow in a definite direction or course, and has a stream bed which manifests the continued action of flowing waters, such channel may be a natural water course, even though of comparatively recent formation, and even though formed by an older stream changing its course in whole or in part, provided such change of course occurs from natural, as distinguished from artificial causes, and is of a permanent character.

"The court further instructed the jury that 'If you find that the wash named on the trial of this action as the east wash of the Tejunga, or channel and wash No. 1, did at the time of the making of the dams and dikes by the defendants in 1911 and 1912, mentioned in the complaint of the plaintiff, exist, and now exists, in its natural course, marked or defined on the ground by definite bed, channel, or wash, from the confluence or union of the Little and Big Tejunga across San Fernando valley, east of Lankershim and down to the Los Angeles river, and that without human interference, dams, or dikes some part of the waters of said Little or Big Tejunga naturally and recurrently have flowed into, along, and down said east wash, and thereby reached the Los Angeles river, then the east wash constitutes a natural water course.'

"The foregoing instructions, when considered in the light of the evidence in the case, could not be otherwise understood by the jury than as having particular reference to the east wash, or wash No. 1, of the Tejunga river. This wash, according to the great weight of the evidence in the case, was not a wash or channel of this river which had been created overnight, or within even a short period of time prior to the defendants' construction of the dams, dikes, and embankments which diverted the waters of said stream from pursuing their regular course along said wash during periods of torrential flow. There was some evidence in the case that wash No. 1 had existed as one of the channels of this stream in times of high water as early as the year 1858, long before the railroad entered that region. There was much evidence from old residents of the region, and apparently of an unimpeachable character, that large quantities of water had flowed down this wash during the winter seasons of 1876, 1884, 1887, 1889, and every year thereafter during high water up to the year 1901, when the defendants began the construction of their works for the prevention of such flow, and the diversion of such waters to the other existing channel of such stream known as wash No. 2. There is some evidence that the defendants made sporadic efforts during these later years to prevent the flow of storm waters down channel or wash No. 1, but that these efforts were unsuccessful. If it was such a water course as is shown by the great weight of evidence in this case, it would be quite immaterial that the defendants had at various times prior to their activities in 1911 and 1912 made unsuccessful attempts at the obstruction of said water course and the diversion of such water; such efforts could only have significance in their application to newly created washes or channels, against which the owners of lands thus freshly invaded would have the right to protect themselves by dams, dikes, embankments, levees, and other obstructions having for their object the return of the stream to its former and natural channel. This, however, is not such a case, and it is impossible to conceive, in the light of the evidence freshly in the minds of the jury, that they could have misinterpreted the foregoing instructions of the court as having reference to any other sort of water course than one which had become, through many years of recurring flow, a definite and permanent channel for the outflow of the torrential waters of the Tejunga river.

[3] "The next contention of the appellants is that the trial court erred in its instruction to the jury as to the rights of the defendants to dike off the torrential waters of said river from said east wash, or wash No. 1, thereof. This, however, is but a repetition in another form of its former objection, since, if the east wash had become a permanent and established water course of said river, it would follow as a matter of logical consequence that neither the defendants nor any one else would have the right to divert either the usual or the torrential, or even the exceptional and unprecedented flow of these waters from their natural and accustomed channels to another of the courses or channels of said river, if such diversion would result in precipitating upon the lands of the plaintiff an outflow of said stream which, but for such diversion, would in the main have pursued its way down the east wash or channel thereof at a distance from and without injury to plaintiff's land. The cases of Horton v. Goodenough, 184 Cal. 451, 194 Pac. 34, and Weinberg Co. v. Bixby, 185 Cal. 87, 196 Pac. 25, decided since the trial of this cause, contain nothing in their statement of the law respecting water courses which is at variance with the instructions of the trial court in this case, when viewed in the light of the evidence before it. In each of these cases the main question was that of the right of a lower owner to protect himself against the flood waters of a stream which had newly escaped from its former or natural channel, even though in the exercise of his right so to do his reasonable effort in that direction might have the effect of causing damage to be inflicted upon the owners of other land.

[4] "The appellants' next contention is that the trial court erred in refusing to give to the jury the following instruction: 'If you should find from the evidence that the so-called east or rock crusher wash was formed by the rainstorm or flood of 1889, or any other storm within the memory of man, and that such rainstorm or flood so forming the same was an unprecedented flood, or act of God, as defined by these instructions, then you are further instructed that any channel so cut by such storm would not be or become a natural channel as defined by these instructions, unless permitted to remain without obstruction to its flow for the full period of prescription, to wit, five uninterrupted years.'

"No authority is cited by the appellants to justify this instruction to the effect that the changed channel of a stream could not take on the character of a natural channel thereof without an uninterrupted flow of the waters of the stream therein for the period of five years, or, in other words, for the full period of prescription. Clearly, such is not the law. On the other hand, the instruction which the trial court gave upon this subject, and which is above quoted, embodies, I think, a correct statement of the law upon the subject. In addition thereto the trial court further safeguarded this subject in the minds of the jury by the following instruction: 'Every riparian owner has the right to protect his land from encroachment by overflow or change in the natural channel of any stream or wash flowing through his said land, and when any such encroachments have occurred, and the current of any such stream or wash has turned over upon his land, he has the right to restore it to its original channel and to do such matters and things as are necessary to retain its flow in its original channel; provided, however, that, if it has formed a new natural water course, as defined in these instructions, then he has thereafter no right to restore it to its original channel to the detriment of another.

[5] "These instructions are, as we have heretofore stated, to be read in the light of the evidence in the case, which, practically without contradiction, shows that this wash or channel No. 1 was not of recent origin, and was not caused by any single or extraordinary or unprecedented flood, but that the same had existed in practically the same condition in which it was in the year 1911, when the defendants began the construction of their obstructing dikes and dams, for many years before that time. The trial court was therefore correct in its instruction to the jury that 'The question of an extraordinary flood, or an unprecedented flood, or the act of God, as it is variously termed in law, has nothing whatever to do with the question of the liability or nonliability of the defendants by reason of the erection and maintenance of the dike which has been referred to as L1, in this case. With respect to the erection and maintenance of the dike L1 (the obstructing dike), if the so-called east wash or wash No. 1 was a natural water course at the time of the erection of said dike in 1911 and 1912, then the defendants had no right to dam off the same or divert the waters therefrom, regardless of whether the flood of 1914 was an ordinary flood or an extraordinary flood. On the other hand, if said east wash, so called, or wash No. 1, was not a natural water course at that time, then said defendants did have a right to erect a dam across the same for the protection of their lands, equally regardless of whether the storm or flood of February, 1914, was ordinary or extraordinary.' These instructions in our opinion fully cover the propositions put forth by the defendants in the body of their requested instructions which the court refused to give.

[6] "The appellants make the final contention that the trial court was in error in instructing the jury that the nonownership by the defendant Los Angeles Land & Water Company of the land upon which the dikes, dams, and embankments complained of were constructed, at the time when the flood which caused the damage occurred, did not absolve that particular defendant from liability for such damage. There is no merit in this contention, since the undisputed evidence shows that said defendant had made an agreement with its codefendant, the Southern Pacific Company, that said dams, dikes, and embankments should be constructed by the latter, and that the former would pay 15 per cent. of the cost of their construction and maintenance. This being so, if the construction of said barriers to the flow of the waters of the Tejunga River in one of its natural and accustomed water courses was an actionable wrong, the said defendant Los Angeles Land & Water Company could not relieve itself from liability therefor in damages by a subsequent transfer of its title, even though such transfer occurred prior to the time when the actual damage caused by the creation of such unlawful obstruction arose. The trial court so correctly charged the jury."

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the judgment in each case is affirmed.

NICOLETTI v. BANK OF LOS BANOS.
(S. F. 9947.)

Banks and banking 🔑188½—Remitting bank held not liable for payment of funds by correspondent bank to wrong person.

Where a bank agreed with a depositor to "remit" a certain sum of money, duly exchanged in foreign currency to plaintiff's mother, "Rosa Nicoletti fu Innocenzo, then residing in Chiatri, Italy," through the ordinary banking channels, the agreement was fully complied with on the part of the bank when it exercised due care in the selection of subagents to which the money was transmitted in the ordinary course of banking business, and although the Italian bank mailed a postal card to Rosa Nicoletti at Chiatri, Italy, by addressing it to Rosa Nicoletti at San Filippo, Italy, when there were three other persons by that name besides the intended payee who received their mail at such point, in consequence of which payment was made to the wrong person, the bank was not liable; the agreement not being to "deliver" but to "remit."

Lawlor and Seawell, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by Ascanio Nicoletti against the Bank of Los Banos for money had and received. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Edward F. Treadwell, of San Francisco (Forrest A. Cobb, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Clay A. Pedrazzini, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. The plaintiff alleges in his complaint that he delivered $550 to the defendant bank on February 15, 1915, whereupon the defendant "agreed, in writing, and for a valuable consideration, then and there paid, to remit said money, duly exchanged in foreign currency, to plaintiff's mother, Rosa Nicoletti fu Innocenzo, then residing in Chiatri, Italy." It is alleged that the defendant did not remit said money or any part of it to the plaintiff's mother, Rosa Nicoletti fu Innocenzo, then residing at Chiatri, Italy, and that the money had not been paid to her. The defendant by its answer admitted the receipt of the money and that plaintiff "requested the said defendant to transmit $550 in gold coin of the United States, duly exchanged in foreign money, to Rosa Nicoletti, at Chiatri, Italy, and the said defendant then agreed to transmit the same in accordance with banking customs, and through ordinary banking channels for transmission of money to foreign countries, and the said plaintiff then and there delivered said sum of money to the defendant for that purpose," and alleges in detail the manner of the performance of its contract. It will be observed that the plaintiff alleged an agreement to "remit" the money and the defendant an agreement to "transmit" the money to Rosa Nicoletti at Chiatri, Italy; the difference between the allegations of the complaint and the admissions of the answer being in the allegation in the complaint that the words "fu Innocenzo" were added to the name Rosa Nicoletti, these words being omitted in the answer.

Upon the trial it was stipulated that—

> On February 15, 1915, plaintiff delivered to the defendant $550 "for transmission through its ordinary banking channels to Chiatri, Italy; that plaintiff herein claims that he instructed defendant herein to cause the same, or its equivalent, to be delivered to Rosa Nicoletti fu Innocenzo, who is his mother, at that place, and that defendant herein claims that he instructed it to deliver the said money, or its equivalent, to Rosa Nicoletti of Chiatri, Italy; that plaintiff's instructions to defendant, as aforesaid, are a matter in dispute, and the right is expressly reserved to both parties to introduce evidence thereupon." (Italics ours.)

It was also stipulated that San Filippo is a post office near Chiatri, Italy, and that there is no post office at the latter place; that there are three persons living in San Filippo named Rosa Nicoletti. Thus at least four persons named Rosa Nicoletti had their post office address at San Filippo. The bank in Milan, Italy, to which the money was transmitted by defendant, mailed a postal card to Rosa Nicoletti at Chiatri, Italy, by addressing it to Rosa Nicoletti at San Filippo, Italy. It was received by Rosa Nicoletti del fu Carlo Ridondelly, and upon her reply the Milan bank forwarded the money through the post office to the latter person, who received and receipted for and spent the same.

The trial court found that the plaintiff paid the defendant $550 in gold coin and that—

> The defendant "then and there agreed in writing, and for a valuable consideration then and there paid, to remit said money duly exchanged in foreign currency, to Rosa Nicoletti, at Chiatri, Kingdom of Italy. That the said agreement is evidenced by a certain writing, delivered by defendant to plaintiff herein at the time of the said transaction, which writing is in words and figures following:
> "'(No. 106314—place and date, Los Banos, California, February 15, 1915.)
> "'Received of A. Nicoletti 550 dollars for payment of 2870 lire (foreign currency) to be remitted to Rosa Nicoletti in Chiatri, Italia. [Signature] P. J. Daly, Teller.' That the same is the only written evidence of the said agreement." (Italics ours.)

Upon the controverted fact as to the person to whom the money was to be transmitted, it is thus found by the court that the agreement was to transmit the money to "Rosa Nicoletti, at Chiatri, Italy." It was also found by the court that the money was transmitted through the Mechanics & Metals National Bank of New York City, which bank was the correspondent of the defendant and through which it customarily transmitted money to foreign countries, and that such bank "was a proper channel through which to transmit the same in accordance with established banking practices." The court found that the Italian Bank at Milan, Italy, was negligent in its delivery of the money to Rosa Nicoletti at San Filippo instead of at Chiatri, and that the bank in Milan, Italy, "was the agent of defendant herein in the said transaction." Judgment followed for the amount claimed, and defendant appealed and filed a bill of exceptions specifying that the evidence was insufficient to justify the finding that the defendant agreed to remit the money to Rosa Nicoletti, "but, on the contrary, the evidence shows that the said defendant agreed to transmit the same to the said Rosa Nicoletti through its ordinary banking channels," and, second, that "the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that the Societa Bancaria Italiana at Milan, Italy, was the agent of the defendant herein in the said transaction." (Italics ours.)

If there had been an express agreement to deliver the money to Rosa Nicoletti at Chiatri, Italy, there is no doubt that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover for the failure to do so. But the agreement alleged in the complaint, admitted in the answer, stipulated to by the parties, and found by the court, was an agreement to remit the money to Rosa Nicoletti, at Chiatri, Italy. An agreement to "remit" or "transmit" money is an agreement to send and not an agreement to deliver. The distinction is important because it fixes the status of the subagencies through which the money is to be transmitted and the consequent responsibility for the negligence of such subagencies.

The decisions upon the effect of a contract to remit money are few and recent, and the one most nearly in point is the case of Katcher v. American Express Co., 94 N. J. Law, 165, 109 Atl. 741, decided March 19, 1920. In that case the Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey had under consideration a contract in the form of a receipt issued by the American Express Company, which states as follows: "Received," etc., "For remittance to Tese Kacjur. At Bereznier, Luckiy, Wolynck." In discussing the effect of such an agreement where the money had not been delivered, the court said:

> "But, in view of the importance of the case as typical of a great number of similar transactions, we are not disposed to rest our decision on a mere question of pleading. The fundamental issue is as to the duty of the defendant under its contract. Plaintiff claims that defendant agreed to deliver the money, dollars or rubles, to Tese Kaczier at the place named. We are unable to read any such agreement from the written contract even as supplemented by parol evidence. It uses the word 'remittance' twice, and the word 'forward' (as a verb) once. Without doubt the two words are used synonymously. As we have said, the word 'deliver' is not used at all. The definitions of the word 'remit' in standard authorities do not involve the idea of delivery:
> "'Remit. (2) To transmit or send, as money, bills, or other things in payment for goods received. [Quoting from Goldsmith:] I have received the money which was remitted here in order to release me from captivity." Century Dictionary.
> "'To transmit or send, especially to a distance, as money in payment of a demand, account, draft,' etc. New International Dictionary.
> "See, also, 24 Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 461, and Comber v. Leyland, [1898] A. C. 530.
> "So the word 'forward' is defined in both these authorities as:
> "'To send forward; to send toward the place of destination; to transmit.'
> "See Buell v. Chapin, 99 Mass. 596, 97 Am. Dec. 58.
> "The proper interpretation of the contract before us is this: That the express company was to convert the plaintiff's money, after deducting its own charges, by cable into rubles in Russia; that plaintiff had paid in sufficient to obtain these 1,000 rubles after paying charges; that this sum of 1,000 rubles was to be forwarded, or remitted, which amounts to the same thing, to Tese Kaczier at the given address by the usual course of the Russian mail. This was the extent of appellant's primary duty under the contract. * * *"

The principle controlling the duty of a bank receiving commercial paper collection at a distant point would seem to be equally applicable to an agreement to transmit money to such a point. We are not lacking an authority upon that question in California, although the decisions are not agreed upon that matter.

In the case of Davis v. First National Bank of Fresno, 118 Cal. 600, 50 Pac. 666, this court, in dealing with the question of the liability of a bank which had taken a draft for collection, held that its duty was complete when it sent the draft through ordinary banking channels to another bank for collection, and this was true even though the plaintiff did not know that such was the custom of the bank. In that regard the opinion states as follows:

> "In making the collection the bank was acting as the agent of the plaintiff, and from the nature of the transaction was required to employ a subagent, and, as the agent of the plaintiff, was bound to exercise reasonable care and diligence, as well in the employ of its subagent as in the discharge of any other of the duties assumed by it. If in making the collection it followed the course usually taken by banks under similar circumstances it cannot be held to have been negligent. (Dorchester Bank v. New England Bank, 1 Cush. 177; Indig v. National City Bank, 80 N. Y. 105.)"

The decision of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts thus cited by this court as authority for the decision (Dorchester Bank v. New England Bank, 1 Cush. 117) contains the following:

"The bills undoubtedly were intended to be transmitted to Washington for collection, and if the defendants employed suitable subagents for that purpose, in good faith, they are not liable for the neglect or default of the subagents. This was so decided in Fabens v. Mercantile Bank, 23 Pick. 330. The chief justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, says 'It is well settled, that when a note is deposited with a bank for collection, which is payable at another place, the whole duty of the bank so receiving the note, in the first instance, is seasonably to transmit the same to a suitable bank or other agent at the place of payment. And as a part of the same doctrine, it is well settled, that if the acceptor of a bill or promisor of a note has his residence in another place, it shall be presumed to have been intended and understood between the depositor for collection and the bank, that it was to be transmitted to the place of the residence of the promisor.' This decision of the court on both points is, we think, well founded in principle, and supported by a decided weight of authority. * * *

"If the bank in that case acted in good faith, in selecting a suitable subagent, where the bills were payable, there seems to be no principle of justice, or public policy, by which the bank should be made liable for the neglect or misfeasance of the subagent. And it is admitted, by Mr. Senator Verplanck, who states the grounds of the reversal of the judgment, that the bank would not have been liable, if there had been an understanding or agreement, express or implied, that the bills were to be transmitted to another bank for collection. Now, we think, in that case, as in this, there was manifestly such an understanding. There is another view of that case, taken by the learned senator, in which we cannot concur. He makes no distinction between the neglect of the officers of the bank where the bills were deposited, and that of the bank to which they were transmitted for collection. We think the distinction is obvious. We agree, however, with the learned senator, that the decisive question in such cases is, what was the understanding of the parties, as to the duties the collecting bank undertook to perform. And as to this, we have no doubt of the understanding of the parties in the present case. That was, we think, that the defendants were to transmit the bills, or to cause them to be transmitted, to some suitable bank or other agent in Washington, for collection; and the questions are, whether, in employing the Commonwealth Bank to transmit the bills, the defendants acted in good faith; and if so, whether they are responsible for the failure of that bank. * * *"

This court in Davis v. First National Bank of Fresno, supra, held that the usage of the bank to send its commercial paper to its correspondent banks for collection was binding upon the customer, even if he was ignorant of the usage and made no inquiries in reference thereto. In that regard the opinion states as follows:

"The court should also have permitted the defendant to show by the witnesses, which it called for that purpose, the usage of banks in regard to the collection of paper presented by persons who were unknown to them, and that the defendant conformed to that usage. (Warren Bank v. Suffolk Bank, 10 Cush. 582.) If such usage was reasonable and did not contravene any principles of law, the fact that the defendant followed it would tend to show that it exercised reasonable care in seeking to collect the draft. One who gives a draft to a bank to collect is held to have an implied knowledge of its usage in collecting drafts, so far as such usage does not contravene any rule of law. (Morse on Banking, § 9; Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 1 Pet. 25.) 'The fact that one deals with the bank without taking the trouble to inquire as to its system will raise the implication that he already knows and is satisfied with that system. It is clear that if a person hands over a note to a bank for collection, without any species of remark as to the course to be pursued, the bank is not bound to thrust upon him a statement of its intended course and to retain him until the whole theory has been expounded to him, when his conduct unmistakably shows that either he already knows it, or else he does not desire to know it. Either he knows and approves it, or he voluntarily trusts to the wisdom of the bank at his own deliberately assumed risk of its sufficiency. In such a case the bank not only has a right to assume, but it is even positively bound to assume, that his desire is that the ordinary and established usage be pursued.'"

See, also, San Francisco National Bank v. American National Bank, 5 Cal. App. 408, 190 Pac. 558.

It follows then that an agreement by a bank to remit money implies an agreement to transmit the same through the ordinary banking channels, and that such agreement is fully complied with when the bank has exercised due care in the selection of the subagents to which the money is transmitted in the ordinary course of banking business.

The implied agreement between the parties was that plaintiff's money should be remitted by the defendant through the ordinary banking channels. It was stipulated that such was the actual agreement and the court found as a fact that the money was so transmitted.

The complaint, answer, stipulation of facts, and findings of fact, construed together, are to the effect that defendant's agreement was to remit through the ordinary banking channels. Such agreement would be implied from the written receipt given by the defendant to the plaintiff and set out in the findings.

In the findings of fact is a statement that the bank at Milan, Italy, was the agent of the defendant. In view of the fact that the court had already found the facts concerning the relationship between the plaintiff and the defendant and that it followed as a conclusion of law from such facts that the bank at Milan, Italy, was not the agent of the defendant, the statement in the findings that the bank at Milan, Italy, was the agent of the defendant is an erroneous conclusion of law which must be disregarded. The trial court also found that the bank at Milan, Italy, was negligent; but, as we have already seen, the defendant was not responsible for such negligence if it had exercised due care in the selection of the subagents who were to transmit the money to the plaintiff's mother at Chiatri, Italy.

Judgment reversed.

We concur: LENNON, J.; MYERS, J.; TYLER, Justice pro tem.; St. SURE, Justice pro tem.

LAWLOR, J. I dissent. There is a conflict in the authorities on the question whether the original bank is liable for the negligence of the subagents. Exchange National Bank of Pittsburgh v. Third National Bank of New York, 112 U. S. 276, 5 Sup. Ct. 141, 28 L. Ed. 722, was a case involving the collection of a draft in which it was held that the original bank was liable for the negligent act of the subagent. I quote:

> "The bank is not merely appointed an attorney, authorized to select other agents to collect the paper. Its undertaking is to do the thing, and not merely to procure it to be done. In such case, the bank is held to agree to answer for any default in the performance of its contract; and, whether the paper is to be collected in the place where the bank is situated, or at a distance, the contract is to use the proper means to collect the paper, and the bank, by employing subagents to perform a part of what it has contracted to do, becomes responsible to its customer. * * *
> "Whether a draft is payable in the place where the bank receiving it for collection is situated, or in another place, the holder is aware that the collection must be made by a competent agent. In either case there is an implied contract of the bank that the proper measures shall be used to collect the draft, and a right, on the part of its owner, to presume that proper agents will be employed, he having no knowledge of the agents. There is, therefor, no reason for liability or exemption from liability in the one case which does not apply to the other. And, while the rule of law is thus general, the liability of the bank may be varied by consent, or the bank may refuse to undertake the collection. It may agree to receive the paper only for transmission to its correspondent, and thus make a different contract, and become responsible only for good faith and due discretion in the choice of an agent. If this is not done, or there is no implied understanding to that effect, the same responsibility is assumed in the undertaking to collect foreign paper and in that to collect paper payable at home. On any other rule, no principle contractor would be liable for the default of his own agent, where from the nature of the business, it was evident he must employ subagents."

The foregoing states the rule which prevails in New York, New Jersey, and some 14 other states. 7 C. J. 606. In Massachusetts and certain other jurisdictions the contrary has been held.

Katcher v. American Express Co., 94 N. J. Law, 165, 109 Atl. 741, relied on in the majority opinion, did not involve the liability of a forwarding bank for the negligence of its subagent. That action was brought to recover $194.50, the equivalent of 1,000 rubles, paid by plaintiff to the defendant express company for remittance to one Tese Kaczur in Russia. The money was undelivered, and the question was whether plaintiff was entitled to his $194.50 or the value of the 1,000 rubles; the rate of exchange having meanwhile fallen. It was held by a divided court that by the terms of the contract the duty of the defendant was to send the money to the consignee by the usual course of the Russian mail and that delivery to the consignee was not agreed upon. An instruction was held proper wherein it was said:

> "If the defendant's Russian correspondent * * * purchased a money order for said 1,000 rubles at the Russian post office, inclosed the same in an envelope with postage prepaid, addressed to Tese Kaczur at the address given, this constituted a remittance of the money in the manner contemplated by the contract, whether or not Tese Kaczur ever received the money order."

But it was not there held that if the Russian correspondent negligently misdirected the envelope containing the money order the contract would have been fulfilled and the defendant not be liable, which in principle is held in the prevailing opinion in the case at bar.

Indig v. National City Bank, 80 N. Y. 100, cited as authority in Davis v. First National Bank of Fresno, 118 Cal. 600, 50 Pac. 666, is not authority on the question presented here. In that case the plaintiff in New York placed in the hands of the defendant bank for collection a note payable at the Bank of Lowville, of which the maker was a customer. Instead of sending the note to an agent for presentment, the defendant bank sent it directly to the Bank of Lowville. The latter sent its draft in payment, but subsequently failed, which resulted in nonpayment of the draft. It was held there was no negligence on the part of the defendant bank in the method of collecting the draft, inasmuch as it followed the custom approved in such cases. There was no question of subagency involved, as the note was presented directly to the Bank of Lowville. This was clearly pointed out in Briggs v. Central Nat. Bank of N. Y., 89 N. Y. 183, 42 Am. Rep. 285.

Dorchester Bank v. New England Bank, 1 Cush. 177, follows the Massachusetts rule.

In my opinion the rule laid down in Exchange National Bank of Pittsburgh v. Third National Bank of New York, supra, is more in consonance with justice and fair commercial dealing than the one followed in the majority opinion. It does not seem to me that the customer is afforded adequate protection unless the bank with which he dealt and in which he presumably had confidence should be responsible for the safe transmission of the money to the consignee. What the customer here undertook to bargain for was the payment of the money to his mother. Under the main opinion practically the only service rendered to him by the original bank was to select another bank to assume the responsibility. In this case the customer has lost his money, and his only remedy is to proceed against the subagent or the party who actually received it. The prevailing opinion lays stress on the use of the terms "remit" and "transmit," but in view of the nature of the service to be performed the technical language employed should not be given a controlling effect. A much larger question is involved.

No hardship will result if, in the absence of an express agreement, the original bank is held liable, for transferring money is a part of its business, and it can limit its liability by appropriate provisions in the contract. In the absence of such an agreement, it is not fair to hold the public to a refined understanding of banking customs. Davis v. First National Bank of Fresno, supra, and the later cases of Gonyer v. Williams, 168 Cal. 452, 143 Pac. 736, and San Francisco National Bank v. American National Bank of Los Angeles, 5 Cal. App. 408, 90 Pac. 558, to the extent they are at variance with the views herein expressed, should be disapproved. Particularly is this true of the latter case, which holds that (syl.)—

> "A reasonable custom of all the banks of a place that none of them shall be liable for commercial paper deposited with any one of them for collection elsewhere, until the proceeds thereof in actual money shall come to their possession, must be conclusively deemed known by the depositor, and to be binding upon him as an implied condition of the contract of agency, without reference to his knowledge or want of knowledge of the custom."

While evidence of the approved course of banking business might be relevant on the question whether a bank has been negligent, it should not be held that a group of banks could by agreement or custom alter their liability under the law of agency.

The judgment should be affirmed.

SEAWELL, J. I dissent. Under the facts as stated in the main opinion I am of the view that the defendant is liable for the failure of its subagent to carry out the trust which the initial bank accepted. There is a conflict of authority, as stated by Mr. Justice LAWLOR, on the question of the liability of initial banks. The United States Supreme Court, New York, and a number of other states, hold with the elementary principle of the law of contracts which is to the effect that the original principal may look to the original contractor with himself and is not obliged to look to inferior or distant undercontractors or subagents, when defaults occur injurious to his interests. See McGee on Banks and Banking (3d Ed.) 501. This doctrine is known as the New York rule. California, by the three decisions cited, Massachusetts, and other states, support the doctrine announced in the main opinion of this court, which is known as the Massachusetts rule. The California cases have to do with drafts sent from one bank to another for collection. So do practically all of the cases cited. The question here, in my judgment, involves a duty cast upon defendant to deliver money to a designated person in Italy. Certain words were stipulated into the case which brings it within the Massachusetts rule. I have no doubt but that the plaintiff understood that the defendant undertook to do the thing which he desired to have done, to wit, the delivery of $500 to his mother. There can be no doubt but that he felt secure in his transaction, otherwise he would not have sought the services of a bank. He could and doubtless would have assumed the risk himself if he had known the bank furnished him practically no protection.

The word "remit" in its primary sense means to send in return, as money in payment of goods. "Transmit" is to send through or across; to act as a medium of passage. The word "remit" as applied to the facts of the case at bar is not an apt term. But fine shades of meaning should not be resorted to in a transaction such as this. Plaintiff's purpose was simple and easily understood. It is very evident that he delivered his money to defendant with a sense of assurance that the bank was responsible to him for the delivery of the money which he desired to send. This is a natural, common sense view of a very simple transaction. There can be no doubt but that the business public generally, including a vast majority of those experienced in commercial transactions, hold the belief that when money is delivered to a bank to be sent by it to a person in a foreign country, as in this case, the initial bank accepts the trust with the understanding that should the money be lost or paid by a subagent to a person not entitled to receive it the initial bank is liable in the first instance to the principal. This is a reasonable rule and does not impute to the public a knowledge of the customs that may prevail in banking circles but which are actually unknown to the public. No hardship will fall to any one. Banks accepting moneys to be sent abroad will doubtless charge a fee or carriage charge commensurate with the risk assumed, if this is not already the practice. Surely a person would much prefer to pay a reasonable charge for the privilege of enjoying the protection which the law of agency supposedly affords than to be left to the dubious remedy of proceeding against an agency not of his choosing. A departure from the doctrine laid down in the three California cases, if the rule there adopted extends to this case, will not unsettle business conditions nor disturb vested rights.

Inasmuch as the question involves in a measure our relations and dealings with foreign countries, it would seem as a matter of policy and convenience that the several states should follow so far as possible the rule adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The judgment of the trial court, in my opinion, should be affirmed.

WINES v. GARRISON, County Auditor.
(S. F. 10513.)

1. Statutes 🔑174, 175—Construed in light of constitutional restrictions.

Every statute must be construed in the light of the constitutional restrictions on the power of the Legislature.

2. Officers 🔑100(1)—Appointment of additional deputies to be paid out of county treasury violative of constitutional inhibition against "increase of officer's salary."

The allowance of additional deputies, to be paid by the county, to an officer required by the provisions of Pol. Code, § 4290, to pay from his salary all deputies and assistants, is unconstitutional as increasing the salary of a county officer during his term of office, in violation of Const. art. 11, § 9.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Increase.]

3. Statutes 🔑102(2)—Requirement that additional deputies be paid by officer applicable to all counties.

Pol. Code, § 4290, providing that salaries and fees of officers shall be in full compensation for all services of officers, deputies, and assistants unless otherwise provided, and that all deputies and assistants shall be paid by their principals out of salaries provided in this title, unless in the title otherwise provided, applies not only to counties in which no deputies are paid by the county, but also to counties in which certain deputies are allowed by law to be paid from the county treasury, in such counties the principal being required to pay any deputies and assistants required in addition to those paid by the county; and as so construed the act is not violative of Const. art. 11, § 4, requiring uniformity of county government.

4. Officers 🔑100(1)—Appointment of additional deputies to be paid out of county treasury violative of constitutional inhibition against "increase of officer's salary."

Where the statute provides a fixed salary for an officer and fixed salaries for deputies, all assistants and deputies not specifically provided for by an award of compensation in the statute are to be paid by the officer himself, and to pay them from the county treasury would be an increase of compensation in violation of Const. art. 11, § 9, where such allowance is made during his term of office.

5. Counties 🔑74(6)—Right of deputies of officers to compensation statutory.

A person who accepts an office, the compensation of which is fixed by law, is bound to perform his duties for the compensation stipulated, and salaries and compensation of public officers must be kept within the statutory limits, and, unless the payment of deputies of county officers is expressly authorized from the county treasury, they cannot be so paid.

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandate by Charles L. Wines against E. F. Garrison, as Auditor of Alameda County, requiring him to audit demand of petitioner as deputy superintendent of schools. Writ denied.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Ezra W. Decoto and Frank Mitchell, Jr., both of Oakland, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. This is an original application for a writ of mandamus. Charles L. Wines, the petitioner, is a deputy in the office of the superintendent of schools of Alameda county. When the superintendent of schools began his term on January 6, 1919, he was allowed an assistant, a chief deputy, and an additional deputy, but in 1921 the Legislature allowed the superintendent of schools an additional deputy. The petitioner fills the position thus created for the first time by the Legislature of 1921. His petition, he says, "involves the right of the Legislature to increase the number of deputies allowed to a county officer, who at the commencement of his term has a fixed salary and deputies paid by the county."

This question was determined adversely to the contention of the petitioner in the recent case of Forward v. County of San Diego (Cal. App.) 209 Pac. 993. The decision was by the court in bank, and a petition for rehearing was denied, after due consideration. The petitioner seeks to have us overrule this decision, claiming that we have therein given an erroneous construction to section 4290 of the Political Code. He also contends that the matter is of very great importance to counties and county officers, and for that reason prays a careful reconsideration of the matter. We have therefore again considered the question which is presented by the petitioner. The respondent makes no argument and presents no brief.

We will not undertake to follow the argument of the petitioner in detail. Suffice it to say that the petitioner contends that the question involved here is not one of constitutional law, but primarily one of statutory interpretation, and that section 4290 of the Political Code, in the light of its legislative history, beginning with the enactment of the first County Government Act in 1883 (St. 1883, p. 299), down to date, shows that the provisions of section 4290, Political Code, do not apply to Alameda county, wherein the Legislature has provided for deputies to be paid directly from the county treasury. This legislation originally was in the form of a separate act known as the County Government Act, and in 1907 was for the first time incorporated in Political Code, §§ 4000 to 4235, inclusive (Stats. 1907, pp. 354–558). We will therefore use the expression "County Government Act" and "Political Code" indifferently throughout this opinion in referring to the provisions of the statute controlling the salaries of county officers. The first clause of section 4290, Political Code, reads as follows:

> "The salaries and fees provided in this title shall be in full compensation for all services of every kind and description rendered by the officers named in this title either as officers or ex officio officers, their deputies and assistants, unless in this title otherwise provided, and all deputies employed shall be paid by their principals out of the salaries provided in this title, unless in this title otherwise provided. * * *"

As we construed this section in Forward v. County of San Diego, supra, the phrase "unless in this title otherwise provided" referred to the provisions made for the payment of deputies in the County Government Act, and we held that, where assistants were appointed who were not specifically provided for in the County Government Act, they could not be paid from the county treasury, but must be paid by the officer, if paid at all. Consequently it followed under numerous prior decisions of this court that, where the Legislature relieved the officer of that necessity by making the salary of the deputy payable by the county, it to that extent ipso facto increased his salary.

The argument now advanced to support a different conclusion is substantially as follows: The phrase "unless in this title otherwise provided" in section 4290, Political Code, in the light of the history of the section, applies to those counties such as Alameda county, wherein provision is made for the payment of deputies by the county instead of by the county officers. Consequently it is urged that, where under the Code a county officer is allowed any deputy payable from the county treasury, in his case it is "otherwise provided" in the title, and consequently the requirement in the section that the officer must pay such deputy does not apply, and therefore the Legislature may provide for an additional deputy who may also be paid from the county treasury without increasing the compensation of the officer.

[1] It is true in one sense that this is a question of statutory construction, but it is also true that every statute must be construed in the light of the constitutional restrictions upon the power of the Legislature, so that it is necessary to consider those constitutional provisions in arriving at the proper interpretation of the statute. Petitioner's argument proceeds somewhat in this fashion. Section 164 of the County Government Act of 1883 (Stats. 1883, p. 361) provided as follows:

> "The salaries and fees provided for in this act shall be in full compensation for all services of every kind and description rendered by the officers therein named, their deputies, and assistants; and all deputies employed shall be paid by their principals, out of the salaries hereinbefore provided. * * *"

Section 163, subd. 15, of this act (page 339), in providing for salaries of the seventh class, provided that a limited number of deputies should be paid salaries from the county. It is pointed out that this provision in section 164 is inconsistent with the one providing for the payment of deputies by the county itself, and therefore the argument is that section 164 was intended to apply only to counties in which a lump sum was fixed as the salary of the officer, and not to counties where the county pays the deputies directly.

The petitioner's argument proceeds upon the theory that there are two classes of counties in the County Government Act, one in which the county officers are paid a lump sum, and the other in which the deputies are paid directly by the county, and presumptively the amount allowed to the county officer is for his own personal services. This position cannot be maintained under the previous decisions of this court. The County Government Act never has used the phrase "a lump sum," and this nomenclature was introduced into our legal literature in connection with the alleged unconstitutionality of the County Government Act in providing in some counties for deputies to be paid by the county and in others that all deputies should be paid by the principal, it being contended that this differentiation destroyed the uniformity of county government required by the Constitution. Tulare County v. May, 118 Cal. 303, 50 Pac. 427.

The question involved in the case at bar was decided against the petitioner, in principle, at least, in 1892, in the case of Dougherty v. Austin, 94 Cal. 601, 28 Pac. 834, 29 Pac. 1092, 16 L. R. A. 161.

Section 164 of the County Government Act of 1883 (Stats. 1883, p. 361) was renumbered as section 211 (Stats. 1885, p. 194), and was amended in 1887 (Stats. 1887, p. 207). By this amendment a proviso was inserted after the above-quoted language as follows:

> "And provided further, that whenever, in the opinion of the board of supervisors, the salary of any county officer in the third, fourth, fifth, twelfth, thirteenth, fifteenth, twentieth, twenty-second, twenty-third, twenty-fourth, twenty-sixth, twenty-ninth, thirty-second, thirty-third, thirty-fourth, thirty-sixth, thirty-seventh, thirty-eighth, thirty-ninth and forty-first classes, as fixed and provided in this act, is insufficient to pay a reasonable compensation for the services required to be performed, the said board shall allow such officer a deputy, or such number of deputies, as in their judgment may be required to do the business of such office, in connection with the principal, at a salary not to exceed one hundred dollars per month, to be paid at the times and in the manner that said principal is paid. * * *"

The effect of these provisions was considered in the case of Dougherty v. Austin, 94 Cal. 601, 28 Pac. 834, 29 Pac. 1092, 16 L. R. A. 161, decided in May, 1892. Upon the original hearing it was held that this provision of the law violated article 11, § 9, of the Constitution prohibiting an increase of salary during the term of office. Owing to the importance of the matter a rehearing was granted, the same was carefully considered, and the court reaffirmed its original conclusion. In the original opinion it was said (94 Cal. 611, 29 Pac. 1095, 16 L. R. A. 161):

> "The sum allowed to any given officer being a lump sum out of which he must pay for the services of all deputies and assistants necessary for the prompt and faithful discharge of all the duties of the office, it is evident that his own compensation consists of the residue remaining after payment of such deputies and assistants; and it is equally evident that just so far as the county assumes the payment of such deputies and assistants, such residue is enlarged and the compensation increased."

[2] It was thus early established that the allowance of additional deputies to be paid by the county to an officer who was receiving a lump sum under the County Government Act, and who was by the provisions of section 211 of the County Government Act required to pay all deputies and assistants from such salary, was unconstitutional because it increased the salary of the officer. This view has ever since been consistently adhered to by this court, and in the late case of County of Santa Barbara v. Janssens, 177 Cal. 114, 169 Pac. 1025, L. R. A. 1918C, 558, decided December 31, 1917, although the Legislature by enacting a new section of the Penal Code (section 1616, as added by St. 1911, p. 924, amended by St. 1917, p. 240) required the sheriff of every county to appoint a matron for the women's department of the county jail, it was held that the sheriff was required to pay such matron. Humiston v. Shaffer, 145 Cal. 195, 78 Pac. 651.

In Welsh v. Bramlet, 98 Cal. 219, 33 Pac. 66, it was held that an allowance of an assistant district attorney to the district attorney of Fresno county after his election to office was unconstitutional as being a violation of article 11, § 9, prohibiting an increase of salary to an officer during his term of office. It was also held that the provision of the statute authorizing the district attorney to appoint an assistant to be paid by Fresno county, when the district attorneys of other counties could not do so, was a violation of the constitutional provision requiring uniformity in county governments. The decision on this latter point was followed in Walser v. Austin, 104 Cal. 128, 37 Pac. 869 (decided September, 1894), and in Farnum v. Warner, 104 Cal. 677, 38 Pac. 421.

The serious consequences of these last three decisions resulted from the fact that, if the law was not uniform, the entire County Government Act, at least as to salaries, was void. Indeed, it was claimed to be void in Tulare County v. May, 118 Cal. 303, 50 Pac. 427 (decided September, 1897). The court there declined to follow and overruled the prior decisions in Welsh v. Bramlet, supra, and Walser v. Austin, supra, and also the decision in Farnum v. Warner, supra, to the effect that there were two systems provided for in the County Government Act for the payment of deputies, and that it was therefore void for lack of uniformity. The court there held that a scheme of county government by which in some counties or classes of counties the deputies were paid directly from the county treasury, where in others they were not so paid, was nevertheless a uniform system of county government, and for that reason did not violate the provisions of article 1, § 11, of article 4, § 25, subd. 28, of the Constitution, requiring such uniformity.

It is important to the point under consideration, however, to recognize the basis upon which the court overruled Welsh v. Bramlet, supra, Walser v. Austin, supra, Farnum v. Warner, supra, and held that the County Government Act with these two distinct systems of paying deputies was a uniform system, and complied with article 11, §§ 4 and 5, of the Constitution with reference to the duty of the Legislature in the establishment of county governments. In order to appreciate the force of this decision it will be necessary to quote from it extensively:

> "To allow county officers to appoint deputies whose fixed salaries are to be paid out of the county treasury is, of course, unobjectionable so far as the mere power to appoint deputies is concerned, for by section 61 (Stats. 1893, p. 367) these same officers are authorized to appoint as many deputies as a prompt discharge of the duties of their respective offices may require, and this general authorization embraces all of the special authority conferred by the clauses of section 173 above quoted. [Section 173 is the section fixing the compensation of officers in counties of the eleventh class and allowing certain deputies to be paid from the county treasury.] That is to say, these officers may, under section 61, appoint the same deputies that they are allowed to appoint under section 173, and they are not obliged under either section to appoint any more deputies than a prompt discharge of the duties of the office may require. These sections do not destroy the uniformity of the law, nor do they introduce any special regulation in counties of the eleventh class. So far as the power to appoint deputies is concerned the rule is general and uniform throughout the state, and that rule is that such county officers as are allowed to act by deputy may everywhere appoint as many deputies as a prompt discharge of their official duties demands. But this, as I am fully aware, does not meet the objection of appellant, which is that in this instance the officers are allowed to appoint deputies whose salaries are to be paid out of the county treasury. This objection would be more serious, it seems to me, if the law contemplated the payment of salaries of deputies from any other source. But it does not.

"There are two rules for the compensation of deputies in the different counties of the state. In most of the classes a lump sum is allowed to the principal, out of which he is required to pay his deputies; in a smaller number of classes—including the eleventh—the principal is allowed a fixed salary, and certain deputies are allowed fixed salaries, but in both cases the salaries of all are by the express terms of the statute to be paid out of the county treasury. The whole question, therefore, resolves itself into this: Can the Legislature establish one rule of compensation of deputies in one class of counties, and a different rule in another class of counties? I can see no constitutional objection to such an exercise of power. Under either rule a compensation proportionate to duties may be secured; and for the purpose of securing such compensation a division of counties into classes is expressly authorized, and, when a statute or a provision of a statute has no other object or effect than to regulate compensation of officers, the provision or statute is uniform and general if it applies equally to all the counties of any class, no matter which of the two rules above referred to is followed."

The argument of the court in sustaining the uniformity of the County Government Act is substantially this: In all counties all deputies are in effect paid from the county treasury. It does not destroy the uniformity of the County Government Act to pay some of these deputies directly from the county treasury, while in other counties the money passes through the hands of the officer to the deputy. It is obvious that this argument leads to the conclusion that in both counties additional deputies are to be paid by the officer from his own compensation. Otherwise we at once have the uniformity of the system destroyed because we have two different classes of counties; in one the Legislature may from time to time give additional deputies to the officers without violating the constitutional inhibition and without increase of compensation, while in others it cannot. We called attention to this situation in Forward v. County of San Diego, supra.

In San Francisco v. Broderick, 125 Cal. 188, 57 Pac. 887, the Supreme Court had under consideration the question of the payment of deputies by the county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco. It was contended that certain deputies appointed by the county clerk should be paid under the provisions of certain acts of the Legislature applicable to the county of San Francisco alone. In that case the court pointed out the fact that there are two plans or schemes provided in the County Government Act for the payment of the deputies. It cited section 216 (Stats. 1893, p. 507; Stats. 1897, p. 572), which corresponds to section 164 of the County Government Act of 1883, and section 211 of the amendments of 1897, and section 4290 of the Political Code. In answer to the contention that the county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco could appoint deputies whose salaries would be a charge upon the county government under the provisions of the act of 1880 (Stats. 1880, p. 5, and Stats. 1891, p. 5) the court said:

"The county clerk of the city and county of San Francisco by the act of February 13, 1880 (Stats. 1880, p. 5) is given a fixed salary, and is allowed a fixed number of deputies and assistants, whose compensation is a charge upon the treasury. He has the power under section 61 of the County Government Act to appoint additional deputies and assistants if the needs of his office so require, but in the present condition of the law the compensation of these extra assistants and deputies must be paid for by himself."

[3] As we understand this decision it holds that, notwithstanding the fact that the city and county of San Francisco was of a class in which the principal officer was allowed certain deputies, he was required under the provisions of section 216 of the County Government Act of 1893 to pay any additional deputies and assistants himself. This is a complete answer to the contention of the petitioner that section 216 or its successor (Pol. Code, § 4290) does not apply to counties of the class in which a county officer is allowed paid deputies. If in such counties the county officer was required to pay all deputies in addition to those provided by law, it follows that any statutory scheme by which he is relieved of that responsibility is to that extent an increase of his salary within the meaning of the Constitution. This squarely brings such counties within the rule announced in Welsh v. Bramlet, supra, and Dougherty v. Austin, supra.

[4] In County of Calaveras v. Poe, 167 Cal. 519, 140 Pac. 23, it was held to be the fixed and settled law of this state that the allowance of a deputy to an officer who had there-tofore received a gross sum to cover his compensation and the expenses of his office was a violation of the Constitution if made during his term of office, citing Dougherty v. Austin, supra; Humiston v. Shaffer, 145 Cal. 195, 78 Pac. 651; Elder v. Garey, 19 Cal. App. 776, 127 Pac. 826; Hanson v. Underhill, 12 Cal. App. 546, 107 Pac. 1016; Applestill v. Gary, 18 Cal. App. 387, 123 Pac. 228. This was the only point involved in the case, for in that instance the officer was allowed a gross sum. The court proceeded, however, to say:

> "Where the statute provides a fixed salary for an officer and fixed salaries for deputies, all payable out of the county treasury, a subsequent law increasing the compensation of the deputies or their number will take effect at once. Tulare County v. May, 118 Cal. 304, 50 Pac. 427; Newman v. Lester, 11 Cal. App. 577, 105 Pac. 785."

This statement was obiter dicta, and is not supported by Tulare County v. May, supra, and is clearly incorrect for the reasons we have hereinbefore stated, namely, that in every county all assistants and deputies not specifically provided for by an award of compensation in the statute are to be paid by the officer himself, and therefore to pay them from the county treasury would be an increase of compensation in violation of the Constitution where such allowance is made during his term of office.

[5] We have thus far dealt with the proposition advanced by the petitioner that section 4290 of the Political Code did not justify the conclusion that its language was applicable to counties in which deputies were provided and authorized to be paid directly from the treasury by the County Government Act. But other considerations lead to the same conclusion. In order that public funds may be expended it is essential that such expenditure be authorized by law. As was said by this court in Irwin v. County of Yuba, 119 Cal. 686, 690, 52 Pac. 35, 37:

> "* * * Whenever the courts have been appealed to in these cases, they have uniformly held to the only safe rule—that public officers and municipal boards must keep within the limits of their power as prescribed by law. * * * Nothing is better settled than that a person who accepts an office with compensation fixed by law is bound to perform the duties for the compensation. Mr. Dillon in his Municipal Corporations, § 233, speaking of this rule, says: 'The rule is of importance to the public. To allow changes and additions in the duties properly belonging or which may properly be attached to an office to lay the foundation for extra compensation, would soon introduce intolerable mischief. The rule, too, should be very rigidly enforced. The statutes of the Legislature and the ordinances of our municipal corporations seldom prescribe with much detail and particularly the duties annexed to public offices; and it requires but little ingenuity to run nice distinctions between what duties may, and what may not, be considered strictly official; and if these distinctions are much favored by the courts of justice it may lead to great abuse.' Again, the same author says (section 234): 'Not only has an officer, under such circumstances no legal claim for extra compensation, but a promise to pay him an extra fee or sum, beyond that fixed by law, is not binding, though he renders services and exercises a degree of diligence greater than could legally have been expected of him.' "

Hence, unless the statute expressly authorizes the payment of deputies from the county treasury they cannot be so paid. By section 59 of the County Government Act (1897), above quoted, and the corresponding section of the Political Code (section 4024), the officer has the authority to appoint as many deputies and assistants as may be necessary to enable him to perform the duties of his office. This would be the rule without any statutory authority. Taylor v. Brown, 4 Cal. 188, 60 Am. Dec. 604; Jobson v. Fennell, 35 Cal. 711. These deputies, however, cannot be paid from the public treasury unless some express provision is made for such payment.

If it is conceded, as it must be under the authorities above quoted, that to prevent the inevitable decrease of the officer's salary due to payments necessary to be made by such officer to a necessary deputy by authorizing the county to pay such deputy is an increase of the salary of the officer within the meaning of the constitutional inhibition against increasing the salary of an officer during his term of office, then it must follow that, without the express statutory declaration in section 4290 of the Political Code, requiring the officer to pay all additional deputies not otherwise provided for, a statute passed during his term of office authorizing the payment of such additional deputy from the county treasury is an increase of salary within the meaning of the constitutional provision, no matter whether the officer was originally paid a lump sum, or was, in addition to his own compensation, allowed a certain number of deputies paid by the county. If there is an error in this process of reasoning it arises from the conclusion long ago arrived at by this court that to prevent an inevitable decrease of salary is an increase of compensation within the meaning of the Constitution. This question has been too long settled in this state to justify its reconsideration.

The petition is denied.

NEW YORK LIFE INS. CO. v. BANK OF ITALY et al. (Civ. 4246.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 26, 1923. Rehearing Denied Feb. 23, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 26, 1923.)

1. Husband and wife 🔑249, 265—Insured's wife succeeds on his death to half proceeds of policy issued during marriage as against beneficiary designated without her consent; "gift of community property."

Where policy on husband's life payable to his estate and reserving right to change beneficiary was issued after his marriage and the premiums were paid from community funds, the policy was a community asset, and where insured shortly before his death, without his wife's knowledge or consent, substituted, as beneficiary in place of his estate, his brother, who paid no consideration for such substitution, the designation of the brother was a gift of the policy and its proceeds, and therefore, as respects the widow's share or one-half the policy proceeds, was invalid, under Civ. Code, § 172, restricting gifts of community property without wife's written consent.

On Petition for Rehearing.

2. Appeal and error 🔑843(2)—Insurer's right to make payment to beneficiary prior to notice of adverse claims not considered on appeal from judgment for one claimant as against another in interpleader proceedings by insurer.

On appeal from a judgment awarding half the proceeds of a life insurance policy to insured's wife on his death as against the designated beneficiary, in interpleader proceedings by insurer, which paid the proceeds into court, insurer's right to make payment to the beneficiary prior to any notice of adverse claims will not be considered, not being before the court nor affected by the decision.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by the New York Life Insurance Company against the Bank of Italy, as executor of the will of Charles J. Newman, deceased, Ella Newman and Layo Newman, to determine conflicting claims to the benefits of a life insurance policy. Judgment for defendant Ella Newman, and defendant Layo Newman appeals. Affirmed.

Theodore L. Breslauer, of San Francisco (Alfred F. Breslauer, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Sapiro & Levy, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This action is one to determine conflicting claims to the benefits of a life insurance policy. The facts giving rise to the controversy are as follows:

On the 11th day of July, 1905, the plaintiff, New York Life Insurance Company, issued a 20-year tontine endowment policy on the life of one Charles J. Newman. By its terms the policy was made payable to the estate of the insured, but it expressly provided that the beneficiary named therein might be changed upon application to the company. Accordingly, in the year 1907, this privilege was exercised by Newman, and Hattie Vogel, his sister, was substituted as beneficiary. Eight years later a change was again made, the beneficiary substituted on this occasion being one Jennie Lehman, who thereafter died. After her death, on September 24, 1920, the insured designated his brother, Layo Newman, as beneficiary, and shortly thereafter died, to wit, on December 11, 1920. One of the privileges provided for under the policy permitted loans to be had thereon, and the insured exercised this privilege on October 4, 1920, by borrowing the sum of $7,300 upon its security.

At the date the policy was issued the insured and the defendant Ella Newman were husband and wife, their marriage having occurred on the 25th day of August, 1891. At this time the husband was not possessed of any separate property, and the premiums upon the policy amounted to the sum of $527.80 annually, and they were paid entirely from community funds, and the total amount paid thereon aggregated $8,440.80. The wife, Ella Newman, never gave her consent to the designation of Layo Newman or the other beneficiaries preceding him, and in fact she knew nothing of the existence of the policy until after the death of her husband, and no consideration was paid by the brother, Layo, for his substitution as such beneficiary. At the date of the death of Charles J. Newman there was due and payable on the policy in excess of the loan to him the sum of $2,912. During the course of the administration of his estate the policy came into the possession of the executor, the Bank of Italy. Conflicting claims having been made upon the insurance company for the amount due under the policy it impleaded all the claimants in this action, and deposited the balance due, less certain expenses, into court, and the company was thereupon dismissed as a party, and the action thereafter proceeded upon the issues joined between the widow and the brother of the deceased.

It was claimed below on behalf of the widow that the designation of the brother as the beneficiary operated as a gift of the policy and its proceeds, and was therefore in violation of section 172 of the Civil Code, restricting gifts of community property without the written consent of the wife. The trial court concluded that, as to one-half of the proceeds of the policy, this contention was sound, and judgment went in favor of Ella Newman, the widow, for her portion thereof, and Layo Newman, the brother, appeals.

It is the contention of the appellant that there was no gift to him within the meaning of the law; that, the proceeds of the insurance policy not having become payable until the death of the insured, they never became community assets, but belonged to him as the beneficiary named in the policy. It is further claimed that, if the transaction partakes at all of the character of a gift of community funds, such gift is to be limited strictly to the amount of annual premiums for which the marital community had not already been reimbursed before the policy became payable.

It is conceded that appellant, Layo Newman, is entitled to one-half of the benefits of the policy, and that such amount is the sum of $1,399.25. The question thus presented involves the extent and nature of the wife's interest in the common property of the spouses. The community property system, which has been adopted in some of the southwestern and Pacific states, has suffered many changes, chiefly in the enlargement of the wife's power and her interest in the community assets, and the courts of the various states where the system prevails are widely apart in the conclusions reached as to the rights of the spouses in the various characters of gains accruing to the marital relation. According to the rule which prevails in Texas an insurance policy issued on the life of the husband, although the premiums are paid from the community estate, unless so paid with intent to defraud the wife, is considered his separate property. Martin v. McAllister, 94 Tex. 567, 63 S. W. 624, 56 L. R. A. 585. While the decisions of this state are not in complete harmony upon the subject, it must be conceded that the case last cited is declaratory of the rule accepted in that state. The statutes of Texas vest the husband with the absolute power of control of the common property. Hence there the rights of the wife are said to be passive, and the husband's active. His control is absolute unless tainted by fraud against the wife. He may sell, barter, or give it away.

In the state of Louisiana, where the community system also prevails, the same question has arisen, and it is there held that the proceeds or avails of insurance policies on the life of one of the spouses are either common property or separate property of the estate of the assured, depending upon whether such assured was married or single when the insurance contract was made, and not upon the marital status at the time of death. Succession of Budding, 108 La. 406, 32 South. 361; Succession of Le Blanc, 142 La. 27, 76 South. 223, L. R. A. 1917F, 1137; Succession of Veneuille, 120 La. 605, 45 South. 520. But in that state the community is entitled to have payments of premiums reimbursed from such separate estate (In re Moseman's Estate, 38 La. Ann. 219); and in so far as any restrictions are imposed on gifts by the husband, those restrictions apply to insurance policies the same as other classes of personal property. N. Y. Life Ins. Co. v. Neal, 114 La. 652, 38 South. 485.

[1] In our own state a husband's testamentary and dispository powers over the community property are limited and restricted. Under section 172 of the Civil Code, where a gift is made by him of such property without the written consent of the wife, the transaction is a nullity as to her. Accordingly, it has been held that, where a testator after marriage took out an insurance policy, on which he paid his premiums from his earnings, the insurance money was common property, to one-half of which the wife was entitled as survivor. In re Stans' Estate, Myr. Prob. 5. To the same effect is the case of In re Webb, Myr. Prob. 93, which lays down the doctrine that, where a decedent has paid the first third of the amount of premiums on the policy of insurance out of his earnings before marriage, and the remainder from those made subsequent thereto, one-third of the proceeds of the policy belong to his separate estate and the remainder to the common property.

Counsel for the appellant seeks to distinguish the rule established in these cases from the instant one upon the ground that in both of them the court was dealing with and concerned only with a situation where the beneficiaries were fixed at the time the policies were issued, it being said that in such a case the community estate, being the exclusive beneficiary, is clearly possessed of a chose in action, and therefore the proceeds of the policy are community property. We fail to see how or in what manner the fact that the insured had the right to change the beneficiary can possibly alter the character of the proceeds of the policy in question. It is true that, under a policy reserving to the assured the right to change the beneficiary, the interest of the designated person prior to the death of the insured is a mere expectancy in an inchoate or uncompleted gift, which is subject to revocation at the willl of the insured, and that the power of revocation which would defeat it might be exercised up to the moment of his death. When, therefore, the deceased substituted the different enumerated persons in the place of his estate as beneficiaries, he initiated a gift which, in the case of appellant, became complete by the death of the insured without revocation. And this is so notwithstanding that the premiums were paid from community funds. McEwen v. N. Y. Life, 23 Cal. App. 694, 139 Pac. 242; Shoudy v. Shoudy (Cal. App.) 203 Pac. 437. But this in no manner affects the wife's right to her share in this property. The chose in action represented by the policy belonged to the community because of the fact that community funds had been paid as the consideration for its acquisition. The insured owned the property as a community asset by reason of the fact that it was purchased with community funds. Respondent is not here claiming upon any right which she might have acquired through the act of the insured in making his estate the original beneficiary. Her rights are here predicated and bottomed upon the fact that the policy was a community asset of equal dignity with those of a tangible nature, and the quantum of the proceeds which the assured could bestow upon others in such a case was his half, and his half only. The question, therefore, as to what rights or what interests a beneficiary acquires in a policy of insurance prior to the death of an insured, and at what moment his expectancy ripens into a vested interest, is one with which we are not here concerned.

The appellant has cited us to the case of Shoudy v. Shoudy, supra, as being opposed to this contention. We do not so consider it; but on the contrary we are of the opinion that the doctrine there announced is in full harmony with the views herein expressed. In that case the divorced wife of the deceased was a former beneficiary under the terms of an insurance policy. Her claim was there based upon that fact. There was no proof that the premiums were paid from community funds or that the husband held the policy as a community asset. Her community rights had been settled and terminated by a divorce proceeding, and she relied for her claim solely upon her status as a former beneficiary under the policy. As above pointed out, respondent makes no such contention. On the contrary, she does contend that the policy was the property of her husband, that it was a community asset, and that as such she succeeded to one-half thereof upon his death, a right which the husband could not impair by any secret and gratuitous action on his part.

What we have said disposes of the contention that, in order to be classed as community property, the proceeds of the insurance must actually have become property of the spouses during their joint lives. The interest of the wife eo instanti ripened and was payable at the instant of the husband's death. Castle v. Castle (C. C. A.) 267 Fed. 521; Burdett v. Burdett, 26 Okl. 416, 109 Pac. 922, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 964; Walker v. Peters, 139 Mo. App. 681, 124 S. W. 35; Petty v. Wilson, 4 L. R. Ch. App. 574.

To recapitulate, the gift to appellant was incomplete and revocable up to the time of Charles Newman's death. At that time his rights as beneficiary became fixed, and at the same moment the community interest of the wife vested in her. So far, therefore, as the husband's interest was concerned, the gift was binding upon him to the extent thereof, but, the wife not having given her consent thereto in the manner indicated by the statute, the transaction as to her was a nullity.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

I concur: RICHARDS, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [2] Certain insurance companies, amici curiæ, have filed a petition for a rehearing, wherein it is conceded that, while the decision of the court is correct in so far as it concerns the rights of the parties before it, certain language used therein is susceptible of inferences which might create confusion in actions in which the rights of insurance companies as between themselves and their beneficiaries come in question. It is therefore suggested that the court should discuss the right of the insurer to make payment to the beneficiary, whatever other claims may be made, provided such payment is made prior to any notice of adverse claims. No such question was here involved, as the insurance company had impleaded the parties and paid the proceeds of the policy into court. Whatever our views might be on the subject, the expression thereof would be purely dicta and of no value. We are not disposed therefore, to comply with the request. Whatever questions other than the ones decided might possibly arise between the different parties to the contract of insurance, they were not before us, and are in no manner affected by the decision.

Rehearing denied.

(Supreme Court of California. April 5, 1923.)

1. Waters and water courses 🔑228—"Purposes of organization" of irrigation district for which indebtedness may be incurred.

In view of Gen. Laws, Act 1726, §§ 1, 2, as amended by St. 1919, pp. 714, 715, as to proposal of organization of irrigation district and petition therefor, and section 10, as to when organization shall be complete, no services prior to the filing of the petition, but only services from and including such filing to the filing of the return of the election, are services "for the purposes of organization," for which, under the exception in section 61, power is given the board of directors to incur a limited amount of indebtedness without compliance with financial provisions.

2. Waters and water courses 🔑228—Services before organization held for purposes of irrigation district act, relative to incurring indebtedness.

Services in securing options on necessary water rights, etc., prior to organization of an irrigation district, are "for the purposes of this act," for which by exception in Gen. Laws, Act 1726, § 61, power is given the board of directors to incur a limited amount of indebtedness without compliance with financial provisions.

3. Waters and water courses 🔑230(2)—Warrants issued by irrigation district board on a single demand, partly improper, wholly void.

Warrants for a lump sum issued by board of directors of an irrigation district based on a single demand, only a part of which they were authorized by Gen. Laws, Act 1726, § 61, to allow, are totally void.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑230(5)—Void warrants issued by irrigation district board, though in form negotiable, subject to defense in hands of purchaser.

Warrants issued by the board of directors of an irrigation district, and void because based on a single demand only part of which they were authorized by Gen. Laws, Act 1726, § 61, to allow, are subject to the defense of invalidity in the hands of a purchaser from the original holder; they, though negotiable in form, being issued by a statutory board as a convenient method of ordering payment from the district's treasury, and not being negotiable in the sense of the law merchant.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Bertin A. Weyl, Judge.

Action by W. E. Ser-Vis against the Victor Valley Irrigation District and others; Edward O. Weik intervening. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Charles J. Kelly, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

H. G. Redwine, G. A. McElroy, Roy V. Reppy, B. F. Woodard, and S. V. O. Prichard, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action brought by a landowner in the Victor Valley irrigation district to have canceled by decree of court certain warrants issued by the board of directors of said district, on the ground that the said board had no authority to issue the warrants, and that they are therefore void. Judgment went for the defendants and intervener, declaring that the warrants thus sought to be canceled were legal and valid and subsisting obligations of the district. From this judgment plaintiff appeals.

F. M. Walton, one of the defendants, had been employed by an unincorporated association to perform certain services looking to the organization of a regularly, legally constituted irrigation district. In his capacity as an officer and agent of the unincorporated association, covering a period of four years, he rendered services and made disbursements, which services and disbursements, it is claimed, come within the purview of the exception to section 61 of Act 1726, General Laws. Whether they do or not presents the question we are required to decide.

The section reads:

> "The board of directors or other officers of the district shall have no power to incur any debt or liability whatever, either by issuing bonds or otherwise, in excess of the express provisions of this act; and any debt or liability incurred in excess of such express provisions shall be and remain absolutely void, except that for the purposes of organization, or for any of the purposes of this act, the board of directors may, before the collection of the first assessment, incur indebtedness in such sum or sums as shall amount to two thousand dollars, or, if the district shall contain more than four thousand acres, to one-half as many dollars as there are acres of land in the district, and may cause warrants of the district to be issued therefor. * * *"

Before its amendment in the year 1891 (St. 1891, p. 147, § 8) this section did not contain the final provision as it now stands, commencing with the words "except that for the purposes of organization," etc., so that only such liabilities as were expressly provided for in the act could be incurred by the board of directors, and any liability incurred in excess of such provision was and remained absolutely void.

In construing this section of the act the Supreme Court, in Mitchell v. Patterson, 120 Cal. 286, 293, 52 Pac. 589, 591, said:

> "The amendment purports to save or except from the operation of the original act certain liabilities which by it were made void. The use of the word 'except' implies that; and the first specification thereunder, 'for the purposes of organization,' confirms the implication. * * *
> "The words immediately following, viz. 'or for any of the purposes of this act,' must be held also to relate to indebtedness which under the original section would have been void. * * *"

The case was submitted upon an agreed statement of facts. They are as follows: The defendant Victor Valley irrigation district was organized October 22, 1917, under Act 1726, General Laws of the State of California. Prior to the organization of the defendant irrigation district the various landowners within its boundaries formed an organization under the name Victor Valley Mutual Water Power District Association, an unincorporated organization, which had for its object the making of arrangements preparatory to the organization of an irrigation district whereby the land embraced in the Victor Valley irrigation district could be put under irrigation and cultivated. Of this former organization the defendant F. M. Walton was one of the active members and acted as the agent for all of those who belonged thereto, and for the period of four years, from October, 1913, to October, 1917, just preceding the organization of the defendant Victor Valley irrigation district, rendered certain services and expended certain sums of money on behalf of the original organization and its members.

On December 4, 1919, shortly after the organization of the defendant Victor Valley irrigation district, at a regular monthly meeting of its board of directors, the defendant F. M. Walton presented to the board of directors a detailed verbal statement of his expenditures made on behalf of the former organization, and also of a balance due him on account of his salary as agent of the former organization at the rate of $125 per month, the expenditures and services totaling a sum of $12,000, which was compromised between F. M. Walton and the board of directors, and warrants were issued in his name in the sum of $6,635. Of the warrants so issued, approximately $3,875 have been paid; the remainder, in the sum of approximately $3,375, are now outstanding and unpaid. Of the warrants so remaining unpaid $600 is still held by defendant F. M. Walton, and $1,500, represented by two warrants, is held by the intervener, Edwin O. Weik, having been indorsed to him by F. M. Walton for good and valuable consideration. The remaining unpaid warrants are held by persons not parties to this action. The district contains approximately 73,000 acres of land.

The expenditures were made and the services performed prior to the organization of the irrigation district, and the services and advances were rendered and made for the purpose of securing data and perfecting plans and arrangements whereby an irrigation system could be organized and perfected. During the period for which defendant Walton received salary he spent some four months in securing signatures to the petition necessary to be filed with the board of supervisors of the county of San Bernardino in order to propose and bring about the organization of said irrigation district. He also, a short time before the organization of the district, spent considerable time and effort in securing valuable options on water rights, reservoir sites, land, and other property, which options were taken in the name of a third person, and, as intended and arranged, they were subsequently transferred and conveyed to the Victor Valley irrigation district. The property covered by said options was indispensably necessary to enable such irrigation district to construct an irrigation system and to put the land embraced within the district under cultivation and irrigation.

The act under consideration contains various provisions for raising funds for the district—e. g., section 30 provides for the issuance of bonds to meet the expenses of construction of the irrigation works and for otherwise carrying out the provisions of the act; section 34 authorizes the levy of assessments to complete the construction of the irrigation works; and section 59 deals with special assessments. In order that the district may avail itself of any of these provisions, either a certain contingency must have arisen or certain prescribed steps must be followed, and the funds thus raised are destined to meet specified expenditures; they are "earmarked," to to speak, before they are collected by the district; and section 61, before the enactment of the amendment referred to, declared to be void any indebtedness incurred except under the conditions and in the manner prescribed by the various sections of the act dealing with the collection of funds. By the amendment the board of directors was given power to incur a limited amount of indebtedness without compliance with those provisions, such indebtedness to be either "for the purpose of organization" or "for any of the purposes of this act."

[1] Considering first the proposition of whether or not the services rendered and the expenditures incurred were for the purposes of organization, the warrants were issued for services and expenditures rendered and made by F. M. Walton as a promoter prior to the taking of any definite action looking to the immediate organization of the Victor Valley irrigation district. The language of the agreed statement of facts itself indicates that the services and advances were not, strictly speaking, rendered and made for the purposes of organization, for the stipulation speaks of the work as "preparatory to the organization of an irrigation district"; again, that "the services were prior to the organization of the present irrigation district." They were preorganization services.

Section 1 of Act 1726, as amended in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 714), provides that:

> "A majority in number of the holders of title or evidence of title to lands susceptible of irrigation from a common source and by the same system of works * * * may propose the organization of an irrigation district, under the provisions of this act."

Section 2 of the act, as amended in 1919 (page 715), provides that:

> "In order to propose the organization of an irrigation district, a petition signed by the requisite majority of holders of title or evidence of title to lands within the proposed district, or by at least five hundred petitioners, as provided in section one of this act, shall be presented to the board of supervisors of the county in which the lands within the proposed district, or the greater portion thereof, are situated. * * * The petition * * * must be accompanied with a good and sufficient undertaking, to be approved by the board of supervisors, in double the amount of the probable cost of organizing such district, conditioned that the sureties shall pay all of said costs in case said organization shall not be effected. * * *"

Section 10 provides when the organization shall be deemed complete. From the language of sections 1 and 2 it would appear that no services rendered prior to the time of the filing of the petition with the board of supervisors proposing the organization of the irrigation district could be deemed or considered services rendered for the purpose of organization as that phrase is employed in section 61 of the act. Any services rendered from and including the filing of the petition with the board of supervisors to the time of filing the return of the election as provided in section 10 would, we think, fall within the organization period. In the case of Biggart v. Lewis, 183 Cal. 660, 670, 192 Pac. 437, the court, in construing the act of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 785), providing for the formation, and so forth, of county irrigation districts, held that certain legal services rendered by an attorney at law in preliminary promotion work of the district, not being services for which the board of supervisors under the act was empowered to contract for and to pay, could not be made a legal charge against the district. There the court also, in construing certain language of the act, viz. "the cost of forming the district" (which, we take it, is synonymous with "the cost of organizing the district," 29 Cyc. 1527), held that it was intended to cover and control such costs "as would be necessarily and naturally incurred in putting in motion the procedure requisite for the formation of the district after the preliminary step of filing the petition has been taken."

As we have seen, section 2 in part requires that the petition for the formation of the district be accompanied by an undertaking in double the amount of the probable cost of the organization of the district, obligating the sureties thereon to pay such costs in case the formation of such district shall not be effected. If the proposed formation of the defendant district had been defeated at the election, and this action had been against the sureties on the bond, could it be said that the expenses of the attempted organization would embrace the outlay here sought to be recovered? We think not. Yet such a case and the instant case are alike in respect of what would constitute expenses of organization. Where the proposed formation or organization of an irrigation district is defeated at an election, the burden of the cost thereof is placed on the promoter through the medium of the required undertaking. Prior to the amendment of section 61 adding the exception, if the election of the proposed district carried, the promoter was still required to carry the burden of the cost of the formation or organization of the district; and the purpose of the amendment under discussion was doubtless to remedy this defect in the law and to enable the irrigation district to pay the cost of organization, which would be the same cost which the sureties would have to pay if the project was defeated, and would include, as we have seen, the costs incurred from and including the filing of the petition to the time when, after the canvass of the vote cast at the election, the board of supervisors shall declare the result thereof.

[2] We are of the opinion, however, that certain of the services enumerated in the stipulation of facts as having been rendered by Walton are of such a character as to bring them within the second of the two classes for which the board of directors could expend the funds of the district, or incur indebtedness, without prior compliance with the several financial provisions of the act touched upon, namely, an indebtedness created "for any of the purposes of this act." We refer to the services of Walton in "securing certain valuable options on water rights, reservoir sites, land, and other property * * * taken in the name of a third person, who was to hold and did hold the title until said irrigation district was organized, and then transferred and conveyed them to said district," said options having been secured for the express purpose of being afterwards conveyed to said district, and the property covered by said options and the water rights included therein being of such a nature that said irrigation district could not have secured water from any other source, and without which said district could not construct an irrigation system, and could not put the land in said district in cultivation or under irrigation. Clearly the acquisition of rights of this nature, so essential for the successful prosecution of an irrigation enterprise, comes within the purposes of the act.

[3] Had the warrants here in question been issued in payment of these services only, we would have no doubt as to their validity; but the statement of facts and the findings of the court plainly show that these services, although evidently very valuable, constituted but a small part of the claim of Walton, and no specific part of the sum allowed him was allocated to those services. A lump sum was allowed him as compensation for all his services and disbursements. The warrants, therefore, issued in his favor, being based upon a single demand of which a substantial part was beyond the power of the board of directors to allow, must be held to be totally void.

[4] The appellant also urges that the intervener, Weik, in acquiring one or more of the warrants in question, took them subject to the defense of their invalidity, notwithstanding that he was a purchaser for value.

The point is well taken. The warrants here in question, although negotiable in form, were issued by a statutory body as a convenient method of ordering payment of money from the treasury of the district, and in this respect are precisely like county warrants issued upon the order of a board of supervisors. As to such warrants this court, in the case of Dana v. San Francisco, 19 Cal. 486, in holding them not to be negotiable instruments in the sense of the law merchant, said:

> "We think that the plaintiff, counting alone upon the county scrip or warrants, as negotiable instruments, evidencing of themselves an indebtedness on the part of the county cannot maintain his pretension. This seems to be decided in the case of People v. Supervisors of Eldorado County, 11 Cal. 170. The reason is that the auditor had no authority to draw a bill of exchange, but he can only, in certain cases, issue warrants upon the order of the supervisors, or the allowance by the board of an account, which is chargeable as a debt upon the county. The warrant is not intended to constitute a new debt, or evidence of a new debt, against the county, but is the prescribed means the law has devised for drawing money from the county treasury. * * * The question here is, not whether the county had the power to make a bill of exchange, but whether the auditor, when, under the statute, he issues a warrant, has the power to give it the form and qualities of such an instrument. We think he has not, and that the paper, as here presented, has no such effect, if indeed it was so designed."

We conclude, therefore, that the warrants here in question were void either in the hands of the original holder or his transferee, and consequently that the plaintiff was entitled to the relief prayed for.

COLBURN et al. v. BURLINGAME.
(L. A. 7282.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑854(3)—Ruling on demurrer without reasons not reversed, if sustainable on any ground.

Where there is nothing in the order of the court sustaining the demurrer which indicates the ground of the court's action, its ruling will not be disturbed on appeal, if sustainable on any ground.

2. Wills 🔑600(1), 610(2)—Gift to wife to use and consume, with remainder to others, is not absolute gift to wife.

A gift to testator's wife of all his property, to use the whole or any part for her own individual benefit and support, followed by a gift over of the property remaining at the death of the wife, gives the wife only a life interest in the property, with power to use and consume for purposes indicated, and not an absolute gift, which she could dispose of by will.

3. Pleading 🔑8(3)—Allegations of complaint as to purposes of defendant held demurrable conclusions.

In an action against a wife, to whom testator had given his property for life, with power to use for her support and benefit, brought by the donors of the remainder of interest, allegations that defendant is threatening or intends to devote the property to uses other than those contemplated by the will, or is using it for purposes not contemplated by the will, state demurrable conclusions.

4. Wills 🔑730—Widow held entitled to use estate to support second husband.

Where testator gave his property to his wife for her life, with power to use the whole or any part thereof in any manner as might in her own judgment seem best for her own individual benefit and support, without any hindrance on the part of any person, the use of the property by her for the support of her second husband, who left his employment when he married her, is a use which she might properly determine to be for her benefit, within the discretion given her by the will.

5. Life estates 🔑6—Requiring security of life holder of personal property rests in court's discretion.

Where testator has given the life tenant possession of the funds, the matter of exacting security is discretionary with the court, and if the testator has not required such security, the court will not require it, unless it is shown there is danger of loss because of the irresponsibility of the life tenant, his removal beyond the jurisdiction, or some other cause.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Charles B. Colburn and others against Leora W. Burlingame. Judgment for defendant, after demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiffs elected not to amend, and plaintiffs Colburn appeal. Affirmed.

Flint & Mackay, and William A. Bowen, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Collier & Labarere, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This action was brought for the purpose of requiring defendant, Leora W. Burlingame, to render an account of property which had come into her possession under the will of her deceased husband; it being alleged in the complaint (indirectly, it is true) that her interest therein is a life estate limited to certain purposes, and that certain expenditures being made by her are not within those purposes. The relief asked also included an injunction to restrain said defendant permanently from selling, disposing of, or incumbering any of the corpus of said estate, which consists entirely of personal property, and a bond to protect the interest of the plaintiffs as remaindermen. A demurrer, both general and special, having been interposed to the complaint, it was sustained, without leave to amend; the plaintiffs declaring that they did not desire such leave. The plaintiffs other than Dora W. Macauley appeal from the judgment in favor of said defendant entered following such order.

It appears from the allegations of the complaint that the defendant is the widow of Leslie H. Colburn, having remarried since his decease, and the plaintiffs are his brothers and sister-in-law. Leslie H. Colburn was a resident of Pennsylvania and died in that state. He left a will, which was there admitted to probate, and in due course the entire estate was distributed to said defendant, without bond for the protection of the interest of any other person. The controversy between the parties arises upon the construction of certain provisions of this will, namely, the second and fourth paragraphs thereof, but principally the former. Said paragraph 2 reads as follows:

"I give, devise and bequeath to my beloved wife Leora I. Colburn the entire handling and control of any and all of my real estate and any and all my personal property of any and every name nature or kind—wheresoever situate—to have and to hold, occupy or use the whole or any part thereof in such manner as may in her judgment seem best for her own individual benefit and support without any hindrance on the part of any person or persons wholly confiding in and believing my beloved wife will not allow said property to depreciate or go to waste."

The third paragraph then gives the estate to the mother of the deceased and the mother of the defendant in the event of the latter's death. She, however, has survived them, which brings into operation the fourth paragraph of the will, which is as follows:

"It is my wish and will and I do so direct that in case of the decease of my mother Mrs. Eliza A. Colburn and the mother of my beloved wife Mrs. P. M. Westbrook and my beloved wife Leora I. Colburn shall yet be living, then and in such case I give, devise and bequeath any and all my real estate and any and all personal property of any and every name nature or kind wheresoever situate at the time of the decease of my beloved wife Leora I. Colburn. To my brothers then living and to my beloved wife's sister Mrs. Dora L. Nehrbass jointly and severally the remainder of my estate share and share alike."

As we have seen, the brothers so mentioned are the plaintiffs in the case.

[1] The appellants' first contention is that the will of the deceased, reading paragraphs 2 and 4 together, gives to the widow a life estate only, with remainder to the persons mentioned in said fourth paragraph, including themselves, and upon the distribution of the estate only such life estate was distributed to her, and their opening brief contains the statement that the demurrer to their complaint was sustained upon the ground that by said will the widow was bequeathed an absolute estate in all the property of the decedent, the result of which would be that their complaint failed to state a cause of action. There is nothing in the order of the court sustaining the demurrer which indicates that this was the ground of the court's action, and, of course, if sustainable upon any ground, it will not here be disturbed.

[2] The allegations of the complaint are very meager as to the terms of the decree of distribution; but it sufficiently appears therefrom that the interest distributed to the defendant was that directed by the decedent's last will and testament, reading together paragraphs 2 and 4 thereof hereinbefore set forth. That the provision made for the defendant by said will constituted a life estate, although with power to consume the principal of the estate, we have no doubt. By paragraph 2 the entire estate is given over to her to be used for her individual benefit and support, and at her death the remainder, that is, the part of the estate unconsumed by her, is, by paragraph 4, given to the testator's brothers and sister-in-law. The rule of construction here applicable is that stated in Hardy v. Mayhew, 158 Cal. 95, 110 Pac. 113, 139 Am. St. Rep. 73, where it is said:

> "It appears to be settled by the overwhelming weight of authority that the mere fact that the first taker is invested with the power to dispose of or consume the whole of the property for certain purposes does not invest him with the absolute ownership thereof and render the gift over void where taking the whole instrument together it is concluded that the intent was to give only an estate for life, with limited power of disposal or consumption."

And the rule thus announced was followed in Luscomb v. Fintzelberg, 162 Cal. 440, 123 Pac. 247. This is also the construction given to bequests and devises by the courts of Pennsylvania, where the will here under consideration was executed and the testator's estate distributed.

The case of Allen v. Hirlinger, 219 Pa. 56, 67 Atl. 907, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 458, 123 Am. St. Rep. 617, is quite similar in its facts to the present, and the questions here arising were there considered, and many of the cases cited in the briefs of appellants and respondent are there referred to. We cannot do better than quote from the opinion written by Mr. Chief Justice Mitchell:

> "The testator directed the payment of his debts and a small legacy to his daughter and then devised the residue of his estate to his wife for life or widowhood with permission to use and live therefrom and to have the full ownership, the same as he had himself during his life, and at her death whatever should remain to be given to his daughter. The class of wills to which this belongs present inherent difficulties in construction by their indication of an intent not accurately defined in the testator's own mind, if not of double and to some extent conflicting intents. The testator gives to the first taker the estate, or, what is practically the same thing, the power to consume the whole, and yet manifests his expectation at least, if not his intention, that it shall not all be consumed. These two purposes, manifestly present in his mind, but not accurately defined, and their possible conflict perhaps not perceived at all, at once raise the question, has the will limited the estate given, or has it attempted to deprive the estate given of some of its essential legal properties? The cases must be classified on this line of distinction. In Good v. Fichthorn, 144 Pa. 287, it was said: 'The true test of the effect of language apparently at variance with other parts of the devise, is whether the intent is to give a smaller estate than the meaning of the words of the gift standing alone would import, or to impose restraints upon the estate given. The former is always lawful and effective; the latter rarely, if ever; the first, because the testator's intention is the governing consideration in the construction and carrying out of a will; the second, because even a clear intention of the testator cannot be permitted to contravene the settled rules of law by depriving any estate of its essential legal attributes.' While similar language has been differently construed in different wills, yet the difference has been in the application, not in the guiding principle. The effort has uniformly been to discover the actual principal intent of the testator, and where that has been clear there is no case in which it has been departed from. * * * Taking up the present will in view of the foregoing principles it does not appear to leave any doubt as to the testator's actual and main intent. The words are:
> "'Third. All the balance, or whatever may remain then of my estate, real, personal and mixed, I give, devise and bequeath to my beloved wife Leora whom I desire to be the real owner thereof, and for her only proper use, benefit and behoof during her natural life, or so long as she remains my widow, with full permission to her to use and live therefrom as her necessities may require, and she to have the full ownership thereof, the same as I now have, and have had during my natural life.
> "'Fourth. When my beloved wife dies my will is whatever may then remain of my estate, real, personal or mixed, I desire that the same remaining portion, if any, be given to my beloved daughter Mary.'
> "The gift to the widow is of the estate, she to be 'the real owner thereof' and 'with full permission to her to use and live therefrom as her necessities may require.' And she is to have 'the full ownership thereof the same as I now have, and have had during my natural life.' It is plain that he meant her to have whatever her necessities should require, even to the extent of the entire estate, as he had himself undoubtedly had during his lifetime. * * * There was no limit put on her use. If she needed the whole, she was to have the whole. But it is plain that he did not think she would need the whole, and expected that there would be something left, and this residue, be it much or little, he gave to his daughter. * * * The appellant does not have a fee simple, for she could not make a valid devise of what may be left at her death as that would go under the testator's will to his daughter. But appellant has an unlimited power to consume and as said in the very analogous case of Kennedy v. P. & L. E. R. R. Co., 216 Pa. 575, the power to consume real estate necessarily includes the power to convey. Her deed therefore will convey a good title."

So, in the case at bar, the provisions of the fourth paragraph of the will, giving to the plaintiffs what is left of the estate upon the death of the defendant, make it quite clear that the testator intended to give to his wife only a life estate. It does not follow, however, that the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief here sought. As already noted, they seek to enjoin the defendant from disposing of the corpus of the estate, and that she shall be compelled to furnish a bond to protect their rights as remaindermen. The averments of the complaint upon which they ground this demand are the following:

> "IX. That plaintiffs and each of them are informed and believe, and therefore allege, that Merton S. Burlingame, husband of said defendant, shortly after his marriage to her in the year 1920, gave up his employment in Chicago and has not since been employed, and that since their marriage said Merton S. Burlingame and Leora W. Burlingame have been living together in Chicago and California, and that the said Merton S. Burlingame had and has no means of his own to support himself and/or his wife, and that during the period said Merton S. Burlingame gave up his employment and married said defendant, said defendant Leora W. Burlingame has and is contributing to the support and maintenance of said husband from the property of the said estate contrary to the last will and testament of Leslie H. Colburn, deceased, and to the detriment of the plaintiffs herein; that by so contributing to the support of her said husband, Merton S. Burlingame, said defendant is diverting the said life estate to a purpose other than that authorized and directed by the said will of Leslie H. Colburn, to the irreparable injury and damage of the remaindermen under said will, to wit, the plaintiffs herein."
> "XXI. That the plaintiffs are informed and believe that the defendant has threatened to, or intends to continue to divert the property of her life estate to uses other than those contemplated by the said will."
> "XXIII. That the defendant is selling off portions of said stock and using the same for purposes not contemplated by the will, and therefore is reducing the corpus of the life estate, to the irreparable injury and damage of the plaintiffs as remaindermen."

[3, 4] It is apparent that the last two paragraphs state demurrable conclusions of the pleader as to what uses or purposes are contemplated by the will, and that the point of the demurrer under this phase of it is directed to said paragraph IX, namely that the defendant is contributing to the support of her husband. It is the appellants' contention that she cannot lawfully use the property of the estate for this purpose, and it is based upon plaintiffs' construction of paragraph 2 of the will hereinbefore set out, as there is not elsewhere in said will (which is set out in hæc verba in the complaint) any restriction upon defendant's use of the property.

We are of the opinion that, in view of the very broad language in which the bequest to the defendant is couched, this contention is untenable. The life estate of the defendant is in the whole of the property of the estate—

> "to have and to hold or use the whole or any part thereof in such manner as may in her judgment seem best for her own individual benefit and support without any hindrance on the part of any person or persons, wholly confiding in and believing my beloved wife will not allow said property to depreciate or go to waste."

It is seen that the right of the defendant to use the property is not confined to that necessary for her support; she may use it for her benefit—a term much broader than support; and she is made the judge of what is for her benefit; and she is to exercise that judgment without any hindrance on the part of any person or persons—a plain warning to these plaintiffs to keep hands off. For the preservation of the property the testator wholly confides in his wife. The defendant, it appears, has remarried, and for a time lived with her husband in Chicago. Having ample means—the value of the estate amounting to some $90,000—the not unnatural desire arises in her to remove to California, or at least to live there during a part of the year. Should she leave her husband toiling and moiling in Chicago? Presumably she gave this question full consideration and concluded that it would be for her benefit that he should accompany her West. We can readily perceive that it might be much to her advantage that he should do so; and if in her opinion her life is made pleasanter or more to her liking by the freedom of her husband from the irksome demands of business, we perceive no reason why, under the wide discretion she enjoys as to what expenditures are for her benefit, the expense of their common life may not be included under this head.

[5] We can imagine expenditures which would be neither for her support nor benefit, the indulgence in which would give to the remaindermen a right to protection by appropriate legal remedy; but until the defendant uses the funds of the estate for a purpose much more remotely connected with her individual benefit than contributing to the support of her husband the plaintiffs must be content to leave the defendant in the undisturbed enjoyment of the estate bequeathed to her by the testator. As is said in 17 R. C. L. § 17, p. 627:

> "Where the testator has directed that the life tenant have possession of the funds, the matter of exacting security is regarded as discretionary with the court; and if the testator has not seen fit to require such security the court will not require it, unless it is shown that there is danger of loss either because of the irresponsibility of the life tenant, his removal of the estate beyond the jurisdiction of the court, or some similar reason, since the requirement of security might impose upon the life tenant a burden which he could not discharge and thus the intention of the testator would be defeated. * * * If the instrument by which the life estate is created gives the power to encroach upon the principal at discretion no security will be exacted."

The same principle is laid down in 14 A. L. R. 1070, and is followed in our own state, where, in the case of In re Garrity, 108 Cal. 471, 38 Pac. 630, it is stated as follows:

> "The rule [as to the giving of security by the life tenant to the remainderman] is one of equity, established by the courts for the protection of the remainderman, in the absence of any direction in the will; but the rule thus established must yield to the terms of the will, and if it appears from a proper construction of the will that it was the intention of the testator that the property should be placed in possession of the life tenant without security, such intention will be carried out."

It appearing from the complaint in this case, as we have seen, that the life estate given to the defendant is coupled with power to consume the whole thereof for the purposes indicated, that the expenditures being made by the defendant from the funds of the estate have not so far transgressed those purposes, and that the testator expressly directed that the estate should be placed in the control of the defendant without bond or security, the plaintiffs have not stated a case entitling them to the relief sought or any relief. The trial court, therefore, properly sustained the demurrer.

The judgment is affirmed.

RIDDLE et al. v. HILLHOUSE, City Clerk. (S. F. 10621.)

Municipal Corporations ⚷159(1)—Nominating petition for recall election must designate officer which each nominee seeks to succeed.

Under St. 1911 (Ex. Sess.) p. 128, for the recall of elective officers of incorporated cities and towns, a nominating petition under Pol. Code, § 1188, by which three petitioners were nominated for terms as city trustees expiring in 1924, and two for terms expiring in 1926, must designate the particular individual which each nominee seeks to succeed, in the event of the recall of the incumbent.

In Bank.

Petition by John S. Riddle and others for a writ of mandate prayed to be directed to John W. Hillhouse, as City Clerk of the City of Healdsburg, to require him to place names of petitioners on ballot for recall election. Writ denied.

W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, and A. W. Hollingsworth, of Healdsburg, for petitioners.

F. W. McConnell, of Healdsburg, and R. W. Harrison, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. The petitioners pray for a writ of mandamus to compel the respondent city clerk of the city of Healdsburg, to place their names upon the ballot to be printed for a recall election to be held on April 12th next.

The recall election is directed to the recall of all the incumbent city trustees, two of whom are filling terms which expire in 1926, and three of whom are filling terms which expire in 1924. The petitioners filed nominating petitions under section 1188 of the Political Code, by which three of the petitioners were nominated for terms expiring in 1924 and two for terms expiring in 1926, but there was no designation in the petition of the particular individual which each nominee sought to succeed. The respondent contends that it was essential to the nominating petition and to the preparation of the ballot that each nominee should designate the particular trustee that he expected to succeed in the event of the recall of the incumbent.

The question arises under a statute enacted at the extra session in 1912 (Stats. 1911, Ex. Sess. p. 128) for the recall of elective officers of incorporated cities and towns.

We think it clear that the position of the respondent must be sustained, for it clearly appears from the statute that each officer sought to be recalled is considered as holding an office independent of any other person who may also be sought to be recalled at the same election, and that it is this office that is to be filled by the successful candidate in the event that the incumbent is recalled. This is clearly manifest from the following quotation from section 1 of the act providing for the recall:

> "There shall be printed on the recall ballot, as to every officer whose recall is to be voted on thereat, the following question: 'Shall (name of person against whom the recall petition is filed) be recalled from the office of (title of the office)?' following which question shall be the words 'Yes' and 'No' on separate lines, with a blank space at the right of each, in which the voter shall indicate by stamping a cross (X) his vote for or against such recall. On such ballots, under each such question, there shall also be printed the names of those persons who have been nominated as candidates to succeed the person recalled, in case he shall be removed from office by said recall election; but no votes shall be counted for any candidate for said office unless the voter also voted on said question of the recall of the person sought to be recalled from said office. The name of the person against whom the petition is filed shall not appear on the ballot as a candidate for the office. If a majority of those voting on said question of the recall of any incumbent from office shall vote 'No,' said incumbent shall continue in said office. If a majority shall vote 'Yes,' said incumbent shall thereupon be deemed removed from such office, upon the qualification of his successor. The canvassers shall canvas all votes for candidates for said office and declare the result in like manner as in a regular election. If the vote at any such recall election shall recall the officer, then the candidate who has received the highest number of votes for the office shall be thereby declared elected for the remainder of the term. * * *"

The question here involved has not been heretofore decided by this court. In the case of Wilson v. Blake, 169 Cal. 449, 147 Pac. 129, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 205, a recall election was had involving two commissioners serving for different terms. It was held that the ballot should indicate for which term each candidate was a nominee. In Sturtevant v. Jordan, 183 Cal. 292, 191 Pac. 365, where two associate justices of Division 2 of the District Court of Appeal were to be elected, it was held that the ballot should be so printed—

> "that the ballot for the purposes of nomination and election should show the office of associate justice of division 2 of the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District as a single office, for which two persons are to be selected, with all candidates for the office appearing as candidates for that office, and not specially for either of the two associate justiceships to be filled at the election. * * *"

But it was also stated:

> "It should be noted that there is a plain distinction between the situation presented by this case and the situation where a vacancy in judicial office occurs and is filled by appointment to hold until the next general election, when the vacancy must be filled by the election of a justice or judge who shall hold the office 'for the remainder of the unexpired term.' In such a case, for all the purposes of election, every unexpired term is a separate and distinct office, to be separately designated on the ballot."

This latter observation would point to the conclusion that, where a nominee for office seeks an election for the unexpired term rendered vacant by recall of an incumbent, he is a candidate for that particular office. However that may be, we are satisfied from the language of the act of the Legislature providing for recall that the nominating petition must indicate the office sought to be filled.

Writ denied.

In re NEWHALL'S ESTATE. (S. F. 9654.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 4, 1923.)

1. Wills 🔑386—Finding on conflicting evidence that holographic will was written entirely by testatrix will not be disturbed on appeal.

A finding on conflicting evidence that a holographic will was written entirely by testatrix will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Wills 🔑166(5) — Evidence insufficient to prove that will was result of undue influence.

In contest by an older daughter of a will by the mother in favor of other daughters living with the mother, evidence held insufficient to support inference that the will was the result of undue influence.

3. Wills 🔑155(1)—"Undue influence" defined.

"Undue influence" is the exercise of acts or conduct by one person toward another by means of which the mind of the latter is subjected to the will of the person seeking to control it, and, as applied to a will, refers to the means and methods resorted to and employed by a person for the purpose of affecting and overcoming, and which ultimately does affect and overcome, the free and unrestrained will of the testator.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Undue Influence.]

4. Wills 🔑159—Opportunity and derogatory false statements insufficient to prove undue influence without showing domination of testatrix.

That two younger sisters, chief beneficiaries under the mother's will, had opportunity to influence and did make false derogatory and defamatory statements concerning contestant, was insufficient without showing that the mind of the testatrix at the time of making the will was subjected to and dominated by desires of such daughters to the point of undue influence so as to represent their wishes rather than the wish of the testatrix.

5. Wills 🔑155(1) — "Undue influence" and "fraud" are not identical as grounds of contest of will.

"Undue influence" is not always the equivalent of fraud, though often used interchangeably, but as grounds of contest of a will they are not as matter of law identical, and where fraud alone is relied on as ground of contest, the theory is that testator, though acting of his own free will, was deceived by false data into doing what he would not have done had he not been fraudulently imposed upon.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Fraud.]

6. Wills 🔑153—Fraud may invalidate will, though not amounting to undue influence.

False representations, though not used as pressure on the mind of testator as to constitute an element of undue influence, may yet constitute fraud sufficient to invalidate the will.

7. Wills 🔑153—Intent essential element of fraud invalidating will.

Intent is a necessary element of fraud inducing execution of a will.

8. Wills 🔑324(3)—Evidence of fraud inducing execution held sufficient for the jury.

Evidence of fraud inducing the execution of a will held sufficient for the jury.

9. Wills 🔑326—Rule requiring most favorable inferences from evidence on motion for nonsuit applies to will contest.

The rule that on motion for nonsuit every inference favorable to plaintiff's case deducible from the evidence, and every favorable presumption resulting fairly from the evidence, must be taken in favor of plaintiff's case, applies to contests of a will, and all the evidence in favor of contestant must be taken as true, and contradictory evidence disregarded, and, even if substantial evidence remains for contestant, the motion must be denied.

10. Wills ⚿166(12)—Evidence of fraud invalidating will must be largely circumstantial, and contestant need not prove every fact, but is entitled to legitimate inferences.

Proof of fraud invalidating a will must necessarily be largely or wholly circumstantial, and contestant is not required to prove every fact and conclusion of fact on which the issue depends, but legitimate and reasonable inferences may be drawn from every fact proved, and any inference fairly deducible is as much proved for the purpose of making out a prima facie case as if it had been directly proved.

11. Wills ⚿153—Evidence need not show that fraud was practiced at very time of making of will.

It is not necessary that there should be evidence that the fraud relied upon as invalidating the will was practiced at the very time of the making of the will, but, if belief in fraud previously practiced persisted at the execution, so that but for its persistence the will would not have been different, the fraud vitiates the will.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Proceedings for the probate of the will of Mary E. Newhall, deceased. From a decree finding in favor of the validity of the will, contestant Grace A. Ryder appeals. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

H. A. Blanchard, of San Jose, for appellant.

S. L. Strother, Everts & Ewing, Gallaher, Simpson & Hays, and A. M. Drew, all of Fresno, for respondents.

LENNON, J. This is an appeal taken by contestant from an order admitting to probate the will of Mary E. Newhall, deceased. The will, holographic in form, was attacked upon four grounds, viz.: (1) That it was not entirely written, dated, and signed by the testatrix; (2) that the testatrix at the time of the execution thereof was of unsound mind; (3) that the will was procured by the undue influence of two of the contestees, the younger daughters of the testatrix and the principal beneficiaries under the will; and (4) that the will was procured by false and fraudulent representations made to the testatrix by such beneficiaries.

The case was tried with a jury. After the presentation of contestant's case a nonsuit was granted upon the last three grounds of contest, which were accordingly withdrawn from the jury's consideration, and the trial thereupon proceeded upon the first ground of contest and ultimately resulted in a finding in favor of the validity of the will.

[1] It is at once apparent from a superficial examination of the will that certain words had been changed by writing over the original words, and that certain interlineations had been made therein. These changes and alterations did not, however, change the sense or meaning of the will. For instance, the date which, according to the testimony of two handwriting experts, had originally been written "August twenty fourth nineteen hundred and nineteen" had been changed to "nineteen hundred and eighteen." This was done by changing the letter "n" of the word "nineteen" as used the second time in the original writing of the date to an "e," and in the same writing and the same word the letter "n" into the letter "g" and also the letter "e" into the letter "h." There is the testimony of a handwriting expert called by the contestant to the effect that the changes and alterations in question were made by Belle McKiernan, daughter of the testatrix. There is also testimony to the contrary by a handwriting expert, testifying for contestees, to the effect that the said alterations and interlineations were in the handwriting of the testatrix and had been made by her while the ink was still wet and before the body of the will was signed by the testatrix. There is also the testimony of Belle McKiernan that she had made no changes in the will. It will thus be seen that we have a substantial conflict in the evidence bearing upon that phase of the case which concerns the first ground of contest, and that in that conflict there is to be found evidence which will suffice to support the verdict finding the will to have been entirely written, dated, and signed in the handwriting of the testatrix. And, of course, in keeping with the familiar rule concerning the conflict of evidence, the judgment in that behalf cannot be disturbed upon appeal.

There was some evidence offered and received for the purpose of showing that at the time of the execution of the will the testatrix was of unsound mind. A fair sample of the evidence adduced in this behalf is to be found in the testimony of witnesses to the effect that the testatrix on one occasion when two of her daughters were engaged in a heated altercation threw up her hands and declared that she "would go crazy," and that on another occasion she appeared at the pumphouse on her ranch in Tulare county in very scant attire. Upon the whole the evidence adduced in support of this phase of the case was not in our judgment sufficient to warrant the inference that the deceased was not of sound mind at the time of the making of the will, and, therefore the motion for a nonsuit, in so far as it was grounded upon the alleged unsoundness of mind of the testatrix, was properly granted.

The facts of the contestant's case bearing upon the issues of fraud and undue influence, substantially stated, are these:

The decedent died in Fresno, January 15, 1920, at about the age of 80 years. She had been twice married, and left as her heirs four daughters, Grace A. Ryder, contestant herein, and Bessie Hawley, children of her first marriage, and Georgie Dunn and Belle McKiernan, children of her second marriage. A son, Carl Newhall, had predeceased her in August, 1911.

By the terms of the will made by decedent about two years prior to her death the contestant, Grace Ryder, was left the sum of $5. Bessie Hawley and her daughter, Marion Hawley Martin, were left all of the real property of deceased in Santa Clara county, in Capitola, Santa Cruz county, and in Monterey county. The residue of the property was left to the two younger daughters, Belle McKiernan and Georgie Dunn, in equal shares. The entire estate was valued at about $175,000. Due to the fact that after the making of the will and before her death the decedent had sold the most valuable portion of her estate in Santa Clara county and also the house and furniture at Carmel, in the county of Monterey, the estate left to Bessie Hawley was materially diminished, and as a consequence the two younger daughters take, by the terms of the will, the bulk of the estate. A part of the residue consisted of a valuable orange grove near Exeter, Tulare county, Cal., valued at $90,000.

The testatrix had, at one time, lived with her first husband near San Jose. Her two older daughters, Bessie Hawley and Grace Ryder, both of whom had married, continued to reside in that part of the state. The mother subsequently moved to Fresno county, where the two younger daughters, Georgie Dunn and Belle McKiernan, although married, lived much of the time with her. Her son, Carl Newhall, to whom she had given a parcel of real estate in Santa Clara valley, continued to live near contestant. There had always been more or less friction between the children of the two marriages, but prior to 1911 there are no indications that it influenced the mother. Many circumstances, including letters written to contestant and to Marion Hawley, daughter of Bessie Hawley, at that time show a friendly relation existing between the mother and her two older daughters.

In 1911 a proceeding was instituted by Bessie Hawley in the superior court of Fresno county for the appointment of a guardian for Mrs. Newhall upon the ground, as alleged in her petition, that Mrs. Newhall was incompetent to manage and take care of her property. This, of course, aroused the resentment of Mrs. Newhall toward Bessie Hawley. And in a will made in April of that year Mrs. Newhall left to Bessie Hawley only the house in Capitola. The testatrix at this time was, however, friendly with Mrs. Ryder, and provided in the same will that all of the property, with the exception of the house in Capitola, should be divided equally among the remaining four children, Grace Ryder, Georgie Dunn, Belle McKiernan, and Carl Newhall. In a letter written to Grace Ryder about the 1st of July, 1911, Mrs. Newhall said that she expected Mrs. Ryder to help her in the guardianship proceedings.

Mrs. Ryder came to Exeter in July to consult with her mother in regard to the guardianship matter, bringing her attorney with her. It was at this time that several of the statements claimed by contestant to be false and to have influenced the mother in the making of the will were made by her two half-sisters. One of the statements made by Mrs. McKiernan was that Mrs. Ryder was the real instigator of the guardianship proceedings, that Mrs. Ryder was responsible for the whole affair, and that she only cared for her mother for what she could get out of her, and that she was after her property. Mrs. Newhall believed this statement. She told a Mr. Dreisbach, the foreman of her ranch, "more than once" that, although Mrs. Hawley had actually instituted the proceeding to have her declared incompetent, still no one could make her believe that Mrs. Ryder had not instigated those proceedings. It was on this same visit that Mrs. McKiernan told her mother that Mrs. Ryder was an immoral woman, that she was no good, and that she was not decent. The falsity of these statements, as pleaded by contestant, are admitted by a failure of contestees to deny their falsity in any of their pleadings. The denials in this behalf are limited to a denial of the mere making of the statements. There was direct testimony to the effect that the statements in question were false.

In August, 1911, Carl Newhall died, and it was found that he had by will devised and bequeathed all of his property, including the real estate which had originally been given to him in Santa Clara valley, to his half-sister Grace Ryder. This greatly offended the testatrix, who had evidently expected to receive the property back in the event of her son's death. She instituted a contest of his will in the superior court of Santa Clara county, claiming that Grace Ryder had procured the making of this will by her half-brother by persistent importunities and threats. During the course of the trial at which Mrs. Newhall was present attended by her two younger daughters, Georgie Dunn and Belle McKiernan, many charges against the character of Mrs. Ryder were publicly made and attempted to be proved. The jury, however, found against Mrs. Newhall, contestant therein, and brought in a verdict in favor of the validity of the will. From that time the relations between Mrs. Newhall and Mrs. Ryder were strained, and Mrs. Ryder never thereafter saw her mother to talk to her.

On November 11, 1911, after Carl's death, Mrs. Newhall executed a new will revoking all former wills and leaving all of her property, with the exception of the house in Capitola which she left to Bessie Hawley, to her two younger daughters, Georgie Dunn and Belle McKiernan, share and share alike.

In the fall of 1911 or the spring of 1912 Mr. Mackey, a constable, drove Mrs. Hawley and her daughter, Marion, out to the ranch. Before he left town Mrs. McKiernan called him up on the phone and told him that, if her sister wanted to come out to dissuade her from doing so, that she didn't want her there, and that she would not have her there. When Mrs. Hawley arrived at the ranch, Mrs. McKiernan would not allow her and her daughter to come in, notwithstanding the fact that it was a cold, foggy night; and the further fact that Mrs. Hawley's daughter, Marion, who accompanied her, was ill. Mr. Mackey went into the house and found there Mrs. Newhall, Mrs. McKiernan, and a man by the name of Poe. Beside the door was a rifle, and when he asked Mrs. McKiernan what it was for she replied, "I intended to use it if she forced her way in." The testimony of Mr. Mackey, although denied by Mrs. McKiernan on the witness stand, was corroborated by the testimony of Mr. Poe, who also testified that he had heard Mrs. McKiernan say that, if Mrs. Ryder bothered her, "she had a gun."

In 1912 Mrs. Ryder went out to the ranch to see her mother. Her two younger sisters were there, but refused to call their mother, who was out in the orchard, and one of them carried her lunch to her mother so that it would not be necessary for her to come in while Mrs. Ryder was there.

In 1919 Mrs. Ryder wrote to her mother, suggesting that she would like to come to Exeter to visit her. She received a letter from her mother forbidding her to come and saying:

> "I should think you would be ashamed to come to me with your trouble after the shameful way you have been living. Don't for one minute think I don't know how you have been conducting yourself."

There was some evidence that the will in controversy was drafted and signed by Mrs. Newhall while alone on her ranch with her daughter, Belle McKiernan. Thus the testimony of both handwriting experts was to the effect that the will had originally been dated, "Exeter, California, August twenty-fourth nineteen hundred and nineteen," and subsequently altered to "August twenty-fourth nineteen hundred and eighteen." And the testimony of the ranch foreman was to the effect that the only time that Mrs. Newhall was out at the ranch at Exeter after April, 1919, was one Sunday in the summer of 1919 when she came out with her daughter Belle McKiernan and a Mr. Sparkman, who was named as executor of this will. Mr. Sparkman remained with the testatrix but a short time, but Mrs. Newhall remained until the next day at the ranch with her daughter Belle McKiernan. Judge Church, as a witness for the contestant, testified that prior to 1919 Mrs. Newhall did not know that a will could be made holographic in form. All of her previous wills had been attested wills. Some time in the early part of 1919 Judge Church explained to her the requisites of a holographic will. There is also testimony that in February, 1919, she was worried about two previous wills which were in the custody of Mr. Cook, an attorney at Fresno, notwithstanding the fact that there would have been no reason for her worry had the will in controversy been already executed, inasmuch as it expressly revoked all wills formerly executed.

[2-4] The evidence above narrated will not suffice, in our opinion, to warrant and support the inference that the testatrix was induced to make the will in question as the result of the undue influence of the chief beneficiaries named therein. Undue influence is defined to be the exercise of acts or conduct by one person toward another person by means of which the mind of the latter is subjected to the will of the person seeking to control it. As applied to a ground of contest of the will of a decedent undue influence has reference to the means and methods resorted to and employed by a person for the purpose of affecting and overcoming and which ultimately do affect and overcome the free and unrestrained will of a testator. Estate of Snowball, 157 Cal. 301, 107 Pac. 598; Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 467, 117 Pac. 539. As we read and understand the evidence relating to the issue of undue influence, it does no more than show that the two younger sisters had the opportunity to make and did make to their mother, the testatrix, false, derogatory, and defamatory statements concerning the contestant. But there is no showing in addition that the mind of the testatrix, at the time of the making of the will, was subjugated to and dominated by the desires and designs of the contestees to the point of undue influence. That is to say, there is no showing of any restraint by the two contestees upon the mind of the testatrix which resulted in making the will, as executed, represent the wishes of the contestees, who were the principal beneficiaries, rather than the wish and will of the testatrix.

[5] Undue influence is not always the equivalent of fraud. One may exist without the presence of the other. The former, however, may at times be exerted and applied through the medium of fraud. Oftentimes the terms "undue influence" and "fraud" are used interchangeably. Thus it has been held that undue influence, even though exercised without the aid of actual fraud or fraudulent representations, is a form of fraud. Estate of Ricks, supra. It has also been held that undue influence may be exerted no less by fraudulent misrepresentations than by means of duress or other pressure. Estate of Snowball, supra. Undue influence and fraud as a ground of contest are not, as a matter of law, identical. Theoretically they constitute two separate and distinct grounds of contest. In cases where fraud alone is relied upon as a ground of contest, it is the theory of the law that the testator, even though acting, in a manner of speaking, of his own free will, was nevertheless deceived by false data into doing that which he would not have done had he not been fraudulently imposed upon.

[6] It is the general rule that for false and fraudulent representations to enter as an element into undue influence it is necessary that the misrepresentations be shown to have been intermingled with or made the basis of importunities and mental pressure upon the testator. On the other hand, such false representations, even in the absence of proof that they were used as pressure upon the mind of the testator, have been held to constitute fraud if it can be shown that they were designed to and did deceive the testator into making a will different in its terms from that which he would have made had he not been misled. Estate of Benton, 131 Cal. 472, 478, 63 Pac. 775.

[7] There is some language in the Estate of Ricks, supra, which, when segregated from the text of the opinion, seemingly states the rule in effect to be that such false representations may be relied upon as a ground of contest even though they may not have been made with the intent and purpose of affecting a testamentary disposition. That language is not to be taken as a correct statement of the rule. The question of the procurement by fraud of a will was not involved in that case. The issue presented there was solely one of undue influence and the court, in employing the language referred to, did so merely by way of discussion and for the purpose of emphasizing the distinguishing features which are recognized as existing between undue influence and the inducements of false representations. Obviously the same conditions must exist for the creation and consummation of a fraud in the procurement of a will as must be shown in cases where fraud is relied upon to vitiate an ordinary contract. Estate of Kohler, 79 Cal. 313, 21 Pac. 758. One of the necessary elements is an intent to deceive the decedent or an intent to induce decedent to execute his will. Estate of Benton, supra.

[8] While the evidence was not sufficient to support the inference of undue influence as above defined, there was, however, in our opinion, sufficient evidence to warrant and require the submission to the jury of the issue presented by the pleadings as to whether or not the testatrix was fraudulently induced and impelled practically to disinherit her daughter, the contestant herein, by reason of the false statements made to the testatrix by the two contestees concerning the character and conduct of the contestant.

[9] It is, of course, the general and well-understood rule that ordinarily upon a motion for a nonsuit, in civil cases generally, every inference favorable to plaintiff's case deducible from the evidence and every favorable presumption resulting fairly from the evidence must be taken in favor of plaintiff's case. This rule applies with equal force to cases of contests of wills. Of course, if the evidence is fairly susceptible of two constructions, or if several inferences may reasonably be made from the evidence as a whole, it goes without saying that the view most favorable to the contestant must be taken. And, further, all of the evidence in favor of the contestant must, as against a motion for a nonsuit, be taken as true, and contradictory evidence, if any, must be disregarded. This having been done, if there is any substantial evidence tending to prove the fact necessary to make out the contestant's case, the motion for a nonsuit must be denied and the case given to the jury. Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 Pac. 252; In re Ross, 173 Cal. 178, 159 Pac. 603; In re Carson, 184 Cal. 437, 194 Pac. 5, 17 A. L. R. 239; Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 450, 117 Pac. 532.

From the circumstances shown in evidence it is apparent that the jury might rightfully have found that there was a constant effort on the part of the two younger sisters to prejudice and influence their mother against the two older sisters and particularly against the contestant herein. There is no question but that intense bitterness and hostility existed between contestant herein and her two younger sisters, and that the latter, living as they did with their mother, had ample opportunity to discredit the older sister in the eyes of the mother. There is also direct evidence that disparaging and false statements were made to the mother concerning the contestant by the younger sisters, which must, undoubtedly, have had an influence in creating and keeping alive the bitterness of the mother against the contestants.

There is no doubt but that the mother deeply resented the institution of the guardianship proceedings. If there could be any doubt of this, it is dispelled by the fact that shortly after the institution of the proceedings she made a will in which she left Bessie Hawley only the house in Capitola, dividing the remainder of her estate among her other children. When, therefore, she was told that Grace Ryder was the real instigator of the guardianship proceedings, the resentment which theretofore had been directed only toward Bessie Hawley was transferred to Grace Ryder. The testimony of Mr. Dreisbach, foreman of Mrs. Newhall's ranch, shows that Mrs. Newhall believed the statement that Grace Ryder was responsible for the institution of the guardianship proceedings, and that this belief was persisted in by her.

It is inconceivable that the statements made to the mother that the contestant, Grace Ryder, "was an immoral woman, that she was no good, and that she was not decent," did not adversely affect the feelings of the mother toward her daughter. Indeed, that it did lessen the regard and affection of the mother for her daughter is evidenced by the letter written by the testatrix in answer to a letter from Mrs. Ryder, the contestant, suggesting that the latter visit the testatrix at Exeter, wherein the testatrix objected to the proposed visit of the contestant, basing her objection, in effect, upon the ground that the contestant should be ashamed to come there after the shameful way in which she had been living. This letter, written, as it was, in August, 1919, also demonstrates that a belief in the disparaging statements and their damaging implications as to the character and conduct of her daughter continued and persisted in the mind of the mother.

These circumstances would have warranted a finding by the jury that the whole atmosphere surrounding the mother was poisoned with hatred, hostility, and ill will toward the two older daughters. In this atmosphere the will in contest was made practically disinheriting the contestant herein. Ordinarily in any given case the question of whether or not false and fraudulent statements operated upon the mind of the testatrix in the execution of the will is primarily a question for the jury.

[10] If, from the evidence offered in support of contestant's case, the inference can fairly be drawn that the intent behind the making of the false representations was to influence the execution of the will, and that the will was a result of such false representations and but for such representations would not have been so drafted, then the prima facie case necessary to take the case to the jury has been established. From the very nature of the inquiry the proof must necessarily be largely or wholly circumstantial. The contestant is not required to prove every fact and every conclusion of fact upon which the issue depends. Legitimate and reasonable inferences may be drawn from every fact proved, and any inference fairly deducible from the evidence is as much proved for the purpose of making out a prima facie case as if it had been directly proved. The contestant is not confined to the bare facts, but is entitled to the benefit of all inferences which may legitimately be drawn from the facts established.

While, of course, the statements made by the younger sisters may be explainable solely upon the hypothesis of their animosity and hatred toward their older sister, yet the undisputed existence of this very hostility furnishes ground for the inference that the intention of the sisters was that, by reason of the statements and the belief engendered in the mother's mind therefrom, their mother should execute a will benefiting them and at the same time injuring their sister.

The successful efforts of the two younger sisters to prevent the other sisters from seeing their mother may well have been with the purpose of thwarting any attempt on the part of the older sisters to refute the charges and accusations made against them and to prevent a reconciliation being effected between the sisters and their mother. These efforts would have a tendency to show an endeavor on the part of the two younger sisters to perpetuate the estrangement and to show the intent with which it was done. They would also have the tendency to show that the will was the result of the false representations made by showing that after the representations were made no opportunity was afforded contestant to demonstrate their falsity.

[11] This being a question of fraud, it is not necessary that there should be evidence that the fraud relied upon was practiced at the very time of the making of the will. If the belief in the fraud previously practiced, even though occurring long prior thereto, persisted at the time of the execution of the will, so that but for the persistence of such belief the will would have been different from that actually executed, the fraud vitiates the will. Estate of Benton, 131 Cal. 472, 479, 63 Pac. 775. Of course, if the testatrix at the time of the making of the will no longer believed the false representations, there is no question of fraud. Whether or not the belief persisted is provable not only by direct evidence if available, but also by circumstantial evidence. Although in the instant case the direct testimony is to the effect that the false statements of which contestant is cognizant were made some time in 1911 and 1912, and the will was not made until 1918 or 1919, there is the testimony of Mr. Dreisbach, who became Mrs. Newhall's foreman in 1917, that he had heard her say that Mrs. Ryder was responsible for the institution of the guardianship proceedings, that nothing would ever make her believe differently, and that she had said this more than once. Certainly this is evidence that the belief of testatrix in the accusation that Mrs. Ryder was the real instigator of the proceedings persisted long after they were made. There is also in the letter written by Mrs. Newhall to Mrs. Ryder on August 18, 1919, evidence that the mother still entertained the belief that the conduct of her daughter was questionable. This is sufficient, we think, to support the inference that the belief continuing for such a length of time still persisted in the mind of the testatrix at the time of the making of her will.

It is possible that upon the trial of the case the jury may find that it was the bitterness engendered by the contest of the will of Carl Newhall which was the cause for the disinheritance of her daughter by the testatrix, and that it was the mother who took the initiative against the contestant. On the other hand, taking as true, as we must, the evidence in the light most favorable to contestant, there is evidence to support the conclusion that the disinheritance was the result of false and fraudulent representations made by the two younger sisters concerning contestant. It was therefore for the jury to say whether the contest of Carl's will caused the disinheritance of the contestant or whether it was due primarily to the representations which, it was claimed, were fraudulently made concerning the contestant. It follows that the motion for a nonsuit, in so far as it related to the issue of fraud, should have been denied.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

Frank Vacarella and others were convicted of murder in the first degree, and they appeal. Affirmed.

J. B. Peckham, of San Jose, Geo. W. Smith, of Santa Cruz, and V. A. Scheller and Chas. M. Cassin, both of San Jose, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

RICHARDS, J. The appellants were tried for the murder of one Lam Gee, also known as Ah Lum, the trial resulting in a conviction of murder in the first degree, with a recommendation of life imprisonment. From said conviction defendants appeal.

[1] At the time of the homicide there was a tong war betwen two Chinese tongs, known as the Hip Sing Tong and the Bing Kong Tong. The Hip Sing Tong was numerically superior in San Jose and the Bing Kong Tong was numerically superior in Watsonville. The strength of the rival tong was such that the members of the Bing Kong Tong left San Jose and the members of the Hip Sing Tong left Watsonville. This was the situation in the latter part of February, 1922, Chinatown in each city being akin to an armed camp. In San Jose it developed that 22 or 23 guards were on duty to protect the members of its tong. The defendant Munoz had been a guard, and the brother of Vacarella was also employed as a guard in San Jose. It required guns and ammunition to equip these men, who acted as watchmen, day and night, and a great quantity of these guns and ammunition was supplied by Hommrich's gun store of San Jose. A record was kept of the number of the various firearms and also the quantity and size of cartridges furnished. Among the firearms sold on February 15, 1922, was a Police Positive Special, No. 243,458, Colt revolver, the money for the purchase of which, as also for all the other arms and ammunition obtained on that date, was guaranteed by one Jew Chuck, known also as Sam Kee, one of the appellants, and who was one of the principal leaders of the Hip Sing Tong.

On February 15, 1922, there was purchased by the Hip Sing Club, a subsidiary organization of the Hip Sing Tong, the address of which was used as the headquarters of the latter organization, from the Osen Motor Sales Company, a used Marmon automobile, $600 being paid in cash and a note signed by Jew Chuck for the remaining $600. The defendants Vacarella and Munoz took this automobile and went to Watsonville, but it appears that the machine broke down en route and was towed to the Corner Garage in that city. These two defendants endeavored on a number of occasions to get a certain San Jose telephone number on the telephone. This number, San Jose 1367, it developed, was the number of the Hip Sing Tong, located at No. 7 Dupont street, in the name of Jew Bick. The telephone calls it is conceded were made for the purpose of obtaining money to pay the garage bill at Watsonville for the repair of the Marmon car. The phone calls were productive of results, as Louis Vacarella under date of February 21st telegraphed $30 to Albert Munoz. The telegraph company's receipt for this money was found upon the person of Sam Kee upon his arrest after the homicide.

Under date of February 21st there was purchased from the W. J. Benson Company, by one Wong Sing, a Hudson touring car, secondhand, license No. 32340. Wong Sing's address was given as No. 7 Dupont street, the same residence number as Sam Kee and headquarters of the Hip Sing Club and the Tong. The payment for said automobile was guaranteed by Sam Kee. The Hudson had been repainted and the body thereof shone brilliantly. The next heard of the Hudson car was that it had arrived at Watsonville and Munoz and Vacarella had possession of it. The story of these defendants as to how they knew the car was for them was conflicting, and it is not definitely shown from their evasive testimony how the car arrived at Watsonville; but Louis Vacarella testified that he was asked by the defendants to "bring down the Hudson car." "He (referring to Munoz) told me to bring down the Hudson car and two demijohns." These statements were afterwards qualified by the witness upon further questioning by counsel for defense:

> "A. Well they phoned down to bring my car but it was broke. Q. What car did you bring them? A. I brought down a Hudson."

Numerous parties saw the defendants Munoz and Vacarella and identified them by their appearance, the clothes they wore, and the Hudson car with the new coat of paint. In the afternoon of the 22d, at or about 3 o'clock, Vacarella and Munoz were observed eating in the California restaurant and the Hudson car was observed standing in front. A brother-in-law of the proprietor was looking at the machine, which he called "highly polished," when one of the defendants asked who he was. The proprietor asked if it was their car and they answered in the affirmative. At approximately 9:45 of this evening Lam Gee, the deceased, employed as chef at the Appleton Hotel in Watsonville, while returning from a Japanese poolroom in said city was accosted at the point on Rodriguez street near the hotel, where his body was found, by an individual, supposed by the witness describing the occurrence to be an "oriental." There was no actual witness to the homicide other than the parties to it, but a witness who had gone on up the street a few moments before and had passed a big black car testified that when but a short distance beyond it up Rodriguez street a shot rang out and he turned to see what was going on. In the meantime the party doing the shooting had fired two more shots. The witness stated that immediately "I see a man run across the street from Appleton side to that big car." The witness took notice of the person running across the street by the kind of coat he wore, identifying the coat of Munoz as one like it, which was a short, brown jacket with a sheep's hide collar, having the appearance of a fur collar, which coat had been worn by Munoz on the trip and which he had on when later observed by the county officers. This party, who evidently did the shooting, was observed by this witness to run to the big car which started before he could board it and went rapidly up Rodriguez street. The murderer disappeared through a vacant lot adjoining a church across the street in the direction of Third street, which parallels Rodriguez street. It is significant that on Third street, and near the point where said party would come through from Rodriguez street, there was found a revolver and a number of cartridges. The revolver proved to be the Colt Police Positive Special which had been sold in San Jose on February 15th, just one week prior to the homicide, the payment for which had been guaranteed by Sam Kee. The cartridges were 38 specials, the bullets of which weigh 158 grains. Two of the bullets which caused the death of Lam Gee were weighed and proved to be 126 and 154 grains. The weight would indicate that both were fired from a 38-caliber revolver. The surgeon who made the autopsy on the body testified that the wound made by the other shot was of the same character and probably made by the same size pistol. Approximately 2 hours and 25 minutes after the homicide the Hudson car heretofore referred to, occupied by Munoz and Vacarella, was stopped outside of San Jose by the sheriff of Santa Cruz county and certain of his deputies. At this time the said occupants stated they had not been in Watsonville but were coming from Salinas. They were allowed to go to their homes in San Jose. Later they admitted having been in Watsonville, but insisted they had left on the afternoon of the 22d.

As to the defendants Vacarella and Munoz, a review of the record would seem to establish beyond a doubt that they were the parties guilty of the homicide, there being a clear trail from the time they left San Jose until their return on the 22d or early hours of the 23d, every detail of their movements cementing the facts which, when woven together, make a conclusion as to their guilt irresistible. In view of the fact that practically the only question presented on this appeal, as to them, is the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the conviction, we deem a further discussion as to their connection with the case unnecessary.

[2, 3] The contention is made that data concerning certain telephone calls was improperly received in evidence. In all but two instances this data was supplied from the records of the telephone company, taken in the ordinary course of business. This went to show the name and location of the party making the call and the name and telephone number at the destination of said call. It was only to show the communication between these points that the evidence was admitted. We see no reason why the records of the telephone company, taken in the regular course of business and with its peculiar method of receiving payment therefor and charging the revenue accordingly, especially to long distance calls, where it is necessary for the operator to make a written record thereof, should not be allowed in evidence. Sullivan v. Kuykendall, 82 Ky. 483, 56 Am. Rep. 901; Wolfe v. Missouri Pacific Ry. Co., 97 Mo. 473, 11 S. W. 49, 3 L. R. A. 539, 10 Am. St. Rep. 331. The two instances where the conversation over the telephone was allowed was that overheard by those present at the garage at the time the Marmon car was being repaired. This was direct evidence of the statements and conversation of the defendants Vacarella and Munoz and was undoubtedly admissible against them; the only question being as to whether or not it was admissible against Sam Kee. It would clearly be so admissible for the reason that Sam Kee's connection with the conspiracy is established by other proof and hence the acts and declarations of Vacarella and Munoz in connection with these telephone calls and conversations would be admissible against their coconspirator. People v. Collins, 64 Cal. 293, 30 Pac. 847; People v. Oldham, 111 Cal. 648, 44 Pac. 312; People v. Schmidt, 33 Cal. App. 445, 165 Pac. 555.

As to the defendant Sam Kee the contention is raised that the evidence is insufficient for his conviction. The question of motive is raised by appellants, the argument being that there would seem to be no good reason for the defendants Munoz and Vacarella taking the life of Lam Gee. This motive is supplied by the connection of Sam Kee with the Hip Sing Tong, with these two defendants and with this killing showing that a potent reason not connected with Vacarella and Munoz was behind the homicide. It is a conceded fact that there was a tong war raging and that the members of the tongs involved departed from the enemy's camp in these two towns. It is also a fact that Lam Gee appeared to be totally unafraid to remain in Watsonville, indicating that he had nothing to fear from the Bing Kong Tong. There was testimony to the effect that Lam Gee was a member of the Bing Kong Tong and generally known to be such in Watsonville. There was also some evidence that he was a member of the Hip Sing Tong, but this testimony as to the deceased's membership in the Hip Sing Tong was vague and some of it went back thirteen to fifteen years and went merely to his presence on one or more occasions in the clubhouse of said tong in San Francisco. This testimony was given by three Chinese living at 7 Dupont street, San Jose, members of the Hip Sing Tong, one of whom was the defendant Sam Kee himself and another of whom had departed from Watsonville when the "war" started. There is abundant evidence to show that the death of Lam Gee resulted from the activities of the Hip Sing Tong, between which and the defendants Munoz and Vacarella a close connection was established. As to the connection of the defendant Sam Kee with a conspiracy to take the life of Lam Gee, it must be remembered that he was one of the leaders of the Hip Sing Tong; that it was he who obtained the firearms and ammunition, among which was the pistol later found at Watsonville; that he supervised the purchase of the Marmon car, was present at the purchase of and guaranteed payment for the Hudson; the phone calls of Vacarella and Munoz came to his headquarters, and on him the receipt for the money sent to Albert Munoz in Watsonville was found, several days after the homicide. Taking the record as a whole, it would seem clear that a conspiracy existed to take the life of Lam Gee, Munoz and Vacarella carrying the details into execution, and at every crucial point we find the defendant Sam Kee in charge of the details of providing the materials, appliances, and facilities for the commission of the crime.

The judgment is affirmed.

MORROW v. MORROW. (Civ. 4072.)

1. Divorce 🔑184(6)—Trial court's findings of fact conclusive on conflicting evidence.

Where the evidence is sharply conflicting, the trial court's decision must be taken as conclusive of the facts.

2. Divorce 🔑130—Finding against plaintiff on issue of cruelty supported by evidence.

A general finding that defendant husband had not been guilty of extreme cruelty toward plaintiff and had not caused her bodily injury or mental suffering held sustained by the evidence, though a particular finding as to the husband's correspondence with another woman was unwarranted; there being no evidence that such correspondence caused plaintiff any mental suffering.

3. Divorce 🔑294—Evidence held to warrant award of custody of children to husband on denial of divorce to either party.

Notwithstanding the court denied a divorce to either party, it was authorized, under Civ.

Code, §§ 138 and 246, to award the custody of children to the husband, and such order was proper where the evidence showed that the husband had always been a considerate and affectionate father, had maintained the family home and business, and had never denied the plaintiff wife a voice in the business or a place in the home; there being nothing in the order preventing her from enjoying the society of the children should she desire to return to the established home.

4. Divorce ⚷312—Where record silent as to conference between judge and children, it will be presumed that information disclosed assisted court in making order.

In a divorce action, where the court denied relief to either party, and, before awarding custody of the children to the husband, talked with the two elder children, aged 13 and 9, respectively, in his chambers, the court will assume, where the record is silent as to what passed at the interview, that the trial court gained information which assisted him in determining the order which he later made in the case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Divorce action by Alice Adelia Morrow against William Henry Morrow, in which the defendant brought cross-action for divorce. From judgment denying either party a divorce and awarding to defendant custody of minor children, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George D. Blair, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff for the purpose of securing a decree of divorce. The defendant filed a cross-complaint. Upon trial being had the court denied the prayers of both, except that the judgment included an order awarding the custody of the minor children, who were at the time of the ages of fourteen, nine, and four years respectively, to the defendant. The eldest child was a girl. The two others were boys.

[1] Upon this, the plaintiff's appeal, the contention is first made that the evidence does not sustain the findings. While the findings fall far short of being models of clarity and conciseness, this contention is completely answered by the statement, which is abundantly borne out by the record presented, that there was a sharp conflict in the evidence, from which it follows that the trial court's decision must be taken as conclusive of the facts. The conflict was so absolute and decided as to leave no room whatsoever for the argument that the evidence opposed to that produced by the plaintiff was not of a substantial character.

[2] The parties to the action were married at Seattle, Wash., in March, 1906. They afterwards removed to Vancouver, B. C., where they established a laundry and by their joint efforts built up a lucrative business. Plaintiff testified that in 1919 the laundry plant was appraised at a value of $112,000, and that the company had acquired subsequent to that time additional property valued at about $35,000. Prior to the date when the plaintiff came to California, as will presently appear, she owned, and has since owned, 50 per cent. of the stock of the laundry company, and her husband has owned the remaining 50 per cent. As secretary and treasurer of the corporation, the wife, prior to coming to California, drew a salary of $300 per month. During the latter part of the time that the couple resided together in Vancouver there were domestic difficulties which the husband asserted were due to the fact that his wife had become infatuated with a man named Hastings, who was five years her junior. Hastings had resided with his wife in the house immediately adjoining that occupied by the Morrows. The plaintiff admitted that in a suit brought against her by Mrs. Hastings she (plaintiff) was accused of having alienated the affections of Mrs. Hastings' husband. At any rate, the domestic difficulties of the Morrows reached a climax in April, 1920, when the defendant agreed that the plaintiff might come to California with the three children for a period of one year. An agreement was drawn up in which it was provided that during that year each of the parties was to draw from the laundry business the sum of $300 per month as salary, and that the expenses of education and maintenance of the children while they were absent from the home should be provided from the returns of the same business, it being expressly stated that the consent of the husband to the taking of the children to California should be without prejudice to "the rights of the parties to the custody of the children." Certain other moneys were agreed to be paid to the plaintiff by the husband, including the rental of a certain house in Vancouver and the price of a motorcar belonging to the wife. Immediately after the making of this agreement the plaintiff came to Los Angeles with the children, where she remained, except for a brief visit to Vancouver after an absence of a year. The year fixed in the agreement referred to having expired, she commenced this action for divorce. She charged that her husband had, several years prior to the bringing of the action, been addicted to the inordinate use of intoxicating liquors. She further charged that he had been guilty of acts amounting to extreme cruelty. She charged that the latter were such as to cause both physical and mental suffering; that on several occasions he had struck her, causing bruises; that he had attempted to indulge in lewd practices; that he had carried on a correspondence with a woman named Lou

Finney, who resided in San Francisco, and had visited the said Lou Finney and had planned to take a trip to Honolulu with the latter. Appellant has advanced the particular contention that the court's finding that the defendant did not correspond with Lou Finney or visit the said Finney at San Francisco is not sustained by the evidence. The court first found in general terms that the husband had not been guilty of extreme cruelty toward the plaintiff, and that he had not caused her bodily injury or mental suffering. Defendant was called to the witness stand and was shown two letters, one dated March 3, 1921, and the other dated April 8, 1921, which letters were affectionate in tone. Defendant admitted that he had received the letters from Lou Finney, but was not asked whether he had ever visited the said Lou Finney or whether he had ever planned to make a trip with her to Honolulu, and there was no other evidence introduced upon that subject. We observe that the letters were apparently written, according to their date, during the year that the plaintiff was in California pursuant to the written agreement entered into between her and her husband. While the letters appear to have been produced from the hands of her counsel, plaintiff did not testify or show as to when she had first seen them, or as to what effect the knowledge of their contents produced upon her. Under the admission of the defendant that he had received the letters of Lou Finney, the particular finding against the fact that there had been communication between defendant and the said Finney was perhaps not strictly accurate. But this defect in the findings must be considered as nonprejudicial to plaintiff, for the reason that, under the evidence, had the court particularly found the fact to be that the correspondence had been carried on as alleged, it could not have properly found that any mental suffering was caused to the plaintiff by reason thereof. Hence the general finding that such suffering had not been caused was fully sustained by the evidence.

On his part the husband introduced evidence showing that for a considerable period of time prior to the date when his wife left Vancouver she had been guilty of acts of great familiarity with Hastings, and it appeared in evidence that Hastings arrived in Los Angeles a little in advance of Mrs. Morrow, and that the two had used the same office for purposes of business and had been in each other's company on frequent occasions.

[3] The court was authorized to make the order giving the custody of the children to the defendant (Civ. Code, §§ 138 and 246; Ex parte Gordan, 95 Cal. 377, 30 Pac. 561), notwithstanding that a divorce was denied to both parties. There was evidence that the defendant had always been a considerate and affectionate father to the children. The home of the family and the business of both of the parties was located in Vancouver. The wife had never been excluded from the home nor from the support there which the husband was required to furnish her. A voice in the management of the business was not denied to her, nor was there denied her a right to receive a considerable salary so long as she would consent to perform the not onerous duties of secretary and treasurer of the company.

[4] The trial judge, moreover, upon consent of the parties, talked with the two elder children in his chambers before making the order relative to the custody, and, while the record does not disclose what passed at that interview, we must assume that the court, by that interview, gained information which assisted him in determining upon the order which he later made in the case. There is nothing in the order of the court which in any way serves to prevent the plaintiff from enjoying the society of her children should she desire to return to the established home. Further than this, it may be observed that this order is subject to modification at any time, upon a reasonable showing, and, even though the parties remain separated, the wife, should she chose to become a resident of the city where her husband resides, might reasonably expect to have such conditions added to the order as would enable her to share in the custody of the minors.

The judgment and the order disposing of the custody of the minor children of the parties are affirmed.

Judgment ⚷780(2)—Lien of judgment not created against equitable interest.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 671, providing that, at the docketing of a judgment of the superior court, it becomes a lien upon the real property of the judgment debtor, legal interests in real property only are affected by the judgment lien, and the docketing of a judgment had no effect to establish a lien upon interests created by an unrecorded trust agreement.

Newlin & Ashburn, Charles L. Chandler, and J. W. McKinley, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

W. C. Petchner, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Plaintiffs secured judgment quieting title to certain real property. The appeal taken by defendants presents the question as to whether a judgment of a superior court, when duly docketed, creates a lien against the interest of a cestui que trust in real property.

In 1916 plaintiffs were the record owners of the property, holding, under the terms of the conveyance to them, the whole title as joint tenants with right of survivorship. As a matter of fact, one Corbaley and one Emerson were owners of certain undivided interests in the property, which interests were described in an unrecorded trust agreement, executed by all of the persons concerned. It was under the terms of this agreement that plaintiffs here became trustees for Corbaley and Emerson, with the necessary result that the legal title rested in plaintiffs, while Emerson and Corbaley possessed equitable interests in the proportions which were described in the trust agreement. Three judgments were obtained against Corbaley by the defendants, or assignors of certain of them, late in the year 1916. In 1917 the plaintiffs Poindexter brought suit on a promissory note owing them by Corbaley and obtained judgment. Acting under their direction, the sheriff made a levy, first by attachment, and later under writ of execution, upon the interest of Corbaley in the real property, and made sale of that interest to plaintiffs, who in due time received a sheriff's deed.

Appellants contend that liens of their judgments attached to the interest of Corbaley in the property immediately upon the judgments being docketed, and that the attachment and sale made under the judgment subsequently obtained by the plaintiffs were subject to the liens of respondents' judgments. If the lien of a judgment attaches to equitable as well as legal interests in real property, then appellants are right in their contention. Section 671 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that at the time a judgment rendered by the superior court is docketed—

> "it becomes a lien upon all the real property of the judgment debtor not exempt from execution in the county, owned by him at the time, or which he may afterward acquire, until the lien ceases."

Interests of an equitable nature are generally held not to be affected by the lien of a judgment. Reeves on Real Property, vol. 2, p. 1572; Tiffany on Real Property, vol. 2, § 570, p. 1308; Black on Judgments (2d Ed.) vol. 1, § 433, p. 674. It is true that execution may be levied against equitable as well as legal interests in real property—this because the statute relating to executions expressly provides that a sale may be made of both real and personal property "or any interest therein" not exempt by law. The case of Belieu v. Power (Cal. App.) 201 Pac. 620, reviews the authorities and announces a conclusion which we think sustains plaintiffs' position. The Supreme Court denied a rehearing in that case; hence the decision may be considered as authority. Irrespective of the contrary holding in a few other states, our own decisions indicate that the construction adopted by our courts, of the language used in section 671 of the Code of Civil Procedure, requires that legal interests only in real property be considered as affected by a judgment lien.

Having disposed of the main law question on its merits, we need not examine the argument of respondents that, by reason of the lapse of time fixed by the Code as measuring the life of a judgment lien, the question has become moot and not possessed of remaining interest.

The judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 8, 1923.)

Appeal and error ⟹194(4)—Objection to authority to enter judgment on cross-complaint first made on appeal too late.

Where plaintiff met defendants' amended cross-complaint by demurrer which was overruled and by motion to strike certain parts and thereafter proceeded to trial without any suggestion that plaintiff was objecting to trial as presenting a controversy relating to the cross-action, and no such objection having been brought to the attention of the trial court at any stage of the proceedings, an objection on appeal that court was without authority to render judgment for defendants on their cross-complaint is made too late.

CONREY, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment rendered against it upon a cause of action stated in the cross-complaint of the defendants. The sole ground for reversal now urged on behalf of the plaintiff is that the court erred in overruling plaintiff's demurrer to the amended cross-complaint. The argument rests upon that part of the demurrer which alleged that said amended cross-complaint "does not contain facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." It is not claimed that said cross-complaint did not state a cause of action except in this, that the case presented by the cross-complaint is in no manner related to the subject-matter of the plaintiff's action, and therefore that the cross-action does not lie in this case.

For the purposes of this decision we shall assume that, as against objections properly urged, the right of the defendants to proceed by cross-complaint should have been denied. But upon the record now before us we think that this objection really appears for the first time on this appeal from the judgment.

Although it does not appear that the Supreme Court has ever directly stated that a general demurrer to a cross-complaint upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action is sufficient to raise the question of the right to file the cross-complaint, yet it does appear that a number of cases have been decided upon the assumption that the question could be so raised. In three cases judgments were reversed directly upon the ground that the demurrer had been improperly overruled where the case presented by the cross-complaint was not a proper case for cross-complaint. Demartin v. Albert, 68 Cal. 277, 9 Pac. 157; Silver Creek, etc., Co. v. Hayes, 113 Cal. 142, 45 Pac. 191; Yorba v. Ward, 109 Cal. 107, 38 Pac. 48, 41 Pac. 793. However, in the Silver Creek, etc., Co. Case the Supreme Court held that the cross-complaint did not state a cause of action at all, as well as that it did not present a proper case for a cross-complaint. And in the Yorba Case the plaintiff's objection to the cross-complaint was presented by a motion to strike it out, as well as by demurrer. As far as we have been able to discover, Demartin v. Albert, supra, is the only decision wherein (the record showing a general demurrer that the cross-complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action) the judgment was reversed solely upon the ground that "the cross-complaint was not filed in the proper case," and that the court erred in overruling the demurrer.

In the later case of Riverside Heights, etc., Co. v. Riverside Trust Co., 148 Cal. 457, 469, 83 Pac. 1003, 1008, the question now under consideration was disposed of as follows:

> "The appellant appeared to the cross-complaint, filed a demurrer and answer thereto, and afterward went to trial, not only without objection to the propriety of the cross-complaint as a pleading in the action, but in pursuance of a stipulation to submit for decision a particular question arising out of its allegations. It is too late to object in this court for the first time that the cross-complaint was improperly filed and did not come within the scope of the provisions of section 442 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

In this present action the plaintiff, at the same time when it filed its demurrer, also filed a notice of motion to strike from the amended cross-complaint certain parts thereof. The motion was presented and was granted to the extent that one portion of the cross-complaint was stricken out. When the case was called for trial, statements were made by counsel indicating that the action was to be tried on the cross-complaint. In response to the court's remark, "Then the original complaint and original cross-complaint stand?" counsel for appellant responded, "There is an amended cross-complaint." Thereupon counsel for appellant referred to his motion to strike, and brought to the attention of the court the particular part of the motion that had been granted, closing his statement with the words, "So the rest of it stands." The case then proceeded to trial without any suggestion that the plaintiff was objecting to trial of the action as presenting a controversy relating to the cross-action. It may fairly be inferred that this objection was never brought to the attention of the trial court at any stage of the proceedings. It is not now claimed that on the merits of the case (aside from this single question of being properly in court), the cross-complainants' right of recovery was not fully established. Under these circumstances we think that the objection now comes too late.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ANDERSON. (Cr. 648.)

(District Court of Appeal. Third District, California. Feb. 10, 1923.)

Constitutional law 🔑70(3)—Court bound by law passed by Legislature though it creates hardship.

Medical Practice Act, § 17, as amended by St. 1917, p. 114, § 11, permitting the prosecution of persons practicing medicine without a license, is not a law made by the court, and the court is bound by it, although it creates a hardship on a certain class of practitioners; resort to the Legislature or to the people being the only remedy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

C. A. Anderson was convicted of practicing medicine without a license, and appeals. Affirmed.

L. J. Maddux, of Modesto, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. [1] The case was on the January calendar for oral argument, but no one appeared to represent appellant. His counsel, however, had communicated with the clerk of this court, asking a reasonable time in which to file a written argument. By an order of court he was granted 10 days for that purpose. More than 30 days have expired, and no brief has been filed. However, we have examined the record and find no error therein. It was charged in the information that the defendant—

> "on or about the 5th day of December, 1921, * * * did then and there willfully, wrongfully, and unlawfully practice, attempt to practice, and advertise and hold himself out as practicing a system or mode of treating the sick and afflicted in this state without having at the time of so doing a valid unrevoked certificate from the state board of medical examiners of the state of California."

The offense was sufficiently described in contemplation of section 17 of the State Medical Practice Act (Stats. 1917, p. 114), and the evidence was sufficient to justify the conviction. Indeed, at the time judgment was pronounced, the learned counsel for appellant admitted that his client had practiced his system of treatment without a license from the duly authorized authorities, but he claimed that said board of medical examiners had acted capriciously and arbitrarily in denying appellant a certificate.

[2] But if such consideration might be regarded in a proceeding of this kind it is sufficient to say that there was no evidence to that effect and such assertion did not, of course, afford any ground for setting aside the verdict. It is very true, as stated by the learned trial judge:

> "This court or no other court made the law. That is a matter, if the law is wrong, if it naturally creates a hardship upon a certain class of practitioners resort to the Legislature or to the people is the only remedy; the courts cannot correct it. We are simply bound by the law, and only perform our duty in accordance with the law as we find it."

We may say, in brief, that the defendant's rights were all safeguarded by the lower court, the trial was eminently fair, the jury was fully and correctly instructed, and we discover no reason for interfering with the verdict.

The judgment is affirmed.

STURTEVANT v. K. HOVDEN CO.

(Civ. 4399.)

Attachment 🔑6—Writ will not lie in action by buyer for seller's breach of implied warranty "contract for the direct payment of money."

Where a buyer suffered loss because goods for which he paid were not as specified, an action by his assignee against seller for breach of an implied warranty is not upon contract for the direct payment of money so as to justify an attachment under Code Civ. Proc. § 537, subd. 1, upon any theory of failure of consideration or of claim for money had and received.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Contract for Payment of Money.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by J. F. Sturtevant against the K. Hovden Company. From an order dissolving an attachment, plaintiff appeals. Order affirmed.

Thomas, Beedy & Lanagan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fred A. Treat, of Monterey, and Wm. C. Bacon and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Appeal from an order dissolving an attachment.

The sole question here involved is whether or no the two causes of action set forth in the complaint, or either of them, is of such a character as to warrant the issuance of an attachment. The first cause of action is based upon the theory of rescission and rejection, the complaint, in substance, alleging that plaintiff's assignors purchased from defendant in San Francisco certain canned apricots of specified grades and standards, to be shipped to New York. The goods so purchased were fully paid for. Upon arrival at their destination it was discovered, so it is alleged, that they were not up to standard. Plaintiff's assignors registered an objection to the goods, but subsequently sold the same. Upon such sale they did not receive the amount of the contract price, and, as an additional loss, they were subjected to certain expenses, which brought the amount of their alleged damage to the sum of $2,946.44. The second cause of action sets forth the same state of facts, but under it plaintiff seeks recovery, not upon the theory of rescission, but upon the basis of a breach of an implied contract of guaranty.

An attachment was issued in the action, which was subsequently vacated and set aside by the trial court upon its conclusion that the action was one in which the application of the attachment statutes could not be invoked, and the plaintiff appeals from the order made by the trial court in conformity with such view. It is claimed by him that an analysis of the two causes of action as pleaded will show that they are of such a character as to support an attachment. It is argued that as to the first it sets forth a simple cause of action by a purchaser who has been tendered something different from that which he paid for, and that under such circumstances he is entitled to recover back the money so paid and advanced upon a consideration which has wholly failed, and that therefore the first count is nothing more than an action for money had and received.

With reference to the second count it is contended that the statute equally applies, for the reason that the right of appellant to the remedy for a breach of warranty arises not upon the breach by his vendor of the contract of sale, but upon his separate, distinct, and collateral agreement of warranty, from which the law implies that the vendor upon a breach thereof is deemed to agree to compensate his purchaser by a direct payment of money in case the goods sold are not as represented. Appellant concludes from these premises that, whatever the foundation of his right may be, whether based upon rescission as set forth in his first cause of action, or upon breach of warranty as recited in the second, in either aspect of the case he is entitled to the benefit of the attachment statutes. Respondent, on the other hand, in support of the order, insists that an examination of plaintiff's complaint shows it to be in substance nothing more than an action to recover damages for breach of a contract, and that it is in no sense one for the direct payment of money.

It is obvious that the appellant is seeking to bring the transaction within the purview of subdivision 1 of section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which limits the issuance of an attachment upon contracts to those made for the direct payment of money where, as here, defendant is a resident of the state. It is not claimed, nor could it be, that plaintiff's action is based upon an express contract for the direct payment of money. Whatever rights, therefore, he may have to the remedy here sought would have to arise from an implied contract on the part of defendants to pay under the circumstances here presented.

We do not deem an extended discussion of the case necessary, as we are of the opinion that the questions here involved have been set at rest by the decisions of the appellate courts of this state. In Willett & Burr v. Alpert, 181 Cal. 652, 185 Pac. 976, the rule is laid down that, where an express contract has been fully performed on plaintiff's part, and nothing remains to be done under it but the payment of money by defendant, which is nothing more than the law would imply against him, plaintiff may declare in indebitatus assumpsit. Where this common count will lie the law implies, as a fiction, which cannot be controverted, a promise or contract to pay, in which case some of our decisions go so far as to sustain the issuance of an attachment upon the strength of the promise so implied. But, on the other hand, no such promise or contract will be implied unless a common count will lie. Accordingly, it is there held that, in an action by a vendee upon a contract for the sale of personal property, against the vendors, to recover damages for the failure of the latter to deliver the full quantity of property claimed to be called for by the contract, a delivery of part of the quantity having been made, and the vendee having paid the full purchase price, as here, he is not entitled to a writ of attachment, since the action is not upon a contract, express or implied, for the direct payment of money.

So, also, in California Packing Corporation v. Kato, 45 Cal. App. 491, 188 Pac. 57, it was held that, in an action to recover damages by reason of a breach of contract to sell certain goods, there is no contract for the direct payment of money nor any implied contract unless the law creates the fiction of one for the purpose of allowing an action upon a common count, which is never permitted in actions such as this based upon an obligation to do something other than pay money. Of course, where it appears that there has been a total failure of consideration, so as to entitle the vendee to recover the purchase price on that ground, a different situation is presented. Here, however, appellant's assignors realized the sum of $4,279.17 upon the sale of the property. The action, therefore, cannot be said to be one to recover money paid upon a contract the consideration of which has entirely failed. In such a case, as is pointed out in Willett & Burr v. Alpert, supra, where there is neither an entire failure of consideration nor a rescission of the contract so as to entitle the vendee to recover back his money, a plaintiff is limited to his remedy for damages, in which case the action does not proceed upon any theory of the defendant having received money which he should return to plaintiff, and which the law would imply a promise on his part to return so as to permit indebitatus assumpsit to lie. It is there stated that, if this distinction between actions for the recovery of money paid because of failure of consideration and actions for damages be not sound, it would follow that indebitatus assumpsit would lie in every case of a breach of contract, regardless of whether or no the contract be one for the direct payment of money, the effect of which would be to wipe out the limitation imposed by the subdivision of the attachment statute in question.

Counsel for the appellant seek to draw a distinction between the cases here cited and the instant one. It is argued that in both of those actions the obligation breached was not one to pay money, but to deliver goods, and that in neither was the defendant under any obligation, express or implied, to pay money. The reason for the denial of the application of the attachment statutes in those cases is no more persuasive than in the instant case. In the cases cited there was a breach of warranty of quantity; here one of quality. We see no distinction in principle.

From what we have said it follows that the order appealed from should be, and is hereby, affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SANDERS. (Cr. 1096.)

1. Criminal law ⚷1110(6)—Suggestion of diminution of record to include further transcript from record of lower court denied where matter not included in original application.

Where, after conviction, probation before sentence was granted, which probation was after hearing revoked and sentence imposed, and defendant then gave notice of appeal from both the final order of conviction and the order revoking probation, stating as grounds therefor matters relating solely to the proceedings on motion to revoke the probation, and asked for a transcript of the reporter's notes of all proceedings on such motion, held, that the appellate court could not thereafter grant a motion for diminution of the record praying for an order for the transcript of the record of the trial resulting in defendant's conviction, since Pen. Code, § 1247c, relating to notice of appeal and transcript is mandatory and provides "no further transcription shall be ordered * * * unless the application therefor was included in the original application made to the trial court."

2. Criminal law ⚷1071—Appeal from conviction held dismissed for failure to specify any grounds of complaint.

Where an appeal is sought to be taken from a judgment of conviction and from an order revoking probation, where the grounds of appeal assigned relate only to the proceedings on motion to revoke the probation, held, that the appeal from the judgment of conviction must be dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Clinton Sanders was convicted of a felony, and he appeals from the judgment of conviction and from an order revoking probation. On motion for diminution of record, motion denied, and appeal from judgment of conviction dismissed.

Ernest B. D. Spagnoli, of San Francisco, and Harold L. Newman and Walter F. Lynch, both of Stockton, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This matter comes before us upon a suggestion of diminution of record made by the appellant. The situation presented is this: The appellant was convicted of a felony. He was granted probation before being sentenced. Later, upon motion of the probation officer, and after a hearing before the trial judge, the probation was revoked, and the defendant was then sentenced to be confined in the state penitentiary at San Quentin. Oral notice of appeal from the order revoking probation was given in open court and, later, and within the time allowed by law, written notice was given of an appeal from the final judgment of conviction and from the order revoking probation. The grounds of appeal stated in this written notice were as follows:

> "(1) Errors of the court in admitting in evidence testimony on the hearing of motion to revoke probation; (2) proceedings on motion to revoke probation were unfounded in matter of law for the reason the defendant had no notice served upon him of the hearing thereof; (3) Probation was revoked in an extrajudicial proceeding not authorized by law, and was based upon hearsay testimony which was objected to at the hearing."

The appellant then asked for a transcription of the reporter's notes of all proceedings on motion to revoke probation.

The suggestion for diminution of record made to this court prays for an order for the transcription of the portion of the record containing the charge to the jury and the entire proceedings at the trial of the defendant in the superior court, which resulted in his conviction.

[1] Section 1247 of the Penal Code provides:

> "Upon an appeal being taken from any judgment or order of the superior court * * * to a District Court of Appeal * * * the defendant * * * must, within five days, file with the clerk and present an application to the trial court, stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which the appellant relies, and designate what portions of the phonographic reporter's notes it will be necessary to have transcribed to fairly present the points relied upon. If such application is not filed within said time, the appeal is wholly ineffectual and shall be deemed dismissed. * * *"

The above-quoted section of the Penal Code is mandatory. Rhodes v. Sargent, 17 Cal. App. 54, 118 Pac. 727; People v. Ali, 38 Cal. App. 544, 176 Pac. 883. The appellant's statement of his grounds of appeal relates solely to the proceedings on motion to revoke probation, and his application for a transcript of the record specifies only proceedings in relation to that matter. Section 1247c of the Penal Code provides that "no further transcription shall be ordered upon the suggestion of the appellant unless the application therefor was included in the original application made to the trial court."

It follows, necessarily, that the motion for diminution of record must be denied, and it is so ordered.

[2] It also appears that there has been no effectual appeal from the final judgment of conviction, because of appellant's failure to specify in any way the grounds of such appeal.

The appeal from the final judgment is dismissed.

PEOPLE v. PETERSON et al.

Burglary 🔑41(1)—Evidence held sufficient.

Evidence held to sustain conviction of burglary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

H. Peterson and James De Voore were convicted of burglary, and appeal. Affirmed.

Dorris & Henderson, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. The appellants, H. Peterson, and James De Voore, were convicted of burglary. Together with B. F. Carrell and E. C. Lierly, they were jointly charged with the burglary of a warehouse in the city of Bakersfield. Lierly pleaded guilty. The three others were tried and convicted. Peterson and De Voore appeal from the judgment. The corpus delicti was proved beyond peradventure. But appellants claim that, aside from the testimony of their alleged accomplices, there is no evidence tending to connect them with the crime. The point lacks merit.

Early in the morning of March 12, 1922, the warehouse was entered and goods were stolen and carried away. One witness, a man who lived near the scene of the burglary, testified that at about the hour of 12:30 a. m. he saw four men with a Ford truck, which was backed up near the warehouse. The witness saw goods loaded on the truck. Two of the four men he identified as Carrell and Lierly. It is a reasonable inference, therefore, that at least four men participated in the crime. At about 2:25 o'clock of the same morning an officer discovered De Voore in the warehouse crouched behind a table as though endeavoring to conceal himself. De Voore vouchsafed no explanation for his presence in that place at that hour, or for his apparent attempt at concealment. The evidence was sufficient to connect him with the crime as one of the perpetrators.

The truck which was used to remove the stolen goods belonged to the defendant Carrell, who lived about a block and a half from the warehouse. At about 4 o'clock on the morning of the burglary the truck was found on Carrell's premises. Its radiator was still warm. The three men who discovered the truck testified that they looked through the back door of Carrell's house into the kitchen, and that they saw there five trunks piled upon the floor. The trunks and their contents were a part of the stolen property. Each of these three witnesses, peeking through the door, saw a man stooping over the trunks. Presently one of them knocked at the door, which, after the expiration of about two minutes, was opened by Peterson, who was dressed. The latter made no attempt to explain his presence there at that time. These circumstances sufficed to connect Peterson with possession of the stolen property, and such possession, under all the circumstances, was sufficient to warrant the inference that he was one of the four who had burglariously entered the warehouse.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Witnesses 🔑337(3)—Defendant testifying may be impeached as other witnesses.

Where the defendant in a prosecution for crime becomes a witness for himself, he is subject to impeachment in the same manner as any other witness, and testimony attacking his general reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity is properly admissible.

2. Criminal law 🔑752½—Motion to dismiss for insufficiency of evidence at close of state's case not authorized.

A motion at the close of state's case for a dismissal of the information charging robbery on the ground that the evidence fails to show defendant guilty of the crime charged is properly denied as not within the provisions of Pen. Code, § 1382, fixing the grounds upon which such a motion may be made.

3. Robbery 🔑26—Refusal to dismiss warranted by evidence.

Evidence held sufficient to warrant the trial court in refusing to dismiss an information for insufficiency of the evidence, even if such motion be considered as one under Pen. Code, § 1118, asking a direction of acquittal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

J. B. Clark was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Morris & Rosin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of the crime of robbery and from an order denying the motion of defendant for a new trial.

[1] At the trial the court, over the objection of appellant, admitted the testimony of certain witnesses concerning the general reputation of appellant for truth, honesty, and integrity. Appellant contends that, as he offered no evidence of his character, the trial court was in error in admitting the testimony in question. In making this point appellant overlooks the distinction between the status of a party to an action strictly as such, and the position occupied by a party when he becomes a witness. Here appellant took the witness stand in his own behalf, and the evidence to which objection is made was admitted after he had done so. The exact point now urged by appellant was passed upon by us in a recent case.

"From a very early date it has been held time and again, that when the defendant in a criminal case testifies for himself * * * he, for the time being, removes from himself the character of a defendant, and takes on that of a witness. He becomes 'subject to the same rules for testing his credibility before the jury, by impeachment or otherwise, as any other witness,' and may be impeached by testimony that his general reputation * * * for truth, honesty, and integrity is bad." People v. Bannon (Cal. App.) 209 Pac. 1029.

[2, 3] At the close of the case made by the people appellant moved the trial court to dismiss the information under which he was charged, upon the ground that the evidence failed to show that he was guilty of robbery. The motion was denied, and appellant assigns the ruling as error. The ruling was proper, as the motion did not come within the provisions of Penal Code, § 1382, fixing the grounds upon which such a motion may be made. If we view the motion as one asking the court to advise the jury to acquit, under Penal Code, § 1118, although we do not decide that it can be so regarded, it is enough to say that the evidence of the people was such that the court could not have given the jury that advice.

Judgment and order affirmed.

JULIUS LEVIN CO., Inc., v. COMMERCIAL CENTRE REALTY CO. (Civ. 4362.)

1. Contracts 🔑305(1)—Negotiations for modification of contract waived performance within stipulated time.

The performance of a contract by defendant to erect a building on a lot owned by defendant adjoining that owned by plaintiff within a time specified is waived by negotiations between the parties for the purchase of that lot by plaintiff, which continued during the entire time specified for the erection of the building, and, if thereafter plaintiff wished to stand on the terms of the contract, plaintiff was bound to give defendant timely notice.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1068(4)—Error in instructions as to damages is immaterial where jury found for defendant.

Error in instructions as to the measure of plaintiff's damages is immaterial, where the jury rendered a verdict for defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by the Julius Levin Company, Incorporated, against the Commercial Centre Realty Company, to recover damages for breach of contract. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Louis H. Brownstone and Louis E. Goodman, both of San Franciso, for appellant.

J. J. West, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract. The defendant was awarded a judgment, and the plaintiff has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The defendant is a corporation engaged in buying and selling real estate. It had sold under an executory contract to the York Realty Company a lot 40x80 located at and being the southwest corner of Stockton and Green streets. Later the purchaser was about to sell its contract to the plaintiff in this case. Whether after, before, or as a part of those negotiations, is not clear; but we will assume, for the purpose of this decision, as a part of the consideration moving to this plaintiff the defendant executed its contract. The defendant, still being the owner of adjacent lands on the north side, and wanting to build up the neighborhood, advised the plaintiff to purchase the contract held by the York Realty Company and, as an inducement, executed and delivered to the plaintiff a contract in words and figures as follows, to wit:

"To Julius Levin Company: Within one year from date of delivery to you or your nominee of our deed to lot N. E. corner Stockton and Green streets, San Francisco, fronting 40 feet on Stockton street and 80 feet on Green street, we agree to erect and complete on the lot 40x80 adjoining same to the north, a store, or market building of one or more stories and basement, and if not so completed within said time we will pay to you, or your successor in interest, the sum of $2,500.00, as liquidated damages for the failure so to complete said building within said time, it being impossible to estimate damages in the event of breach of this agreement, it being understood and agreed that delays caused by act of God, or the enemy, strikes, shall not be considered as part of the said period of one year. Commercial Centre Realty Co., by A. Ruef, Manager. February Twenty-Eighth, Nineteen Hundred Nineteen."

[1] According to the terms of that contract, as applied to the other facts above stated, the defendant should have built its building on or before February 28, 1920. It did not do so. The plaintiff sued as for a breach. The defendant answered and pleaded: (1) A denial; (2) no consideration; (3) a waiver; and (4) a rescission and abandonment. The trial was had before a jury. All of the defenses were supported by at least some evidence, oral or documentary, or both. The jury returned a general verdict in favor of the defendant. No special verdicts were requested or rendered. The third defense was copiously presented. Mr. Ruef, the president of the defendant corporation, testified at length regarding that defense. His testimony was to the effect that in May, two or three months after the date of the contract on which the suit was based, he commenced to have conversations with the officers of the plaintiff corporation of and concerning the nature of the best building which the defendant should build. They discussed a theater instead of a store or market. Estimates indicated that a theater would pay 20 per cent., and tentative leases indicated that a lessee could be found who would advance the most of the money, if not all, needed to construct the theater. When these facts transpired, the plaintiff's officers commenced to negotiate for the privilege of buying the adjoining lot mentioned in the contract as owned by the defendant. These negotiations ran on to a date subsequent to February 28, 1920. Then the plaintiff's officers stated that the plaintiff would not undertake to purchase the theater lot nor to build thereon; but the plaintiff stated that Mr. Ruef might try to get another party to do so. Thereupon with the knowledge of the plaintiff, he made the attempt and, indeed, the record shows that he nearly succeeded. These facts abundantly supported the third defense. But just about the time the defendant was about to close its deal with other parties for the construction of the theater building, the plaintiff commenced this action. After the plaintiff had broken off its negotiations as above stated, it never at any time gave notice to the defendant that the contract period, one year, would again commence to run. On the other hand, after it had by its own acts caused the plaintiff to delay commencing and completing the building contemplated by the contract in suit, and had thus delayed such matters several months, it then terminated its negotiations and commenced its action within a short time after such termination. This, it had no right to do. By entering into the negotiations above recited the plaintiff waived performance, at least in part, during the year February 28, 1919, to February 28, 1920. American-Hawaiian Eng., etc., Co. v. Butler, 165 Cal. 497, 519, 133 Pac. 280, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 44. If thereafter the plaintiff would stand on the terms of the contract it was bound to give a timely notice so the defendant would not be put to a disadvantage.

[2] The appellant claims that the trial court committed errors in instructing the jury. This claim is addressed to instructions on the subject of damages and the subjects covered by the first, second, and fourth defenses. If the jury found for the defendant on the third defense (and in support of the judgment we must assume that it did), then the jury had no occasion to consider damages and the error, if any, was immaterial. The same remark can be made as to instructions addressed to the first, second, and fourth defenses.

Taking in view the whole record, we find no error. But if there was any error committed by the trial court we think it is patent that there is no showing that such error was prejudicial.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Banc Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. In denying the application for a transfer to this court we do not wish to be understood as approving the opinion to the effect that errors in the instructions upon the first, second, and fourth defenses were cured by the general verdict of the jury in favor of the defendant.

An examination of the record, however, discloses that the instructions complained of were not prejudicially erroneous as to the plaintiff.

The petition for a rehearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 2, is denied.

WILBUR, C. J., and WASTE, KERRIGAN, LENNON, MYERS, LAWLOR, and SEAWELL, JJ., concur.

HONEY v. HONEY. (Civ. 4084.)

1. Divorce 🔑231—Statutory allowance authorized to be made to wife for husband's offense differs from "alimony."

An allowance which is authorized on the granting of a divorce to a wife for the offense of the husband, under Civ. Code, § 139, is something different from "alimony" proper, which term refers to support the husband is required to render in fulfillment of the marriage obligation during the continuance of the marriage, and may, in view of section 137, be exacted pendente lite and before the marriage bonds are severed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Alimony.]

2. Divorce 🔑241—Award of lump sum to wife held justified.

In a wife's suit for divorce on the ground of cruelty, wherein it appeared that the husband was 65 years of age and the wife 31, and that the wife had two children by a former husband, and that the husband's property amounted to $42,375, an award of $7,800 in one sum to the wife was justified.

3. Divorce 🔑240(5)—Allowance of lump sum to wife held not excessive.

In a suit by a wife, 31 years old, against her husband, who was 65, for a divorce on the ground of cruelty, wherein it appeared that the wife had two young children by a former husband and that her husband's property amounted to $42,375, an allowance of a lump sum of $7,800 was not excessive.

4. Divorce 🔑184(12)—Exclusion of testimony as to defendant's age not prejudicial, where later admitted.

In a suit by a wife against her husband for divorce, it was not error to sustain an objection to a question asked of plaintiff as to defendant's age, where the age was later given in the husband's own testimony and was not contradicted.

5. Divorce 🔑240(3)—Exclusion of evidence as to how long prior to marriage wife had worked held not prejudicial error.

In a wife's suit against her husband for divorce, where plaintiff had testified that prior to her marriage she had worked in a shoe store, it was not error to exclude evidence as to how long prior thereto she had been at work.

6. Divorce 🔑116—Evidence as to intention of wife in marrying defendant held properly excluded.

In a suit by a wife against her husband on the ground of cruelty, it was not error to sustain an objection to a question as to whether plaintiff had not stated, prior to her marriage with defendant, that she intended to marry him in order to have herself and children supported, and that she would "clean him out" and when the children got to be older would leave him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Suit by Margaret G. Honey against Edwin A. Honey for a divorce. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

D. G. Wettlin and B. E. Tarver, both of Santa Ana, for appellant.

Walter Eden and A. E. Koepsel, both of Santa Ana, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Defendant has appealed from a decree of the superior court awarding to the plaintiff a divorce and the gross sum of $7,800 for future support.

The parties were married in August, 1919, and separated 1 year and 8 months thereafter. At the time of the marriage defendant was 65 years of age and the plaintiff about 31. Both parties had been previously married, and plaintiff had two young children, whom she brought with her to the home provided by the defendant. In her complaint she charged various acts of cruelty, consisting in part of words and epithets used toward her by defendant in a continuous course, culminating in a physical attack upon her, which occurred in May of 1921, after which she ceased to live with her husband. There was ample evidence to sustain the charge that the defendant did violently assault the plaintiff on the date last mentioned, and that his attack was without justification, and that she suffered severe bruises and injuries as a result thereof, the effects of which, especially that from an injury to one of her ears, continued down to the time of the trial.

No serious contention is made that the findings of the court on the divorce issue proper are not fully sustained by the evidence. The main argument of appellant is addressed to the point that neither the pleadings, findings, nor evidence justify the trial judge in making the award of the gross sum for the support of the wife. In the complaint there were enumerated the various possessions of defendant in real and personal property. The defendant made no denial to those allegations. While the plaintiff for the most part declared in her complaint that the market value of the property was unknown to her, counsel for appellant in their brief admit that there was evidence sufficient to establish a total valuation of $42,375. The trial judge in his findings determined that plaintiff had no means of support and that defendant had "a large amount of property," and specifically described the various parcels of land, mortgages, and corporate stocks, as the complaint set them forth. Included in this list of property was a mortgage for $7,800 and one for $3,000.

[1] The Supreme Court has determined that the allowance which is authorized to be made upon the granting of a divorce to a wife for the offense of a husband (section 139, Civ. Code) is something different from "alimony" proper, which term refers to support which the husband is required to render in fulfillment of the marriage obligation during the continuance of the marriage. "Alimony" may be exacted pendente lite and before the marriage bonds are severed. Section 137, Civ. Code. The authority for the making of the former allowance is of course purely statutory. It is in one sense regarded as a penalty imposed upon the husband:

> "It proceeds upon the theory that the husband entered upon an obligation which, among other things, bound him to support the wife during the period of their joint lives, and gave to her a right to share in the fruits and accumulations of his skill; that by his own wrong he has forced her to sever the relation which enabled her to enforce this obligation, and for the wrong which thus deprived her of the benefit of the obligation, he must make her compensation. The court is to fix the measure of that compensation by 'having regard to the circumstances of the parties respectively'; those circumstances furnishing the best means for determining the extent of her loss. * * * This allowance may be entirely independent of the property then in esse." Ex parte Spencer, 83 Cal. 460, 23 Pac. 395, 17 Am. St. Rep. 266, cited in Hogarty v. Hogarty (Cal. Sup.) 206 Pac. 79.

Our Supreme Court has definitely determined, also, that in an action for divorce where the court, as an incident to its judgment, make provision for the future support of the wife, the judgment may require the payment of a sum in gross, and provide, as security for the payment thereof, that a lien be enforced against the separate property of the husband. Further, that to justify a judgment of that kind it need not have been stated in the complaint that the husband has the ability to pay anything, as the power to make the judgment or order is incidental to the action, the same as is the right of the court to award the custody of children to either party. Gaston v. Gaston, 114 Cal. 542, 46 Pac. 609, 55 Am. St. Rep. 86. In the case just cited the court made a further observation, which is pertinent here in view of some of the contentions of appellant, that:

> "It was not essential, however, to warrant the decree for future maintenance that he [the husband] should then have owned property of either class."

See, also, Robinson v. Robinson, 79 Cal. 511, 21 Pac. 1095; Huellmantel v. Huellmantel, 124 Cal. 583, 57 Pac. 582.

[2, 3] We agree with appellant's counsel that as this provision for support money is intended to cover prospective wants of the wife it is more in keeping with the reason of the law that the judgment should provide for installment payments; for it may well happen that the wife will embark upon another matrimonial venture, in which case the husband will assume the duty to support her, and the former husband would be entitled to have a continuing judgment modified so as to relieve him of any further duty in the matter. Tremper v. Tremper, 39 Cal. App. 62, 177 Pac. 868. And where a woman is still young, as in this case, the probabilities that she will marry again are enhanced. Moreover, there was ample real property possessed by the defendant which would have furnished security for the payment of any installment allowances that might have been provided for. But while we admit the logic of counsel's argument addressed to this point, it must be said that the discussion goes only to a matter of policy, and does not establish that the action of the court providing for the immediate payment of a gross sum amounted to an abuse of the discretion which the statute commits to it. Under the authorities cited above it must be held that the complaint, findings and evidence were sufficient to support the incidental judgment requiring defendant to pay to the wife the sum of $7,800, in one sum; nor can it be said, considering the value of defendant's property, and the nature of the cruelty charged against him, that the allowance was so disproportionate to the reasonable demands of the case as to shock judicial conscience. The fact as to whether the property of the defendant was producing an income or was being carried at expense, would have no effect upon the right of the plaintiff to have a reasonable provision made for her support.

[4-6] There were several alleged errors committed by the court in the rejection of offered testimony, represented, first, by the sustaining of an objection to a question asked of the plaintiff as to what defendant's age was. The age of the defendant was given later in his own testimony, and was not contradicted; hence the first ruling was utterly without prejudice. Plaintiff having testified that prior to her marriage she had worked in a shoe store, objection was sustained to the next question asked of her as to how long prior thereto she had been at work. This ruling we think also was without prejudice. It would only have been material to the question as to what amount might be reasonable to award the plaintiff for permanent support. The question was not asked her as to how much she was earning at the time of her marriage, nor as to what particular work she was employed in doing. We think, too, that the court properly sustained an objection to a question, asked both of the plaintiff and another witness, as to whether plaintiff had not stated prior to her marriage with the defendant that she intended to marry him in order to have herself and children supported, and that she would "clean him out" and when the children got to be older would leave him. An answer in the affirmative to the question would not in any way have shown justification for the cruel conduct charged against the defendant, nor have discredited positive testimony given, particularly as to the acts of violence committed by him. The best that could be said for the testimony designed to be elicited would be that it might have a very remote effect (not legally cognizable) upon the credibility of the plaintiff as a witness.

None of the errors assigned are sustained by the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

TRIPP v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (Civ. 4089.)

1. Divorce 🔑243—Property agreement, incorporated in decree, held enforceable as court's mandate, though payment of amount specified was not expressly ordered.

Where a husband's agreement to pay certain sums as a property settlement was made pending suit for divorce by the wife, and recited that it might be embodied in the decree in that action, the agreement became enforceable as a mandate of the court when incorporated in the divorce decree, though the decree did not expressly order the husband to pay as agreed.

2. Divorce 🔑269(14)—Court may allow divorced husband to purge himself of contempt in failing to make payment for wife by paying in installments.

Where husband was in default as to a payment for his divorced wife, ordered by final decree in her divorce suit, the court had jurisdiction to allow him to purge himself of his contempt by paying the sum due in installments.

Petition by E. E. Tripp for certiorari to review an order adjudging him guilty of contempt of court. Writ denied.

D. Joseph Coyne, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Griffith Jones and John J. Craig, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. Petitioner's wife sued him for divorce and procured an interlocutory decree against him. Among other things, the decree contained the following:

> "The court further finds that prior to the commencement of this action * * * the parties hereto executed a certain property settlement and agreement, which should be and is hereby incorporated in and made part of this decree, and is in words and figures as follows, to wit."

The agreement was then set out in full. In part, it described several parcels of real property, all of which was stated to be the community property of the spouses, and by it the husband agreed to convey to the wife all his interest in the property. The instrument also contained the following:

> "It is further agreed and understood by and between the parties hereto that there is a total indebtedness against the Orange county property described above of approximately nine hundred ($900.00) dollars, and said [husband] agrees with said [wife] to make said payments as the same may become due to and for the use and benefit of the said [wife]. * * * That said [husband] has herewith made conveyances of all his said property as set forth above, the same to be held subject to the approval of this property settlement by the court, and to be delivered when said agreement is so approved by the court and embodied in the decree of said action."

As partially explaining this reference to "the court," and as showing more specifically what kind of decree was in the minds of the parties, it is to be observed that recitals in the preamble to the agreement were that "said [wife] has filed suit against [the husband] for divorce" and "said [husband] has had competent advice and been advised that his said wife has a good and meritorious cause of action, and, he having no meritorious defense thereto, it is mutually agreed and understood," etc. After setting forth the property agreement, the interlocutory decree ordered:

> "That said plaintiff shall take all of the community property as set forth in said property settlement and agreement as aforesaid."

In due time the court made its final decree of divorce between the parties. In that decree, also, the property agreement was set forth in full, being preceded by the statement:

> "The court further says that prior to the commencement of this action * * * the parties hereto executed a said [sic] property settlement and agreement which should be and hereby is incorporated in and made a part of this decree, and is in words and figures as follows, to wit."

At a time long after the final decree of divorce had become final, respondent court, upon the application of the wife, issued its order to petitioner to show cause why he should not be punished as for a contempt of court in having failed to pay a balance of the $900 mentioned in the property agreement. After due hearing under the order to show cause, respondent found that petitioner, at all times after the entry of the interlocutory and final decrees in the divorce action, had full knowledge of their existence; that at all times he was financially able to pay the $900, but that he had neglected and refused to pay and never had paid the sum of $683.75 thereof. Respondent thereupon made its order:

> "That the defendant is guilty of contempt of court, by reason of his failing to make the payments hereinbefore specified, and that it is hereby ordered that said defendant may purge himself of said contempt by paying to the complainant said $683.75, in sums not less than $50 per month, commencing March 1, 1922, and that, should said defendant not avail himself of this opportunity of purging himself of said contempt, he then may be cited to the court to be punished for said contempt hereinbefore mentioned."

These matters are all before us upon an order to show cause why a writ of review should not issue against respondent for the purpose of reviewing the order thus made in the contempt proceeding.

[1] It is contended that the decrees in the divorce action did not order petitioner to pay the $900 mentioned in the property agreement. It is true that neither of the decrees contained such an order in express terms, but we are nevertheless of the opinion that petitioner's contention cannot be upheld. The agreement recited the fact that a divorce action was pending between the parties, and contained a formal stipulation that it should be subject to the approval of the court and that, when so approved, it should be embodied in the decree, in the divorce action. This stipulation surely contemplated that the terms of the agreement, when it should be embodied in the decree, should have the compelling power of the court behind its every covenant. The court had full power to deal with the matters covered by the agreement and to render its judgment thereon, at least to the extent of making proper provision for the support and maintenance of the wife, provided that it were first ascertained that petitioner was guilty of the charges made against him in the divorce action. Notwithstanding this power of the court, the parties undertook to stipulate a decree as to property matters, subject, under the law as well as under the agreement, to the approval of the court. This approval was evidenced by the fact that the agreement was incorporated in terms in both the interlocutory and final decrees, preceded in each instance by the statement that the agreement was made part of the decree. Under these circumstances we are convinced that the terms of the agreement, except in so far as they were executed either before or at the time of the interlocutory decree, became enforceable as mandates of the court. Petitioner cites Milekovich v. Quinn, 40 Cal. App. 537, 181 Pac. 256, and McCahan v. McCahan, 47 Cal. App. 173, 190 Pac. 458, as opposed to this view, but we find nothing in either case which touches the question, except, in fact, that the first-named case seems to support, rather than to oppose, our conclusion. The court did therefore order petitioner to pay the $900.

Petitioner insists that the order requiring him to pay $683.75, he not having been ordered to make that payment as a fine for the contempt of which respondent found him guilty, was in effect but a modification of the order contained in both the interlocutory and final decrees of divorce and requiring the payment of $900, and authorities are cited to the point that such a modification was not proper under all the circumstances here present. It will not be necessary for us to consider this specific point. The order in question here was responsive to an order requiring petitioner to show cause why he should not be punished as for a contempt of court. We are, therefore, called upon to determine, at least in the first instance, whether respondent had jurisdiction in its order in the contempt proceeding to require petitioner to pay the sum of $683.75.

[2] It is plain, from the order sought to be reviewed, that respondent administered no punishment for the contempt of which it adjudged petitioner guilty. Instead of fixing a punishment, respondent by its order decreed that petitioner might purge himself of his offense against the dignity of the court by the payment of the $683.75 at the rate of not less than $50 per month. Unquestionably the court had jurisdiction to allow petitioner to purge himself of his contempt by paying the $683.75 at once and in full. 13 C. J. 94. We are cited to no authority showing that respondent was not empowered to allow petitioner to pay this total sum on the installment plan, and as a mere matter of jurisdiction we know of no reason why that course was improper. Such a course was undoubtedly an unusual one. It is strange that a court, after finding an individual in contempt for a failure to pay a total sum due under one of its judgments, should allow him, and that without punishing him for the contempt, to pay the amount in installments. That course in this instance placed petitioner in a better position than he had occupied prior to the order adjudging him in contempt, and it in effect presented him with a reward for his disobedience of the court's judgment. That, however, has nothing to do with the question whether respondent had jurisdiction to allow the payment in installments. We are of the opinion that the jurisdiction existed.

The application for the writ is denied.

PEOPLE v. HERRERA. (Cr. 917.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 15, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 16, 1923.)

1. Criminal law 🔑409, 516—Statement by defendant held an admission and not a confession and foundation for admission in evidence unnecessary.

In a prosecution for rape, it was not necessary for the prosecution to lay any foundation for the admission of testimony of defendant's statement that on the morning of the day on which the offense was committed he was so drunk that it would have been possible for him to have killed a man and not remember it, since such statement did not involve a criminal intent, and was therefore an admission rather than a confession.

2. Criminal law 🔑406(1), 516—Admission distinguished from confession.

A statement of guilty conduct, which does not involve a criminal intent, or which states facts amounting to justification, or excuse for the defendant's acts, is an admission rather than a confession.

3. Witnesses 🔑269(12)—Exclusion, during cross-examination, of testimony as to matter not testified to on direct examination held proper.

In a prosecution for rape, refusal to permit defendant to cross-examine complaining witness as to whether those present at her parents' house on the morning of the commission of the offense were drinking heavily held proper, where she had not testified as to the matter upon direct examination.

4. Criminal law 🔑448(11)—Question as to whether persons had been drinking pretty heavily held to call for a conclusion.

In a prosecution for rape, question, on cross-examination of prosecutrix, as to whether those present at her parents' house on the morning of the commission of the offense were not drinking pretty heavily, held objectionable as calling for the conclusion of the witness.

5. Criminal law 🔑695½—Statement of court on objection to testimony held not to have sustained objection.

Where counsel objected to a question as to whether the witness had been drinking, after the witness had answered "No," the statement of the court, on counsel's objection, that "I think I will sustain the objection. He said, 'No,' however," did not sustain the objection, but permitted the answer to remain before the jury.

6. Criminal law 🔑1170½(2)—Ruling on objection to question held harmless, in view of answer.

In a prosecution for rape, the ruling of the court on objection of the prosecution to question as to whether a witness had been drinking, if construed as sustaining the objection, was harmless, where the answer was that the witness had not been drinking.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Augustine Herrera was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Emmons & Aldrich, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

J. R. Dorsey, Dist. Atty., of Bakersfield, for the People.

CRAIG, J. Defendant, Herrera, was convicted of rape upon one Victoria Gomez, a girl of 14 years.

[1] The first ground of the appeal is that the defendant was not permitted to show, prior to it having been offered in evidence, that an alleged confession was secured under such circumstances as to make it involuntary. The statement related by a witness as made by the defendant was not a confession, but an admission; therefore it was unnecessary for the prosecution to have laid any foundation for its admission.

[2] The gist of the statement, which the witness testified defendant made, was that, upon the morning of the day on which the offense was committed, he was so drunk that it would have been possible for him to have killed a man and not remember it. This does not amount to a confession. When the statement of guilty conduct is such that it does not involve a criminal intent, or where it constitutes facts amounting to justification or excuse for the defendant's acts, it is an admission rather than a confession. People v. Weston, 169 Cal. 393, 146 Pac. 871; People v. Fowler, 178 Cal. 657, 174 Pac. 892; People v. Wilkins, 158 Cal. 530, 111 Pac. 612; People v. Le Roy, 65 Cal. 613, 4 Pac. 649. The statement attributed to Herrera does not involve a criminal intent.

[3-6] The second ground upon which defendant urges his appeal is alleged error on the part of the trial court in sustaining objections to questions put by defendant's counsel in cross-examining Victoria Gomez, the complaining witness, and Frank Castillo. The first-named witness was asked if all of those present at her parents' house in the morning of the commission of the offense were not drinking pretty heavily. She had given no testimony upon this matter upon direct examination; besides, the question called for a conclusion of the witness. The question put to Castillo, to which it is claimed an objection was sustained, was one asking the witness if he had been "drinking any at all." The witness answered, "No." After this response had been made, counsel for the people interposed an objection, and the court said: "I think I will sustain the objection. He said, 'No,' however." By this statement the objection was not sustained. The judge may have thought he would sustain it, but evidently came to a different decision before ruling, and permitted the answer "No" to remain before the jury. Even if, however, the court's remark were to be construed as a ruling adverse to appellant, the ruling was harmless because of the fact that the witness had answered, "No." Complaint is made that objection was improperly sustained to another question of the same character as the one last considered. Castillo was asked, "Were you drinking over in Kern?" to which he answered, "No, sir." The people again objected, but an examination of the record shows that the court made no ruling.

We find no prejudicial error, and the evidence amply sustains the verdict of guilty.

The judgment is affirmed.

BECKER v. TURPIN et al. (Civ. 4261.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 16, 1923.)

Partnership ⚷32—Agreement between fruit packer and a selling corporation held to create limited partnership, both parties of which were liable to grower.

An agreement, termed a "joint account agreement," between a purchaser and shipper of fruit and a corporation engaged in the sale of fruit in another state, wherein the parties agreed "to share equally all expenses in securing and buying fruit, also all expenses in packing same," and to divide equally all profits and losses accruing under the agreement, held to create a limited partnership and broad enough in its scope and effect to cover executory contracts for the purchase of grapes made by either party prior to the actual entering into the joint enterprise, and to make both parties liable under Civ. Code, § 1589, to a grower for a balance due under a contract for the sale of that year's crop, the benefit of which had been received by both parties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by Henry Becker against C. B. Turpin and R. Krasnow & Sons, Inc. Judgment for plaintiff, and the last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Harris & Hayhurst, L. B. Hayhurst and Rue C. Gibson, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Carl E. Lindsay and Edward F. Peters, both of Fresno, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in the plaintiff's favor in an action to recover a balance due upon the contract price of certain Malaga grapes sold and delivered by the plaintiff during the season of 1919. The contract for the sale and delivery of said grapes was made by the plaintiff with the defendant Turpin, doing business under the name of Golden Gate Packing Company, on the 10th day of July, 1919, and was in the usual form of an executory contract between the grower and buyer for the delivery thereafter of the grower's entire crop of grapes for the year 1919, at the agreed price of $60 per ton, payable upon delivery. Shortly after the making of this contract and about the time deliveries of grapes began to be made, the defendant Turpin and the defendant R. Krasnow & Sons, Inc., entered into what is denominated by the parties thereto as a joint account agreement, which was presently put in writing and which reads as follows:

> "Joint Account Agreement.
> "This agreement is entered into by and between K. Krasnow, representing R. Krasnow & Sons, Inc., hereinafter known as the first party, and C. B. Turpin, doing business as the Golden Gate Packing Company, hereinafter known as the second party, for the purpose of packing fruit jointly, as follows, to wit:
> "Both parties agree to share equally all expenses in securing or buying fruit, also all expenses in packing same; also both parties agree to divide equally all profits and losses accruing from this agreement. The second party agrees to pack to the best of his ability such fruit as he is able to procure, of the very best quality possible for him to obtain; to superintend and have charge of said pack of fruit. The first party agrees to sell the product of said pack to > the very best of his ability, to render account sales promptly, etc.

> "The second party retains all rights as to labels, firm name, trade-marks, good will, etc., as sole property.
> "Both parties agree to transact all the business of the company without charge; to buy, pack, and sell the product of the same without charge.
> "The second party agrees to render estimated costs for each car as soon as possible after shipment.
> R. Krasnow,
> "For R. Krasnow & Sons, Inc.
> "C. B. Turpin,
> "For Golden Gate Packing Co."

The method by which the parties to this latter agreement did business thereunder was as follows: Turpin received and packed the grapes after they were delivered to him at his warehouse; paid for all labor and material used; loaded them in the cars; took bills of lading in the name of the Golden Gate Packing Company; consigned the first car to the Associated Fruit Company and the rest of them to R. Krasnow & Sons, Inc., Pittsburg, Pa., and later indorsed and delivered the bills of lading, together with an estimate of the cost of each car to R. Krasnow & Sons, Inc., who advanced him approximately $1,000 on each car as the bills of lading were indorsed and turned over. The rest of the costs were advanced and the profits divided after the returns were received from the cars sold. The plaintiff delivered in all a little over 44 tons of grapes to the warehouse of the Golden Gate Packing Company, which grapes were there packed, loaded on cars and consigned to Krasnow & Sons, Inc., and were duly received and sold by the latter under said agreement. The plaintiff received from the Golden Gate Packing Company the sum of $1,200 on account of his crop so delivered, but not being able to obtain payment of the balance due him after the delivery of all his said crop of grapes brought this action in assumpsit against said defendants for the recovery of the balance due. The defendants appeared separately, filing general demurrers, which were overruled. The defendant Turpin did not further plead, but the defendants R. Krasnow and R. Krasnow & Sons, Inc., filed their separate answer denying generally and specifically all of the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint and praying that he take nothing from them or either of them by his said action. Upon the trial of the cause the court, over the said defendants' objection, permitted the introduction in evidence of the so-called "joint account agreement" above set forth, and thereafter and on the strength of said agreement made its findings of fact, construing said agreement to be a joint enterprise agreement between the parties thereto for the procuring, packing, shipping, and disposal of fruit, the costs, expenses, profits, and losses of said joint enterprise to be equally borne by the parties to said agreement. The court further found that the defendant Krasnow & Sons, Inc., received, accepted, and retained the benefit of the proceeds of the fruit sold and delivered by said plaintiff, and by so doing assumed the payment of the purchase price thereof under the terms of said joint enterprise agreement, and thus became indebted to the plaintiff for the balance of the purchase price of said plaintiff's crop of grapes according to the terms of the latter's contract with said defendant Turpin, and rendered judgment accordingly in the plaintiff's favor for the sum of $1,446 against both said Turpin and said Krasnow & Sons, Inc. From such judgment the latter prosecutes this appeal.

The several contentions which the appellant relies upon for a reversal of this judgment are: (1) Its objection to the sufficiency of the complaint; (2) its objection to the admission of the Krasnow-Taylor agreement in evidence; and (3) its objection to the finding of the trial court above referred to. All of these objections depend upon the interpretation to be placed upon the so-called "joint account agreement," which is above set forth in full. If that agreement is to be construed as an agreement for the formation of a limited partnership between C. B. Turpin, doing business under the name of Golden Gate Packing Company, and R. Krasnow & Sons, Inc., for the procuring, purchasing, packing, and marketing of the fruit crop for the year 1919, dividing equally all profits and losses arising out of said joint enterprise; and if said agreement is broad enough in its intendment to cover such executory fruit contracts as said Turpin had negotiated prior to entering into said joint venture, it would seem to follow that it was such an agreement as the grape grower with whom said Turpin entered into such executory contracts, either before or after the date of its execution, could enforce against either party to such agreement in actions for the unpaid purchase price of their product received and disposed of by either party thereto. Looking to said agreement between Turpin and R. Krasnow & Sons, Inc., we can arrive at no other conclusion than that such was its scope and effect. It is expressly denominated a "joint account agreement" and its first binding obligation is that:

> "Both parties agree to share equally all expenses in securing or buying fruits; also all expenses in packing same; also both parties agree to divide equally all profits and losses accruing from this agreement."

No subsequent clause or part of this agreement lessens the force and effect of these opening clauses thereof. That they were sufficiently broad to cover executory contracts for the purchase of grapes made by either party prior to the actual entering into this joint enterprise is evident from the construction which the parties themselves placed upon their said agreement, since the grapes of this plaintiff, delivered after the date of the execution of said agreement, were received, packed, and disposed of by the parties thereto under its terms. We can, in fact, discover no substantial difference between this agreement and that construed by the Supreme Court to be a limited partnership agreement in the case of Westcott v. Gilman, 170 Cal. 562, 150 Pac. 777, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 437. In construing an almost identical agreement the court says:

> "The contract in evidence in this case leaves little doubt but that the relationship between these defendants was that of a limited partnership or joint venture. Of course a partnership may be organized for the prosecution of one or two adventures, as well as for the conduct of a general and continuous business. It is not of the essence of a partnership that the parties to it should have known that their contract in law created a partnership. Chaplain v. Hughes, 104 Cal. 302, 37 Pac. 1048, 38 Pac. 109; Hunter v. Martin, 57 Cal. 365. If by contract or by conduct or by both they have in point of law engaged in a partnership venture, so far as third persons are concerned they cannot be heard to deny the relationship and the liabilities arising therefrom. It is plain from the very terms of the agreement between these defendants that it measures up to the definition of a partnership as declared by section 2395 of the Civil Code. It was an association of two persons to carry on a definite business and to divide the profits and losses of that business."

In that case, as in this, the dissatisfied grower sued the parties to such joint enterprise and recovered against both. If upon the authority of the above-cited case we are to hold that the agreement between Turpin and Krasnow & Sons, Inc., was a partnership agreement for the handling and disposal of the fruit crop of that year secured by either; and if, as the evidence shows, the parties thereto did in fact receive, handle, and dispose of the fruit crop of this plaintiff for their joint benefit under said agreement, then there is no escape from the obligation imposed upon both under section 1589 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows:

> "A voluntary acceptance of the benefit of a transaction is equivalent to a consent to all the obligations arising from it, so far as the facts are known, or ought to be known, to the person accepting."

It requires no argument to show that Krasnow & Sons, Inc., in contracting with C. B. Turpin under the name of Golden Gate Packig Company "to share equally all expenses in securing or buying fruit," knew, or ought to have known, that the fruit which said corporation shortly thereafter began to receive from said Turpin or said Golden Gate Packing Company was fruit which had been secured by the latter in the course of carrying such agreement into effect. This being so, the said corporation cannot avoid the effect of their full acceptance of the benefit of the transaction between the plaintiff and said Turpin by and through which the grape crop of the former was received, handled, and disposed of under said joint enterprise agreement.

We do not deem any further comment upon the authorities cited by either of the parties to this appeal necessary to make this proposition plain. The case of Westcott v. Gilman, supra, seems to cover and dispose of every question presented upon this appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District. California. Feb. 24, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 23, 1923.)

Master and servant 🔑303—Automobile owner, permitting use by son known to be reckless driver, is liable for son's negligence.

The owner of an automobile, who permits his son to use the car with knowledge that the son is a reckless driver, is liable for damage caused by son in driving the car, being negligent in permitting a reckless driver to use his automobile.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by William Rocca against D. H. Steinmetz and another. Judgment of dismissal, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 208 Pac. 964.

J. C. Webster and C. H. Grayson, both of Sonora, for appellant.

J. B. Curtin, of Sonora, and Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The defendants are father and son, and the complaint charges Steinmetz, Jr., with having recklessly and negligently driven an automobile off the road and down an embankment, whereby one Marguerite L. Rocca, mother of William Rocca, was killed, she being at the time a passenger in the automobile and a guest of said driver. It is alleged:

> That Steinmetz, Sr., was the owner of the automobile, and bought and kept it for the use and pleasure of his family, including said son, that said Steinmetz, Jr., "was at all the times herein mentioned a careless and reckless person and careless and reckless driver of said automobile, and the said D. H. Steinmetz, knowing said D. H. Steinmetz, Jr., to be such a careless and reckless person and careless and reckless driver of said automobile, negligently allowed and permitted said D. H. Steinmetz, Jr., to drive said automobile, and that, at and immediately prior to the time of the accident hereinafter referred to, defendant D. H. Steinmetz, Jr., was driving said automobile with the consent, knowledge, and permission of defendant D. H. Steinmetz, and was acting in furtherance of and not apart from the service and control of defendant D. H. Steinmetz, and within the purposes for which said automobile was purchased."

A demurrer was interposed by Steinmetz, Sr., which was sustained by the court, and from the judgment of dismissal of the action as to him the appeal has been taken. While the demurrer was both general and special, the only point argued relates to the sufficiency of the facts to charge the father with any liability for the accident. It is the claim of respondent that no such liability is shown, and he thinks the situation is covered by this question:

> "May a father, who owns an automobile, be held liable in an action for damage resulting from personal injuries simply and solely because he loaned his automobile to an adult son, who took the same for a pleasure ride, there being no business relation between father and son, in connection with the ride that resulted disastrously?"

He answers the question in the negative, and in support thereof he cites Spence v. Fisher, 184 Cal. 209, 193 Pac. 255, 14 A. L. R. 1083. If the case were as thus presented by respondent, we should be compelled to agree with him in his conclusion. In Spence v. Fisher, indeed, the question was, as stated by the learned Chief Justice:

> "As to the liability of a father who is not guilty of personal negligence in the matter, for damages sustained by third parties by reason of the negligent driving of an automobile, by an adult member of his family, when such member of the family is using the same for his or her own purposes, the automobile being owned and maintained by the father for the general convenience, use, and pleasure of his family, and the particular member of the family operating the same having his permission to use the same at his or her pleasure."

Therein the liability of the father was sought to be maintained upon the ground that the daughter, in thus using the machine for her own convenience and pleasure, was the agent of the father, and was thereby carrying on his business, since he purchased the automobile for that purpose. The doctrine of respondeat superior was therefore invoked, but the Supreme Court held this view to be unsound, although admitting that upon the subject the authorities are in hopeless conflict. This case, though, presents the vitally additional feature that the father permitted and allowed the son to use the automobile, knowing that said son was a careless and reckless person and a careless and reckless driver. Such element distinguishes this from any case which has heretofore been considered by the appellate courts of this state. In this view we are confirmed by the declaration of the Supreme Court in the opinion rendered on the motion to dismiss this appeal (208 Pac. 964), as follows:

> "It is not necessary to say anything in regard to the liability of D. H. Steinmetz further than this, that his liability has never been decided in any court in this state. He is not sued as the mere owner of the automobile, but he is sued as the owner who has allowed and permitted his son to drive his automobile, knowing that his son is a reckless and careless driver of said automobile. That fact differentiates it from all other cases on the subject."

While it is true that this important question has not been finally adjudicated in California, it must be admitted that the authorities from other jurisdictions, with but a single dissent as far as our investigation has gone, uphold the contention of appellant that his complaint shows liability on the part of Steinmetz, Sr., for the accident.

In Berry on Automobiles (3d Ed.) § 1040, the rule is thus stated:

> "Aside from the relation of master and servant, the owner of an automobile may be rendered liable for injuries inflicted by its operation by one whom he has permitted to drive the same on the ground that such person, by reason of his want of age or experience, or his physical or mental condition, or his known habit of recklessness, is incompetent to safely operate the machine. An automobile is a machine that is capable of doing great damage if not carefully handled, and for this reason the owner must use care in allowing others to assume control over it. If he intrusts it to a child of such tender years that the probable consequence is that he will injure others in the operation of the car, or if the person permitted to operate the car is known to be incompetent and incapable of properly running it, although not a child, the owner will be held accountable for the damage done, because his negligence in intrusting the car to an incompetent person is deemed to be the proximate cause of the damage. In such a case of mere permissive use, the liability of the owner would rest, not alone upon the fact of ownership, but upon the combined negligence of the owner and the driver; negligence of the owner in intrusting the machine to an incompetent driver, and of the driver in its operation."

The same rule of negligence is announced in the second edition of "The Law Applied to Motor Vehicles," by Babbitt, § 910, and the very recent work of Huddy on Automobiles (6d Ed.) § 662.

In Raub v. Donn, 254 Pa. 203, 98 Atl. 861, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania held that the trial court did not err in instructing the jury:

> "It is the duty of a man to see that his automobile is not run by a careless, reckless person, but that it is in the hands of a skillful and competent person."

In Gardiner v. Solomon, 200 Ala. 115, 75 South. 623, L. R. A. 1917F, 380, it was declared that, while automobiles are not regarded as inherently dangerous instrumentalities, and the general rule is that the owner is not liable for the negligent use of the same by another, except upon the theory of respondeat superior, yet an exception exists when he knowingly intrusts it to one who is so incompetent as to convert it into a dangerous instrumentality. It was also held therein that the allegation:

> "That Thomas 'was, and had long been, a careless, indifferent, heedless, and reckless driver of such car,' was the equivalent of charging that he was incompetent."

In Tyree v. Tudor et al., 183 N. C. 340, 111 S. E. 714, the Supreme Court of North Carolina held that:

> "Where an automobile owner, knowing the reckless character of his 16 year old son, gave him permission to use the car to convey a young lady to and from a dance, he was liable for his son's negligent driving causing her death."

There are other decisions to the same effect, but further citation is deemed unnecessary.

In his reply brief respondent, referring to the authority of Berry, declares that the cases cited by him are not in point. Brown v. Green, 6 Boyce (Del.) 449, 100 Atl. 475, he affirms, places the liability upon the ground that the automobile was driven by the servant of the defendant. It does not appear from the decision whether the driver was acting within the scope of his authority, but the Delaware court declared:

> "The negligent act averred in these two counts is in permitting the motor truck to be operated upon the road by an unskilled and incompetent servant, and thereby ran the truck into the plaintiff and injured him. It is the opinion of the court that the act of negligence complained of is sufficiently described, it being also alleged that the injury was caused by reason of such negligent act."

It is true the court refers to the driver as the "servant" of the defendant, but it is a fair inference that the distinguishing feature in the mind of the court was the unskillfulness and incompetency of the driver of which "the defendant had knowledge or should have had knowledge," this latter element appearing in the reported statement of the facts.

It seems to be true that the decision in Lynde v. Browning, 2 Tenn. C. C. A. 262, was grounded upon the doctrine that the driver was the agent of his father, the owner of the machine, while the former was operating the car for his own pleasure with the father's consent, and to that extent it is opposed to the doctrine of Spence v. Fisher, supra, and is not the law in this state.

It is said that Parker v. Wilson, 179 Ala. 361, 60 South. 150, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 87, did not involve the point and was exactly like Spence v. Fisher and decided the same way. This is true, although, as dictum, the court declared:

> "No doubt liability will arise where the owner intrusts a machine of such dangerous potentialities to the hands of an inexperienced or incompetent person, whether child or servant. In the case of a mere permissive use, the liability of the owner would rest, not alone upon the fact of ownership, but upon the combined negligence of the owner and the driver, negligence of the one in intrusting the machine to an incompetent driver, of the other in its operation."

It is admitted by respondent that Beville v. Taylor, 202 Ala. 305, 80 South. 370, and Gardiner v. Solomon, 200 Ala. 115, 75 South. 621, L. R. A. 1917F, 380, do sustain the text.

Respondent is entirely mistaken in the claim that Allen v. Bland (Tex. Civ. App.) 168 S. W. 35, and Raub v. Donn, 254 Pa. 203, 98 Atl. 861, were like the Spence Case and decided the same way. In the former the liability of the father was expressly and exclusively grounded upon the claim that his son, who was driving the car, was—> "a very small, weak, reckless, careless, and inexperienced boy, wholly unfit and incapacitated to drive or steer an automobile * * * all of which facts were well known to defendant."

In the latter it was held that there was sufficient evidence to submit to the jury the question "whether the son was acting within the scope of his duties as an employee of his father at the time of the accident" and also, since there was evidence that "the son had a reputation for reckless driving, of which defendant was aware, it was not error to submit that question to the jury, and to charge that it was the duty of a man to see that his automobile was not run by a careless or reckless person, but by a skillful and competent operator."

As to the cases cited by respondent, it may be said that in only one of them it is held that liability will not attach to the owner if he has, with knowledge of the character of the driver, allowed and permitted his automobile to be driven by an incompetent or reckless person and thereby, through the negligence of said driver, injury has resulted to a third person.

In Neubrand v. Kraft, 169 Iowa, 444, 151 N. W. 455, L. R. A. 1915D, 691, the liability was sought to be established upon the ground that "one who lets an automobile for hire is responsible for the proper skill and care of the person to whom he intrusts it," in other words, that he must inquire at his peril as to the competency of the driver. This was the question considered by the Iowa Supreme Court when it declared:

> "But the owner of a livery stable or garage making a business of letting teams or carriages or motor cars to customers * * * has never been held to any such rule of responsibility by any court so far as the precedents have been called to our attention, and we think there is no general rule or principle necessitating such conclusion."

The court, however, by way of dictum, did say:

> "Cases may be imagined, perhaps, where an owner recklessly lets his spirited team or his automobile to an immature child, or to a person who is intoxicated or otherwise manifestly incompetent to manage or control it, with the natural result of a collision upon the public street and consequent injury to others. It may well be that under such circumstances the owner would be held liable in damages, not because the hirer is his servant or because as owner he is required to vouch to the public for the competency of all persons to whom he may let his teams or his cars for hire, but because he knew the incompetency of this particular driver and the imminent peril to which he thereby exposed others who were in the lawful use of the streets and as a person of ordinary prudence should have refrained from so doing."

Brinkman v. Zuckerman, 192 Mich. 624, 159 N. W. 316, and Cohen v. Meador, 119 Va. 429, 89 S. E. 876, are not in point, as there was no claim in either case that the driver was reckless or incompetent or that the owner had any reason to believe that the driver was not a proper person to be intrusted with the car.

The only case cited by respondent that seems to uphold his contention is Doran v. Thomsen, 74 N. J. Law, 445, 66 Atl. 897, wherein it was alleged in the third count of the complaint that:

> "The defendant carelessly allowed his daughter, 'an inexperienced, careless, and incompetent person,' to operate the vehicle in such manner as not to have it under proper control, well knowing that it was operated by his daughter, and that she was inexperienced and incompetent, and defendant 'utterly failed and neglected to take any means to prevent the said motor vehicle from being so operated by his said daughter.'"

The Supreme Court of New Jersey in that case seems to have lost sight of the distinguishing characteristic of that count and to have treated it as an attempt to charge liability upon the ground of agency.

In considering the decisions it is helpful to classify them as suggested in the note to Neubrand v. Kraft, supra, in L. R. A. 1915D, p. 692:

> "(1) Cases where the car was taken without the consent of the owner; (2) cases where the owner intrusted the car to a competent and ordinarily careful person, who, however, was negligent on the particular occasion; (3) cases where the owner intrusted the car to a person who was known to be incompetent or negligent, or not known to be competent or careful."

As the author states, in the first of these classes there is no ground for holding the owner liable, at least in the absence of negligence on his part in guarding against the unauthorized use of his car. In the second class the question of liability turns upon the doctrine of respondeat superior, in other words, whether the driver was acting within the scope of his authority as an agent of the owner. "In the third class," the author says, "there is a tendency, on the part of the later cases at least, to hold the owner responsible because of his negligence in intrusting the car to a person known to be incompetent or negligent."

In its simplest form the question is whether the owner when he permits an incompetent or reckless person, whom he knows to be incompetent or reckless, to take and operate his car, acts as an ordinary prudent person would be expected to act under the circumstances. If he were to intrust his car to a person whom he knew to be insane or intoxicated or utterly incompetent to run a car, it would certainly shock the common understanding to hold that he was not chargeable with negligence. There can be no difference in principle but only in degree, where he knows the driver to be careless and reckless in the operation of the machine. In any such case, consideration for the safety of others requires him to withhold his consent and thereby refrain from participating in any accident that is liable to happen from the careless and reckless driving of such a dangerous instrumentality.

It must be remembered that we are simply passing upon the sufficiency of the complaint to state a cause of action against Steinmetz, Sr., and of that we feel no doubt.

The judgment is reversed.

RAMSAY v. RODGERS et al. (Civ. 4467.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 14, 1923.)

1. Damages ⟹85—That provision for liquidated damages is void does not invalidate contract.

Under Civ. Code, § 1670, a contract of employment was not void as a whole because it contained an invalid provision for liquidated damages, but upon its breach, by the employee's discharge without cause, he would be entitled to recover his actual damages.

2. Master and servant ⟹41(1)—Damages for discharge are prima facie contract price for services during term.

In the case of contracts of employment for a fixed term, the measure of damages for breach of covenant against discharge without cause is prima facie the contract price for the employee's services during the term; that is, the amount which the employee would have received under the contract had its terms been fulfilled.

3. Master and servant ⟹39(1)—Excessive damages demanded for discharge held not to invalidate complaint.

That plaintiff in action for wrongful discharge sets forth in his statement of damages an amount in excess of that which as actual damages he would be entitled to recover does not render his complaint defective as against general demurrer, as his having obtained or having been able to obtain other employment are matters of defense for defendants to plead.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by T. H. Ramsay against Elizabeth A. Rodgers and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 207 Pac. 516.

John E. Bennett, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Creed, Jones & Dall, of San Francisco (W. K. Powell, of San Francisco, of counsel) for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This action was instituted by the plaintiff for recovery of the sum of $12,750, with interest, alleged to be due the plaintiff from the defendants under the terms of a certain written contract for the employment of plaintiff by the defendants as general manager of certain real properties of the latter situate in California and Nevada and for a period from and after December 1, 1916, at a salary of $6,000 per annum, payable in monthly installments, and for additional compensation of 5 per cent. of the amount of the net annual income in excess of $25,000 derived from the operation or leasing of said properties, to be computed in the manner specified in said agreement. The contract, which was attached to the complaint as an exhibit and expressly made a part thereof, contained the following provision:

> "It is mutually understood and agreed between the parties hereto that the owners shall not discharge the general manager during the term of this employment except on account of a breach by the general manager of some material part of this agreement going to the essence thereof. The right is reserved, however, to the owners, of discharging the general manager at any time, but, if they discharge him without legal cause, the owners obligate themselves to pay to him at the time of such discharge, in addition to the amount of compensation due him at such time according to the terms of this agreement, a full year's compensation. If, however, such discharge shall occur prior to the completion of the first year of service, then the extra amount of such compensation shall be the sum of six thousand dollars ($6,000.00); if, however, such discharge shall occur after the first year of his employment as such general manager, then the amount of such additional compensation over and above his regular salary to be paid to the general manager shall be the sum of six thousand dollars ($6,000.00) plus five per cent. (5%) of the estimated net income over and above the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000.00), of the year during which he may be so discharged; and the general manager shall have no right to cease his services as such general manager except on account of a material breach of said agreement by the owners or either of them going to the essence thereof."

Plaintiff, in his complaint, alleged that he entered upon the performance of the obligations of said contract on his part to be performed and had continued to perform the same until the 1st day of March, 1919, when the defendants without cause discharged said plaintiff. He further alleged that there was due him at the time of his said discharge on account of his salary for the month of February, 1919, the sum of $500, which was unpaid, and that there became due him thereafter, pursuant to the terms of said contract, the sum of $6,000 as his full year's compensation for the year succeeding said date of his discharge, and the further sum of $6,250, being 5 per cent. of the amount of income of said properties in excess of $25,000 for said year, which sums also remain unpaid. He prayed judgment for the sum of $12,750, the aggregate of these several sums, with legal interest from the date of his discharge, and costs of suit. Defendants demurred to said complaint generally, and also presented a special demurrer alleging certain specified uncertainties therein. These demurrers being overruled, the defendants answered, denying generally the averments of the plaintiff's complaint. Later they asked and obtained leave to file an amended answer and cross-complaint, the former of which embraced amplified denials, and the latter alleged certan breaches of said contract on the plaintiff's part, which it was asserted justified his discharge, from which the defendants were alleged to have sustained a large amount of damage for which they sought affirmative relief through their said cross-complaint. The cause was tried before a jury, which returned a verdict in the plaintiff's favor for the sum of $10,000. Judgment was entered accordingly. A motion for a new trial was presented and denied, whereupon this appeal was taken.

[1-3] The appellants present as the record upon this appeal only the judgment roll, and, this being so, the sole question which is presented for review is as to the sufficiency of the plaintiff's complaint. The contention of the appellants is that the complaint shows upon its face that the action is one for the recovery of liquidated damages for the breach of the agreement set forth therein; that the provisions of said agreement as to payment of the sums sought to be recovered by the terms of said complaint amount in law to a claim for liquidated damages in violation of the provisions of section 1670 of the Civil Code, and that, this being so, the only damages to which the plaintiff would be entitled upon the breach of said agreement would be for actual damages; that the complaint contains no averment as to the actual damage sustained by plaintiff from the alleged breach of said agreement, and is therefore fatally defective. It may be conceded for the sake of the argument that the provision in the contract sued upon for the payment of certain stipulated sums to the plaintiff in the event of his discharge from the defendants' employ without cause amount to an agreement for the payment of liquidated damages. It may also be conceded for the sake of the argument that such provision in said contract was void under the terms of section 1670 of the Civil Code. It does not follow, however, that the entire contract is for that reason void. On the contrary, said section of the Code provides that such contract shall only be void to the extent of such void agreement for liquidated damages. This contract being otherwise valid, upon its breach through the discharge of the plaintiff by the defendants without cause, the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover his actual damages for such breach. In the case of contracts of employment for a fixed term the measure of damages for the breach of the covenant against the discharge of employees without cause is prima facie the contract price for his services during the term; or, in other words, the amount which the employee would have received under said contract had its terms been fulfilled. Seymour v. Oelrichs, 156 Cal. 782, 801, 106 Pac. 88, 134 Am. St. Rep. 154; Hancock v. Board of Education, 140 Cal. 554, 562, 74 Pac. 44. This being so, the plaintiff, in setting forth the contract in his complaint, in alleging performance on his part, in stating its breach on the part of the defendants through his discharge without cause, and in alleging his damages thereby to have been a fixed amount, stated a cause of action. The cases of Long Beach v. Dodge, 135 Cal. 405, 67 Pac. 499, and Sherman v. Gray, 11 Cal. App. 351, 104 Pac. 1004, cited by appellants, have no application to a case involving the discharge of an employee wherein the damage for such discharge is prima facie the contract price for his services during the term. The fact that the plaintiff may have set forth in his statement of damages an amount in excess of that which as actual damages he would be entitled to recover did not render his complaint defective, at least as against a general demurrer, and the defendants do not specify any such defect in their special demurrer, and hence could not take advantage of such defect, if any, upon this appeal. If it was the contention of the defendants that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover as actual damages the full amount to which he would have been entitled upon the fulfillment by him of the terms of said contract, which was interrupted by his discharge without cause, as, for example, that he had obtained or by the exercise of reasonable effort could have obtained employment elsewhere, these were defensive matters which could have been set forth if they existed, in the defendant's answer. Sutherland on Damages (4th Ed.) § 693, and cases cited; Hancock v. Board of Education, supra; Seymour v. Oelrichs, supra; Rosenberger v. Pacific Coast Ry., 111 Cal. 313, 43 Pac. 963. The defendants, however, made no such claim in either their answer or cross-complaint filed therein, relying solely upon their contention and assertion that the plaintiff had been discharged for cause, consisting of his willful and habitual neglect of duty in the performance of his obligations as their employee. In conceding for the purpose of the foregoing discussion that the defendants' claim that the provision in said contract relating to the payment of a stipulated compensation in the event of his discharge without cause is void as in violation of sections 1670 and 1671 of the Civil Code, we are not to be understood as admitting such to be the fact. On the contrary, looking to said contract as a whole, we are of the opinion that the actual damages which would be sustained by the plaintiff through the breach of its obligation that he should not be discharged during the term of his employment without cause are such as in the nature of the case it would be impractical or extremely difficult to fix. We do not deem it necessary, however, to amplify the discussion of this question in the state of the record before us. The appeal is presented upon the judgment roll alone, and we have therefore no means of knowing what the evidence in this case disclosed with relation to the actual damage sustained by the plaintiff through his said discharge. The jury evidently determined that such discharge was without cause, and, having so determined, it fixed the plaintiff's damage at the sum of $10,000. By so doing it gave the plaintiff an amount in damages not only much less than the amount of his stipulated damage for such discharge under the terms of the contract, but also an amount much less than the sum he would have been entitled to receive as his compensation under said contract, had its terms of service and employment been fulfilled. It thus becomes immaterial whether the provisions of said contract with regard to the payment of liquidated damages are valid or void, since in either event the amount of the plaintiff's recovery was less than that to which he would have been entitled upon the breach of said agreement.

Finding no error in this record, the judgment is affirmed.

CHUCOVICH v. SAN FRANCISCO SECURITIES CORPORATION et al. (Civ. 4193.)

1. Estoppel 🔑72—Title of innocent purchaser held good against assignee of conditional seller.

Under the rule of Civ. Code, § 3543, that where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he by whose negligence it happened must be the sufferer, where a securities corporation loaned money to retail automobile company on its conditional sale contract covering a truck, and, on buyer's default in payment, the automobile company repossessed itself of the truck, under instructions from the securities company and on the authority from that company to resell the truck, and did resell it to an innocent purchaser, such resale conveyed valid title to the purchaser, although the sole owner of the automobile company appropriated to his own use the proceeds of the resale.

2. Estoppel 🔑75—One placing automobile in another's possession estopped to set up registration law.

Where securities corporation loaning money to retail automobile company on its contract of conditional sale of a truck had the automobile company, on buyer's default, retake the truck and authorized that company to resell it, and an innocent purchaser bought it from that company, the securities corporation could not successfully contend that the sale to the last purchaser was void and did not convey title to him because there was no showing that any registration certificate was assigned and delivered to such purchaser when he bought the truck, as required by Motor Vehicle Act 1919, § 8, for the securities corporation, having placed the truck in the purchaser's possession by its own act, was estopped from setting up the statute.

3. Replevin 🔑76—Damages for wrongful detention of truck held rental value during wrongful deprivation of use.

In an action of claim and delivery to recover truck, the measure of damages for wrongful detention held to be its rental value during the period plaintiff was wrongfully deprived of its use.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. E. Woolley, Judge.

Action by M. D. Chucovich against the San Francisco Securities Corporation and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

I. P. Aten, of Fresno (M. K. Harris, of Fresno, of counsel), for appellant.

Everts, Ewing & Wild and T. M. Stuart, all of Fresno, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This is an action in claim and delivery. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant San Francisco Securities Corporation appeals.

The appellant (hereafter referred to as the Securities Company) was engaged in the business of loaning money to automobile dealers upon conditional sales contracts, the payment of which was guaranteed by the dealers. On the 21st day of January, 1920, the Knox-Mundorff Company (hereafter referred to as the Knox Company) was a retail dealer in automobiles in Fresno, and at that time was the owner and in possession of a certain Fageol truck. On the last-mentioned date it entered into a contract of conditional sale of this truck with one Willard Brooks for the sum of $3,600, $1,200 of which was paid by Brooks at the time the contract was entered into, and he agreed to pay the balance in installments at different times thereafter. Among other things, the contract provided that, should Brooks make default in any payment or violate other provisions of the contract, the Knox Company might at its option, without previous notice or demand, retake possession of the property, and that the contract should be at an end and all rights of the purchaser terminate.

The day after this transaction was had this company assigned all its benefits in the contract to the defendant Securities Company, and guaranteed the amount due thereunder, which was the sum of $2,400. Several days later Brooks took delivery of the truck. On March 11, 1920, the Securities Company wrote to the Knox Company that Brooks was delinquent in his February payment, and that another installment would be due March 15, 1920. The company advised Knox that, if payment was not received promptly on this last-named date, it would take the necessary steps to repossess the truck and turn the same back to the Knox Company under its arrangement and have it close the account. No further payments having been made by Brooks, the Knox Company, acting under instructions from the Securities Company, repossessed itself of the truck and made arrangements for its resale. At no time during these transactions did the Securities Company ever have or receive actual or physical possession of the automobile.

In October, 1920, Knox succeeded to all interest in the Knox-Mundorff Company and thereafter conducted the business in his own name. From the time this Company repossessed itself of the truck up to April 11, 1921, it remained in the undisputed possession of the Knox Company at its place of business for the purpose of resale, with the full knowledge and consent, and under the express instructions, of the Securities Company. On the last-mentioned date Knox made a conditional sale of the truck to respondent Chucovich, who immediately took possession of the same. The purchase price was $2,567.50. Of this sum $1,567.50 was paid in cash, and the balance, amounting to the sum of $1,000, was to be paid in installments, for which promissory notes were given. The contract with respondent, together with the notes executed by him, were sold and assigned to the General Motor Acceptance Company. Thereafter plaintiff took up and paid the notes in full. Knox appropriated to his own use the $1,567.50 in cash paid by respondent, and also the proceeds of the notes, which he had sold to the Motor Acceptance Company. There is also evidence to indicate that in other transactions with the Securities Company the Knox Company had been delinquent, but it is unnecessary to discuss this feature of the case.

At the date of the resale of the truck respondent Chucovich was not known to appellant Securities Company, nor did that company learn of the sale until after it was consummated and respondent had the truck in his possession. On ascertaining the facts the Securities Company took possession of the property without the consent of respondent, and this action was brought by him to recover the same and damages for its detention.

It appeared in evidence that respondent had no knowledge whatever of any claims of any persons to the property in question, and that he purchased the same in good faith from Knox, in whose possession it was under instructions from the Securities Company to sell the same.

Upon these facts the court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff together with damages in the sum of $1,080.10 for unlawful detention.

[1] As grounds for reversal it is first claimed that, as the evidence shows that the title to the truck at the time of the sale to respondent was in either the Knox Company or the Securities Company, and that as neither of these companies had conveyed title to Knox, he could convey none to respondent. We see no merit in this contention. Aside from the fact that the evidence strongly indicates that the Knox-Mundorff Company was owned and operated by Knox individually, it affirmatively appears therefrom that express authority was given to Knox personally to make a resale of the truck after it had been repossessed from Brooks, the first purchaser. Then, again, the resale was not made until after the time when it is admitted that Knox was the sole owner of the Knox-Mundorff Company.

But whether authority was given to Knox personally or to the firm which he represented is to our minds of no consequence. The record does not disclose, so far as we have been able to ascertain, whether the Knox-Mundorff Company was a partnership or corporation; but, however that may be as a member of that concern Knox had authority to make sales and to convey title. The Securities Company, having given it possession of the property for sale, was bound by its acts. It is a familiar maximum of jurisprudence that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he by whose negligence it happened must be the sufferer. Section 3543, Civ. Code. Appellant Securities Company had not only clothed Knox, but also his company, with control and possession and with express power of disposition of the property; and under such circumstances appellant is estopped to deny the authority of Knox or his company as against an innocent purchaser. Shirey v. All Day & All Night Bank, 166 Cal. 50, 134 Pac. 1001; Fowles v. First Nat. Bank of Cal., 167 Cal. 653, 140 Pac. 271.

We conclude, therefore, upon this question that Knox had complete authority to and that he did convey a valid title in the property to the respondent.

[2] The further point is urged that, even conceding this to be true, the sale to respondent was void and had no effect whatsoever to convey title to him, since the evidence fails to show that any registration certificate was assigned and delivered to respondent at the time he bought the truck from Knox. This contention is based upon the claim that the sale was not made in conformity with section 8 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1919, p. 191), relating to the transfer and registration of ownership of any registered motor vehicle. The defendant is in no position to raise such question, for by his own act he placed the automobile in the respondent's possession; and he is therefore estopped from evoking the provisions of the statute referred to. Boles v. Stiles (Cal. Sup.) 204 Pac. 848.

[3] And, finally, the appellant complains that the evidence does not support the finding of the court that the respondent had been damaged in the amount awarded for the wrongful detention of the truck. The proper measure of damages was its rental value during the period the respondent was wrongfully deprived of its use. No useful purpose would be subserved by a review of the evidence upon this subject. The award made was less in amount than the evidence shows respondent to have been entitled to.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

COALINGA MOHAWK OIL CO. v. STANDARD OIL CO. (Civ. 4352.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 7, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 5, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷854(4)—Reasons stated for exclusion of evidence are not controlling on appeal.

The reasons stated by the trial court in support of its ruling, excluding certain evidence as irrelevant, are not controlling nor exclusive on appeal, but the ruling will be sustained, if the offered evidence was irrelevant for any reason.

2. Sales ⚷358(4)—Price at which buyer sold similar oil held irrelevant in determining price under contract.

Where a contract for the purchase of oil from the producer provided that, if the buyer paid more for similar oil produced by others in that district than the contract price, it would pay the seller the additional price, evidence that under a contract between the buyer and the railway company for the exchange of oil the buyer received oil at a value which made the price received for the oil it sold greater than the contract price it paid the seller, was irrelevant, since the value of the oil to the buyer was the price which it had to pay for it, and not the price at which it was offering it for sale.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by the Coalinga Mohawk Oil Company against the Standard Oil Company, to recover additional compensation for oil delivered under a contract. Judgment for defendant on directed verdict, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Walter H. Linforth and Henshaw & Black, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an action upon a contract entered into between plaintiff and defendant for the recovery of additional compensation, claimed by plaintiff to be due for oil delivered under the contract. At the conclusion of plaintiff's case, the court directed the jury to bring in a verdict for defendant. The appeal is from the judgment rendered on that verdict.

The contract between the parties was dated May 17, 1915, and a copy thereof appears in the record. It provided for the sale by plaintiff, for the period of one year from the date thereof, of certain crude oil produced by plaintiff from the premises described in the contract. The controversy between the parties arises under the price clause of the contract, which reads as follows:

> "The first party agrees to sell and deliver to the second party, and the second party agrees to accept said oil under the conditions herein named, and, except as herein otherwise provided, the first party agrees to accept, and the second party agrees to pay therefor the current prices offered by the second party to other producers in the said Coalinga Oil Field for oil of like gravity and quality as the oil delivered hereunder; said prices, at the date hereof, being as follows: [Then follows a specification of prices, varying with the gravities of the oils.]"

The contract then proceeds:

> "Whenever and as often as the prices so offered by the second party, at any time during the period of this contract, to such other producers in the Coalinga Oil Field for oils of like gravity and quality as the oil delivered hereunder are higher than the prices hereinabove mentioned, the first party shall be entitled to such higher prices from and after the tenth day after such higher prices are offered, and whenever and as often as the prices so offered are less than the prices hereinabove stated, then, at the expiration of ten days after such lower offer is made to such other producers, but not before five days' written notice thereof has been given to the first party, the first party shall deliver said oil under this contract at the lower price so offered, unless, prior to the expiration of said ten-day period the first party notifies the second party that such lower prices are not acceptable, in which event this contract shall by such notice, be terminated at the expiration of said ten days, and the first party relieved of all further obligation to deliver, and the second party relieved of all further obligation to receive, any further oil hereunder."

On June 7, 1916, the contract between the parties was extended—

> "with the understanding that all of the proceeds resulting from the sale of the oil to the Standard Oil Company will, from and after the date of this letter, be deposited by the Standard Oil Company in such responsible bank as you (Coalinga Mohawk Oil Company) may select, there to remain until the title to your property is finally adjudicated."

On March 12, 1917, the contract was again extended "to include all oil produced and delivered from the property described to and inclusive of September 30, 1917."

On October 6, 1916, defendant and Southern Pacific Company entered into an agreement, pursuant to which defendant delivered to Southern Pacific Company fuel oil suitable for use in the locomotives of that company, in exchange for refinable crude oil to be obtained by Southern Pacific Company from Kern Trading & Oil Company, which said crude oil was to be delivered by the Southern Pacific Company to defendant. The basis of exchange fixed in the agreement between defendant and Southern Pacific Company was governed by the values of the respective oils deliverable under the contract, which values were determined according to the same schedule of prices as was then in force under plaintiff's contract with the defendant. This contract further provided that:

> "Whenever and as often as and while the prices offered by the Standard Company at any time during the period of this contract to other producers in the San Joaquin Valley fields for oils of like gravity shall vary from the prices specified herein, then the values as expressed in such changed prices shall become effective from and after the tenth day after and while such other prices are offered."

The complaint alleged the making of the two contracts by the defendant, and alleged that the Southern Pacific Company had received in exchange for its oil (which was the same kind and quality as that sold by the plaintiff to the defendant), fuel oil at the agreed value set forth in the contract between it and the defendant, but which was, in reality, of the market value of $1.57 per barrel; that therefore the defendant had paid to the Southern Pacific Company for its oil a higher price than had been paid to the plaintiff. Judgment was asked for the difference between the sum actually paid to plaintiff by defendant and the sum that plaintiff would have realized had it received for its oil, fuel oil on the same basis as the Southern Pacific Company received it, and had plaintiff succeeded in selling such fuel oil for $1.57 a barrel, which is alleged to have been the market price of the same.

The answer admitted the making of the two contracts alleged by plaintiff and a copy of the contract between Southern Pacific Company and the defendant was attached to and made a part of the answer. The answer denied that the Southern Pacific Company was a producer in the same field as the plaintiff; alleged that the contract between defendant and Southern Pacific Company was one for the exchange and not for the sale of oil; that the values of oil stated in the contract between the defendant and Southern Pacific Company were the market prices of said oils and the current prices offered therefor at that time by the defendant to other producers in the Coalinga oil field for oil of like gravity and quality, being the same as the prices for oil of said gravities and qualities set forth in a certain notice of September 20, 1916, from defendant to plaintiff, and that, as often as said current prices offered by defendant to said producers were changed, defendant notified plaintiff of such changes, and likewise notified the Southern Pacific Company in accordance with the contract between defendant and Southern Pacific Company. The answer denied that at any of the times mentioned in the complaint the fuel oil referred to in the contract between the defendant and Southern Pacific Company was of the reasonable or market value of $1.57 a barrel or of any value in excess of the said current prices offered for such oil by defendant to other producers in the Coalinga oil field. It was denied that, had defendant paid plaintiff for the oil delivered by plaintiff to defendant in the same manner as is provided by the contract between defendant and the Southern Pacific Company, the oil delivered to plaintiff by defendant in payment of the oil delivered by plaintiff to defendant would have been worth, at the times of the delivery thereof by defendant to plaintiff, any sum in excess of the amount actually paid to plaintiff therefor.

There are two points urged upon the appeal, first, that the trial court erred in refusing to admit in evidence the contract between the defendant and Southern Pacific Company, and, second, that the court erred in directing a verdict for defendant.

[1, 2] As we have stated, the making of the said contract, as alleged, was admitted by the answer, which went further and set out a copy thereof. However, when this contract was sought to be introduced in evidence by the plaintiff to establish its claim that defendant had offered a higher price to other producers in the Coalinga oil field than the price paid to plaintiff, the defendant objected on the ground that such evidence was not competent, relevant or material. A number of reasons were urged as to why it was not relevant. It is true the trial court, in sustaining the objection to the relevancy of the evidence offered, stated certain reasons for its ruling which are not controlling nor exclusive here. It is sufficient to sustain the ruling, if the evidence offered be irrelevant for any reason for the purpose for which it was offered. We are of the opinion that it was irrelevant upon the contention of the plaintiff. As we have stated, it was in evidence that the values placed upon the fuel oil for the purpose of exchange with the Southern Pacific Company were the same as the prices offered and paid to the plaintiff for the oil purchased from it. Plaintiff claims to have been injured because the selling price to the public of fuel oil was placed at a higher figure by the defendant than the price defendant paid for such oil. We think that circumstance is immaterial under the facts here. The value of the fuel oil to the defendant was, assuredly, the price at which it could purchase the same and not the price at which it was offering the same for sale.

Sweeping aside, for the moment, all questions as to whether the contract between the defendant and the Southern Pacific Company was for a sale or exchange of oil, and also many of the other questions raised by the respondent as presenting objections to the introduction in evidence of the said contract, we think it clear that, even though said contract be regarded as an offer to the Southern Pacific Company for its oil, and even though the Southern Pacific Company be regarded as a producer in the Coalinga oil field, nevertheless, the value of the article offered by the defendant to the Southern Pacific Company must be established at the price the defendant would have to pay for such article in the open market and not the price at which it might expect or offer to sell the same. Assuredly, a barrel of oil was worth to the defendant exactly the amount of money it would have to pay for the same in the open market and not the selling price to be exacted for the same from the "trade." The defendant paid to the plaintiff, in money, for plaintiff's oil, the same value that defendant paid to the Southern Pacific Company, if we estimate the value of the consideration paid to the Southern Pacific Company at the cost price to defendant. It is apparent, therefore, that the contract sought to be introduced did not establish plaintiff's contention that a higher price had been offered to the Southern Pacific Company for oil than had been paid to the plaintiff.

The ruling upon the relevancy of the Southern Pacific Company contract was proper. It was also decisive of the case. The existence and terms of said contract were admitted by the answer, but its relevancy was contested. Our disposition of the first question raised by appellant also answers the second. If the contract between the Southern Pacific Company and the defendant did not tend to establish the allegations of the complaint, then they were not sustained, for no other evidence was offered, and the trial court properly instructed the jury to find for the defendant.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ROSS. (Cr. 1063.)

1. Burglary 🔑41(5)—Evidence held to prove commission of burglary between "sunset and sunrise."

In a prosecution for burglary in the first degree, evidence that the pearls claimed to have been taken by the defendant from a jewelry store located at a corner of two principal business streets were left on display in show window when the store was closed after sunset, and that when the store was opened on the following morning, 1 hour and 17 minutes after sunrise, the glass window had been broken and the pearls were missing, held sufficient to prove that the burglary had been committed between sunset and sunrise, as required by Pen. Code, §§ 460, 463.

2. Burglary 🔑41(6)—Evidence held to identify defendant as person committing crime.

In a prosecution for burglary, evidence as to a confession by the defendant held sufficient to identify the defendant as the person who committed the crime.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

James Ross was convicted of burglary in the first degree. From the judgment of conviction, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

N. S. Lee, of Cottage Grove, Or., for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ST. SURE, J. Defendant was convicted of burglary in the first degree, and appealed from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

When the jewelry store of Albert Samuels & Co., at the corner of Fifth and Market streets, San Francisco, was closed on the evening of January 19, 1922, there were eight strings of pearls, valued at several thousand dollars, left on display in the show window. The clerk who closed the store returned the following morning at 8:30 o'clock, to find the glass window broken and the pearls missing. On the 7th of February, 1922, the defendant was arrested and charged with the theft.

[1] Defendant contends that the evidence is insufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty of burglary in the first degree, committed during the period "between sunset and sunrise." Pen. Code, §§ 460 and 463. The evidence is undisputed that the burglary was committed between the hours of 6:15 o'clock (after sunset) January 19, 1922, and some time prior to 8:30 o'clock (1 hour and 17 minutes after sunrise) on the following morning. The store where the burglary was committed is located at a corner of two of San Francisco's principal business streets. It was a reasonable inference for the jury to draw from the evidence that the burglary was committed in the "nighttime" rather than in the "daytime." Consummation of the crime after sunrise would have necessitated breaking the window and taking the pearls in full view of passing pedestrians. The conclusion is obvious that the crime was committed at dead of night. People v. Schafer, 161 Cal. 573, 119 Pac. 920.

[2] Defendant further contends that there is no evidence connecting him with the commission of the crime. Such claim is untenable. The undisputed evidence shows that the arresting officer informed the defendant that he was wanted for "burglarizing Samuels' store." Defendant neither protested innocence nor denied the charge. He was taken to a pawnshop by the arresting officer, who told him that he had recovered six of the strings of pearls, and asked what became of the other two. The defendant replied: "I do not know anything about them." On the way to the Hall of Justice he said to the officer in the presence of witness Brandt:

> "You let me go; you got all the pearls, I got six strings, all I got, and you got them; you ought to let me go."

After proof of the corpus delicti this confession was sufficient to establish the identity of the defendant as the person who took the pearls.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

REINDERS v. OLSEN. (Civ. 4085.)

1. Negligence 🔑136(8)—Contributory negligence question for jury.

It is only when there is no dispute as to the facts, and reasonable men can reach but one conclusion, that the court is warranted in taking the question of contributory negligence from the jury.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑706(7)—Contributory negligence of motorcycle rider for jury.

Where plaintiff operating a motorcycle collided with defendant operating an automobile at a street intersection, defendant being on the wrong side of the street in making a turn, evidence showing that both parties, just prior to the collision, were in a serious dilemma, held sufficient to make the question of plaintiff's negligence one for the jury.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1033(5)—Appellant cannot complain of favorable instructions.

Appellant cannot complain of instructions favorable to himself.

4. Appeal and error 🔑882(12)—Invited error not reversible.

Appellant cannot complain that instructions are inconsistent or not based on the evidence or based on facts of which there is no evidence, where it appears that such error was partly, if not entirely, caused by his request for such instructions.

5. Trial 🔑295(3)—Error cannot be predicated on omission of instruction covered by another.

Instructions must be considered as a whole, and error cannot be predicated on the omission of a particular instruction in a particular respect, where the law in that regard is fully covered by other instructions given.

6. Municipal corporations 🔑705(4)—Practice of drivers to use wrong side of street no justification for defendant's violation of statute in that regard.

In an action for personal injuries suffered by motorcycle rider by collision with an automobile, a custom or practice of automobile drivers to use the wrong side of the street at the intersection where the accident occurred, could not be binding on plaintiff, so as to excuse defendant from violating the statute in that regard, if such were the proximate cause of the accident.

7. Negligence 🔑72—Best possible choice in avoiding peril not required.

The law does not require that one placed in a dangerous situation by the negligence of another shall make the best possible choice in extricating himself from peril.

8. Municipal corporations 🔑706(8)—Instruction on the doctrine of imminent peril warranted.

In an action by motorcycle rider for injuries in collision with automobile, evidence held to warrant an instruction as to the degree of care required in perilous situation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Robert Reinders, a minor, by Anna Fuller, his guardian ad litem, against William Olsen. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 212 Pac. 49.

W. H. Thomas and B. P. Gibbs, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

D. A. Stuart, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. Plaintiff, by his guardian, brought action against defendant to recover damages for personal injuries sustained in a collision between a motorcycle upon which plaintiff was riding and an automobile operated by defendant. The principal undisputed facts appear to be as follows: At about 8 o'clock p. m. of August 27, 1920, plaintiff was riding his motorcycle eastward on Third street in the city of San Pedro, approaching the intersection of Third street with Bandini street, the former extending east and west and the latter north and south, the two streets intersecting at right angles. A single street car track was located about the center of Bandini street, the rails being slightly above grade at the street intersection. Neither of the streets was paved, and each of them was somewhat rough. When plaintiff was a considerable distance from the intersection of the two streets he was traveling at a rate of about 20 miles an hour, but when within one block of the intersection the speed of his motorcycle was slowed to about 10 or 12 miles an hour, and so continued until the accident upon which this action is based occurred. The headlights of each of the vehicles were burning brightly and were plainly visible to the respective operators of the two vehicles. Just before the accident occurred, defendant had been traveling west on Third street, and plaintiff was at all times traveling east on Third street. As defendant neared the intersection of Third street and Bandini street he was traveling north of the center line of Third street. On approaching the corner of Third street and Bandini street, defendant caused his automobile to make a wide turn to the left, as though he were about to turn into Bandini street to the south of Third street, but on the easterly side thereof and to the east of the street car track. He was traveling at a speed of about 4 or 5 miles an hour. The two vehicles collided very close to the southeast corner of the intersection of the two streets, and plaintiff sustained injuries on which he bases this action.

Plaintiff's testimony relative to the accident includes the following: That he was struck where the curb would be on the southeast corner of the intersection, and was traveling on the right or the south side of Third street; that the automobile was about 40 feet east of Bandini street when he saw it commence to make a turn to the south; that it kept curving until the collision, and he was watching it make the turn; that the automobile was going slowly, and he thought it was going to stop, but that it suddenly lunged ahead and struck him when he was passing in front of it; that upon entering the intersection he commenced to swerve slightly to the right at a point about 75 feet west of the tracks; that plaintiff was operating his motorcycle upon his right-hand side of the street and so far to the right that if a curb had been constructed he would have been on the curb. With reference to plaintiff's position, another witness testified: "You could not get over to the right any further because he was as far as he could go."

Plaintiff further testified that when he had gotten almost to the west intersecting line of Third street and Bandini street he noticed that the automobile commenced to turn to the left, and when he reached the car track the automobile was the same distance from the point of the accident that plaintiff was, and while plaintiff was on the car track the automobile was traveling 4 or 5 miles an hour. What happened after that is shown by the following questions and answers:

> "Q. When you were on the railway track crossing did you notice as to what the automobile was doing? A. It was going pretty slow; I thought it was going to stop. The engine was racing, and I thought they were stopping there, and I had plenty of time to get by, so I kept on going, and just as I got right in front of them he let go of his clutch and the car gave a lunge and hit me."

Two eyewitnesses corroborated the last statement of plaintiff.

The witness J. E. File testified as follows:

> "Q. Did it (the automobile) change its speed at any time while you were noticing it? A. Very little, until it seemed just about the time it struck, then made a kind of jump. Q. Jumped forward? A. Yes."

The witness Mrs. Anna File testified as follows:

> "Q. Did you notice whether there was any difference in its speed from the first instant you saw it until it struck? A. Well, it seemed to kind of make a jump and then stopped; just a kind of start like, and then stopped instantly."

[1] Appellant's first point is (a) plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and the motion for nonsuit should have been granted, (b) the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury to return a verdict in favor of defendant. The two points are discussed as one. Negligence is the want of ordinary care on the part of one of the parties to an action, and contributory negligence means the same thing as applied to the other party. Neither is of any consequence, unless it proximately or directly produces the accident, and, of course the rule of law in an action arising out of personal injuries is that, where plaintiff is guilty of contributory negligence, he cannot recover. The question of whether plaintiff has been guilty of contributory negligence ordinarily is one exclusively for the jury. It is only when, there being no dispute as to the facts and reasonable men can reach but one conclusion—that of plaintiff's lack of ordinary care in the circumstances which contributed directly or proximately to the accident of which he complains—that the judge is warranted in deciding that fact in place of the jury, and declaring therefrom as a matter of law that plaintiff shall not be permitted to recover damages. If reasonable men might differ as to whether or not the plaintiff did what an ordinarily prudent person would have done in the same or similar circumstances, then the judge is not justified in drawing the conclusion that, because in his own mind the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, all other reasonable persons must think likewise. A determination by the trial judge to the effect that a plaintiff has been guilty of contributory negligence must rest upon such a state of facts that not merely a bare majority of reasonable men will agree with his conclusion. It is immaterial whether the trial judge actually believes the evidence to be true or not. Plaintiff's case must be taken absolutely at face value. He is entitled to every favorable inference fairly arising from the evidence produced by him. The motion is equivalent to a demurrer to the evidence, or an objection that, admitting all the evidence introduced to be true and disregarding all inconsistencies therein, if any, the evidence is insufficient in law to entitle plaintiff to a judgment in his favor. It is only when reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff, contributing directly or proximately to his own injury, that the law will step in and forbid a recovery.

> "It is only where no fact is left in doubt, and no deduction or inference other than negligence can be drawn by the jury from the evidence, that the court can say, as a matter of law, that contributory negligence is established. Even where the facts are undisputed, if reasonable minds might draw different conclusions upon the question of negligence, the question is one of fact for the jury." Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 241, 116 Pac. 515, citing cases.

At a time when each of the parties to this action was several feet from the point of the accident, plaintiff saw defendant start to turn toward him. Neither plaintiff nor defendant was traveling at a high rate of speed, but defendant was doing an unlawful thing in making the turn as he did—that is in turning into the left side of an intersecting street. At the time of the collision plaintiff was over as far as he could go to the right side of the street on which he was traveling; there was no escape in that direction. Viewed as at this time and not as it may have appeared to plaintiff at that time, plaintiff might have stopped his motorcycle and escaped injury, or he might have gone around to the rear of defendant's automobile with the same result; but there was no certainty that, had he stopped, defendant would not have run him down; neither was there any certainty that, had he violated the "law of the road" by attempting to pass defendant on the left, that defendant would not have also turned in that direction or stopped his automobile altogether, and thus have produced a collision. Plaintiff and defendant were each facing a serious dilemma. The indications were that, according to plaintiff's testimony, the engine of defendant's auto was racing, and defendant was about to stop his automobile in order that plaintiff, who was traveling at a much faster rate of speed than defendant, might safely pass in front of defendant; and plaintiff, acting upon such appearances, attempted to carry out such plan. The testimony of plaintiff and that of two other witnesses is that at that instant defendant's auto suddenly made a "lunge" or a "jump" and struck plaintiff's motorcycle, thus causing the injury of which plaintiff complains.

[2] It is impossible to say absolutely that plaintiff was negligent or careless. The evidence presented a question of fact which was at least fairly debatable; that is, such a question that in its answer reasonable men might disagree; hence there was no error committed by the court, either in denying counsel's motion for nonsuit, or in denying the motion for a directed verdict in favor of defendant.

Appellant next complains of two instructions given by the court, in the first of which the jury was, in effect, told that if the plaintiff was in a place of safety, and discovered the defendant turning to the left, cutting the corner, and, after discovering the defendant operating his automobile in the manner stated, speeded up his motorcycle in an effort to get ahead of the defendant's automobile as it was cutting the corner, then he was guilty of negligence; and in the second instruction, in practically the same circumstances, the jury was instructed that, if he "took the chance of speeding up his motorcycle in an effort to pass in front of defendant's automobile at the corner of the intersection, then it is for you to determine under all the circumstances whether he was guilty of negligence or not."

Appellant's contention is that these two instructions were misleading and inconsistent one with the other, in that, by the first instruction, the jury was led to believe that, if plaintiff left a place of safety and "speeded up" his motorcycle in an effort to get ahead of defendant's auto and was injured thereby, such act constituted negligence, while by the second instruction the question of whether such an act amounted to negligence was left to the jury. But, in the first place, counsel for appellant says that the first instruction was in effect requested by himself, and the second instruction, which in substance was also requested by defendant, included the proposition as given by the court that, if plaintiff "took the chance of speeding up his motorcycle in an effort to pass in front of defendant's automobile at the corner of the intersection, then his acts in so doing were negligent," but that the court modified that instruction so as to leave the question of negligence to the jury, and omitted from the instruction the possible question of plaintiff's contributory negligence arising from his knowledge of the fact that it had been a general custom for some time for vehicles to turn to the left and cut the corner at the intersection of Third and Bandini streets, in proceeding south from such intersection. Appellant's brief contains the further statement "that there is nowhere in the entire record any testimony or evidence whatever by the respondent that he 'speeded up' his motorcycle in an effort to get ahead of the automobile of appellant."

[3, 4] The first instruction is altogether in defendant's favor; he is in no position to complain of it. The cases are numerous which hold that instructions given at the request of the party are not subject to his exception, and even though erroneous, cannot be taken advantage of on a motion for new trial. While the general rule is that instructions should be based on the evidence and not on facts of which there is no evidence, where it appears that such an error was partly, if not entirely, caused by the party complaining, he can be afforded no relief; in other words, he should not be permitted to profit by his own wrong. It is a sound principle, as well as a most salutary one, that a party cannot be heard to complain of an error which he himself has been instrumental in bringing about. Missouri Pacific R. Co. v. Fox, 60 Neb. 531, 83 N. W. 744, citing cases. If there was no evidence as to plaintiff's "speeding up" his motorcycle, then no instruction covering that point should have been given; but where it appears that both such instructions upon that phase of the case were suggested by defendant, he should be estopped to claim any redress by reason of the fact that they were submitted to the jury. If such instructions were inconsistent one with the other, defendant was at least partly responsible therefor, and he cannot be heard to complain on that account.

Complaint is also made of the following instruction:

> "But if a person, either plaintiff or defendant, is put in great peril by the negligence of the opposite party, of either doing an injury or of being injured, where immediate action is necessary to avoid it, he is not required to exercise all of that presence of mind and carefulness that are justly required of a careful and prudent man under ordinary circumstances; and the reasonableness of his effort to escape injury, after discovery of the danger, is a question for the jury to determine, under all the circumstances of the case. And it is for them to determine under the circumstances, where plaintiff or defendant has been put in peril of being injured or of doing injury by the negligence of the other—you are to consider that in determining the question of negligence."

[5, 6] It would appear that the instruction was as favorable to defendant as it was to plaintiff. But appellant contends that the giving of this instruction was erroneous for two reasons: First, that it did not exclude or negative the negligence of the respondent, if any, in placing himself in the dangerous situation; and, secondly, that it had no application to the case where respondent's own statements showed "that he was familiar with the custom of using the east side of Bandini street by vehicles going south thereon; that he saw the automobile for a distance of several blocks and watched it all the time it was making the turn; that he could have easily avoided any injury by slackening up his speed or slightly changing the course of his motorcycle; that nevertheless and in the very face of the moving and turning car he continued serenely on his way, directly into the path of the automobile without making the slightest effort to avoid the collision." With reference to the first of appellant's contentions, as well as to all other points, with the exception of one to be noticed directly, it is sufficient to point out that instructions must be considered as a whole, and it appears that all such points to which appellant directs attention were fully covered by other instructions given by the court. As to that part of appellant's objection to the instruction with reference to the failure of the court to include the fact of knowledge on the part of plaintiff, relating to the "custom" or, rather, practice, of automobile drivers using the wrong side of the street, no such practice could be binding on plaintiff so as to excuse defendant from violating the statute in that regard, provided that such act was the proximate cause of the accident. The evidence shows that plaintiff saw defendant in the act of violating the statute in that respect; so any question of practice by other automobile drivers would be immaterial, and, as the attention of the jury was directed generally by other instructions to all acts and conduct by plaintiff, as well as by defendant, at the time of or immediately prior to the accident, it would be unnecessary to mention this particular act, even though it might be considered of some importance to defendant's case.

[7, 8] Counsel also argue that the "doctrine of imminent peril" had no application; but, as has already appeared in the matter of the motion for nonsuit, circumstances in connection with the accident were such that the court could not rightfully decide that contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff was shown. The question of the negligence of plaintiff was left with the jury to determine, also the question of whether or not plaintiff was put in great peril by the negligence of defendant, and then followed in the instruction the rule of law that, where immediate action on the part of plaintiff becomes necessary to avoid injury, he is not required to exercise that presence of mind and carefulness that is justly required of a careful and prudent man under ordinary circumstances. As has been elsewhere adverted to, the evidence shows that plaintiff found himself in a dangerous situation—whether through his own negligence or not was a question for the jury to decide. He had little, if any, time to consider what action on his part would be most likely to safely extricate himself therefrom, and, as is succinctly stated in the instruction to which objection is made, the law does not demand that he make the best possible choice. "It is always easy after an accident to see how it could be avoided; but a man's duty before the calamity is not measured by such ex post facto information." The jury was particularly instructed, in substance, that, if, at the time plaintiff was thus hastily called upon to determine his course of action, he did what a reasonably prudent and careful person might have done in the same or similar circumstances, he did all that reasonably could be expected of him.

The court having noticed all the alleged errors occurring on the trial of this case, and it appearing that none of them has resulted prejudicially to the defendant, it is ordered that the judgment herein be, and the same is hereby, affirmed.

PEOPLE v. OLIVER. (Cr. 645.)

1. Rape 🔑40(3)—Testimony of prosecutrix as to intercourse with others properly stricken.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, it was not error to strike, on motion of prosecuting attorney, testimony of prosecutrix in answer to questions whether she had ever had sexual intercourse with a person other than defendant.

2. Criminal law 🔑938(1)—No abuse of discretion in denial of new trial.

There was no abuse of discretion in denying defendant, convicted of rape, a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, consisting of medical testimony tending to show that prosecutrix, under the age of consent, was suffering from gonorrhea two days after the alleged offense, and that if defendant had intercourse with her as charged he would have contracted the disease, where testimony of prosecutrix on the trial that intercourse with defendant had ruined her health should have put him on inquiry as to the fact, and the newly discovered evidence was at least uncertain and of doubtful value, and as tending to show intercourse with others than defendant immaterial.

3. Criminal law 🔑938(1)—New trial for newly discovered evidence not favored.

A motion for new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence is addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and is to be regarded with distrust and disfavor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Ozias Oliver was convicted of statutory rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

L. J. Maddux, of Modesto, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of rape accomplished with a girl of the age of 14 years. He prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

At the time of the alleged offense the defendant was a married man, but separated from his wife, from whom he had theretofore secured an interlocutory decree of divorce. He resided, apparently alone, in a house near the residence of his mother. The prosecutrix had lived with her parents for several months in the same neighborhood in which defendant resided, and was a friend of defendant's sister; both girls being of about the same age. The prosecutrix testified that the defendant committed the act charged, her resistance being formal only, if any; that prior to that time he had done things which were not gentlemanly "in different ways; fooled with me * * * with his hand." The defendant denied the crime charged, but did not deny the acts of familiarity, further than to say that his relations with the prosecutrix had been "proper." According to the defendant's testimony, the girl was the pursuer and he the pursued. He testified that he met her nearly every evening by her appointment; that he frequently kissed her; that she asked him to marry her, and he replied: "I will talk with you after I get my final decree." As is usual in such cases, there was no direct testimony as to the commission of the act, other than that of the prosecutrix and the defendant. It is not contended, however, that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the charge.

[1] On cross-examination the prosecutrix was asked if she had ever had sexual intercourse with another young man, naming him. Over the people's objection she was permitted to answer in the negative. Thereafter, on motion of the district attorney, the answer was stricken out by the court. The ruling was not erroneous. People v. Harlan, 133 Cal. 16, 65 Pac. 9; People v. Kilfoil, 27 Cal. App. 29, 148 Pac. 812; People v. Wademan, 38 Cal. App. 116, 175 Pac. 791.

Appellant complains of one of the instructions given by the court. It is sufficient to say that the instruction is in the exact language of one approved in the case of People v. Wolff, 182 Cal. 728, at page 739, 190 Pac. 22.

[2] It is contended that the court should have granted defendant's motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. On the hearing of the motion testimony was taken pursuant to a stipulation that the transcript thereof should be treated as affidavits. On such hearing two physicians who attended the prosecutrix at the county hospital, where she was taken the third day after the alleged offense, gave testimony which tended to show, but not certainly, that the prosecutrix was suffering from gonorrhea when taken to the hospital, though no microscopic examination was made. One of the physicians testified that he had known of the disease developing in three days after exposure; that he would not say it would not develop in two days, but that the usual period is from three to ten days; that "where the male has been exposed to an infection prior to the time of coming in contact with the female, there is a possibility of the male carrying and transmitting these germs without getting them himself, that is, get the infection"; that "it has been known that cases of gonorrhea that have been quiescent for years have been transmitted from the male to the female, and where the individual was apparently cured." The prosecutrix testified at such hearing that the disease developed on January 22d, two days after the commission of the offense. The defendant testified that he was not afflicted with any venereal disease during the year in which the crime is alleged to have been committed, but that he had gonorrhea in 1914 or 1915. At the trial, on cross-examination, the prosecutrix testified that she had never had sexual intercourse with any person but the defendant, and with him but the one time; that she was taken in charge by the juvenile court and placed in the county hospital on the 23d of January, where she was given treatment on account of defendant's sexual intercourse with her; and that such act had ruined her health for life.

[3] In denying the motion for a new trial, the court referred to this testimony of the prosecutrix and said:

> "That was sufficient, it seems to me, to put the defendant on inquiry and he could easily then have ascertained * * * almost at the beginning of the trial of the case that this condition existed."

The court further expressed the opinion that the evidence claimed to have been newly discovered would not have changed the result if it had been produced at the trial. If it be conceded that such evidence was admissible, it was uncertain in character and of doubtful value. As tending to show intercourse with other men, the evidence was immaterial. As tending to show that, if the act charged was committed by the defendant, he probably would have contracted the disease, the evidence was at least uncertain, because the infection of the prosecutrix did not develop until two days after the commission of the act charged. It has often been held that a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence is addressed to the discretion of the trial court and is to be regarded with distrust and disfavor. Under the circumstances of this case, it cannot be said that the trial court abused its discretion in denying the motion.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GRAFFT et al. (Cr. 1087.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 15, 1923.)

1. Criminal law 🔑519(9)—Confession held not rendered inadmissible because obtained after admonition by sheriff.

Even though a confession may have been obtained after admonition, advice, exhortation, or adjuration by a sheriff, it would not have been thereby rendered inadmissible.

2. Criminal law 🔑736(2)—Whether confession was free and voluntary determinable by trial judge.

The question whether a confession was free and voluntary is one peculiarly within the province of the trial judge to decide upon the facts.

3. Criminal law 🔑531(3)—Evidence held to support trial court's conclusion confession was voluntary.

Evidence of the means by which a confession was obtained by a sheriff held to support a conclusion of the trial court that it was free and voluntary.

4. Homicide 🔑234(5)—Abandonment of conspiracy to rob before homicide committed held not established.

In a prosecution for murder, held, that the killing was the natural and probable cause of forces set in motion by a common plan and attempt to commit a robbery, notwithstanding that the killing actually occurred while those engaged were attempting to make their escape after outcries by the intended victim who was clinging to one of his assailants and trying to prevent his escape; such showing being insufficient to establish an abandonment of the conspiracy to rob.

5. Indictment and information 🔑189(8)—Though homicide committed in perpetration of robbery is first degree murder, conviction may still be in second degree.

Though the statute makes killing in the perpetration of a robbery murder in the first degree, it is still within the province of the jury to convict for murder in the second degree.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. E. Woolley, Judge.

George Grafft and James Dunn were convicted of murder in the second degree, and the former appeals from the judgment of conviction and the latter from the judgment of conviction and an order denying his motion for a new trial. Judgments and order affirmed.

Frank Curran and C. O. Hansen, both of Fresno, for appellant Dunn.

H. H. Baker, of Fresno, for appellant Grafft.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ST. SURE, J. Defendants were jointly charged by information with murder, tried together, and convicted of murder in the second degree. Defendant Grafft appeals from the judgment, and defendant Dunn from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. Grafft bases his appeal upon the insufficiency of the evidence and alleged errors of law. Dunn seeks reversal solely upon the ground that his confession, introduced against him, was procured through inducement and intimidation.

Chow Wing Hop, known as Wing Hop, kept a grocery store at Coalinga, Fresno county. Near the store was a blacksmith shop and radio station. At the front of the store was a porch, the floor of which cleared the sidewalk by about two feet. On November 10, 1921, between 6 and 6:15 p. m., three young men named, respectively, Mayberry, Bryan, and Davis, in an automobile, stopped at the blacksmith shop. They noticed another car parked in front of the grocery store, faced in the same direction as their own. Mayberry alighted and entered the station, while Bryan and Davis remained in the car. A few seconds after, Mayberry heard two screams in close succession. The screams were also heard by Smith, radio man, though he had on a radio headpiece, and were recognized by him as the cries of the Chinese. It was too dark to recognize individuals even at a short distance, except by form or general peculiarity of movement. Both Bryan and Davis testified that while waiting for Mayberry they first heard a noise like that of scuffling in the store, followed by screaming; that four men emerged from the store; the first, somewhat in advance of the others, leaped into the car; the second got in just as the motor started, and two were scuffling together on the porch. Bryan saw one of these two strike the other about the head and shoulders. Davis "heard something hit." One jumped into the car as it got into motion, and the other fell to the sidewalk from the porch. All the men getting into the car seemed to be in a great hurry. Mayberry came out of the station in time to see but three men, one getting into the car and two on the porch, the latter holding on to each other, and he saw a blow struck by one knocking the other headlong off the porch. This blow Mayberry both heard and saw. Smith came out only in time to see the Chinese lying on the sidewalk and a man partway into the car. By an arc light some 70 yards distant he recognized the one fallen to the sidewalk as Wing Hop by his "striped overalls and white shirt."

Mayberry, Bryan, Davis, and Smith gave chase to the fleeing car, attempting to get its number; but they soon lost it and never saw it again. Returning to town, they joined the city marshal and went back to Wing Hop's store, where they found the Chinese lying on the sidewalk. In response to questioning on the way to the hospital, Wing Hop said: "Nobody hit me; what you want?" But they did not consider him rational, and Dr. Mountfort, who attended him at the hospital, testified that he was dazed and semiconscious from the time he was received at the hospital (between 6:20 and 6:30 o'clock) until his death shortly after 8 o'clock the same evening. An autopsy showed death was caused by a fractured skull. Dr. Mountfort also testified that the large wound in the back of the head was caused by a blunt instrument.

Between 5:30 and 6 o'clock in the evening of the same day, both defendants, in company with a third man, were seen and spoken to by the sheriff with two of his deputies at a restaurant in Coalinga. None of the three was seen again by any of the sheriff's party until Grafft's arrest November 22, and Dunn's December 21, 1921.

On November 22d the sheriff and Grafft had a conversation alone, lasting about three or four hours. On the next day there was another meeting between them in the afternoon, and in the evening of the same day another, at the latter of which there were also present the district attorney, court reporter, and Deputy Sheriff Collins. Grafft told his story through answers to questions put by the district attorney. This story was of a plan to rob Wing Hop, with the attempt resulting in his death. Though Grafft had been with Green (the third man not apprehended) and Dunn for a ride in a stolen machine, and had heard them discuss robbing the Chinese, he asserts that he took no part in the plans; that he did not believe the others would try it; and that, though actually staying with the others on the trip to Wing Hop's store, refused to get out on Green's orders on arrival there, but remained seated in the car during all the occurrences which followed. Dunn's attorney objected to the introduction of Grafft's confession, and put him on the stand in an endeavor to show that the confession was procured by inducements. He testified that he had been in solitary confinement three days; that the sheriff had told him the first day:

"You better confess because we have the goods on you and will convict you anyway. No man ever hung in this state that ever confessed." On the second day the sheriff talked to him, he says "about my mother more than anything else," with reiterations of what he had said the day before. At the meeting at which the statement was made the sheriff told him, "Just remember what I told you yesterday." All of this the sheriff denies, admitting that he told the defendant that "the truth should not hurt any one," and that he talked to defendant about the case and urged him to tell the truth of what he knew about it.

Dunn was arrested December 21st. An hour's conversation was had between the sheriff and Dunn the same evening, and another the next day of equal length, after which Dunn also made a statement; there being present the sheriff, Deputies Sheriff King and Collins, a Coalinga constable named Peterson, and the district attorney. Dunn's statement tallied generally with that of Grafft except as to the latter's nonparticipation, and also with the testimony of the eyewitnesses. Briefly, the offenders had stolen a car and taken a trip to the coast and back to Coalinga. Being short of money, they planned to rob the Chinese, noting his place when coming into town. They later encountered the sheriff and his deputies at the restaurant. Leaving there they drove to Wing Hop's grocery, which they found closed. A dim light showed in a back room, and on calling him, the Chinese came out and opened the store. They entered, asking for supplies, and while the Chinese was bent over Dunn hit him on the head with an eight-inch Crescent wrench which he had carried from the car in his sleeve. The Chinese showed fight, and Dunn hit him again. By this time Wing Hop was screaming and trying to hold any of his assailants he could grasp. Dunn freed himself, and running out jumped into the car and started the motor. Green and the Chinese grappled on the porch, and Green finally threw the Chinese off and leaped into the moving car. The same objections to the introduction of this confession were made by Dunn's attorney, and the sheriff and defendant put on the stand for the purpose of showing how the confession was obtained. The sheriff again testified that there were no threats, inducements, or promises. The defendant testified that he was told by the sheriff that he would be "railroaded," "that no man in the state of California ever hung that made a confession," and that "if I made a confession that there was a very slim chance of my hanging, and that I had better confess." Dunn also testified that he was not permitted to have an attorney at the time he asked for one, and that the district attorney made the same statements regarding confessions as the sheriff, and that he would not have made a disclosure of the facts had it not been for such statements on the part of the district attorney and sheriff. The court admitted the confession.

Defendant Dunn bases his appeal on the answer to one question, namely: "Did the trial court err in admitting the confession of the defendant James Dunn?"

Counsel for defendant Dunn call our attention to the cases of People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 6, 112 Pac. 720, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1193, and People v. Clark (Cal. App.) 203 Pac. 781. The facts and circumstances in the instant case are wholly dissimilar to those in the cases cited. The Clark Case (citing People v. Loper) presents an extreme example of what is termed a "relentless sweating process." In the Clark Case, Mr. Justice Nourse, writing the opinion for the court, says:

> "It is apparent from the testimony of the witnesses for the state that the relentless sweating process to which the appellant was subjected was such as to render her statements involuntary."

[1] In that case the complaining appellant was put through a course of cross-examination continuing over a period of two weeks when she was in such a low physical and mental condition that she had to be assisted by matrons into the examination room with her head covered with wet towels to keep her in a condition to answer questions. No such facts or circumstances relating to the confession of Dunn obtain in the instant case. The sheriff denied making the statements attributed to him. And even if there had been admonition, advice, exhortation, or abjuration by the officer to the defendant, the confession would not have been rendered inadmissible. People v. O'Brien (Cal. App.) 200 Pac. 766; People v. Haney, 46 Cal. App. 317, 189 Pac. 338; 16 Corpus Juris, p. 720, sec. 1474; 16 Corpus Juris, p. 721, sec. 1476.

[2, 3] The question whether the confession was "free and voluntary," or the result of inducement, coercion, intimidation, or duress exerted by the officer, was one peculiarly within the province of the trial judge to decide upon the facts. His conclusion thereon has substantial support in the evidence, and we are of the opinion that we should not interfere with it.

[4] Counsel for defendant Grafft makes specious deductions from the evidence to the effect that the real cause of death was the fall from the porch to the ground; that the conspiracy to rob had been abandoned, and that therefore death was not the natural consequence thereof; that decedent contributed to his own death by clinging to Green, and that Grafft had no part in aiding or abetting the killing. Based on these deductions, he argues that the defendants were not liable as conspirators, but, if at all, individually, and that the death was accidental or caused by Green's act alone. He alleges as errors of law refusal of the court to give instructions favoring such theory.

The errors of law complained of by defendant Grafft are based on the fallacious premise that there was a sufficient intervening break in the continuity of the plan to rob, followed by flight, to admit of the theory of abandonment of conspiracy, and that death resulted otherwise than as a natural and probable consequence of the common enterprise to commit robbery. The entire record points to but one cause of death: Acts the natural and probable result of forces set in motion by a common plan and attempt to commit robbery. People v. Vasquez, 49 Cal. 560; People v. Lawrence, 143 Cal. 148, 76 Pac. 893, 68 L. R. A. 193; People v. Friedman, 205 N. Y. 161, 98 N. E. 471, 45 L. R. A. (N. S.) 55.

[5] It is also urged on behalf of defendant Grafft that the statute making a killing in the perpetration, or attempt to perpetrate, robbery, murder in the first degree, must be strictly construed, and that the verdict of the jury of murder in the second degree was outside its province and an acquittal of statutory murder, and further, in this connection, that the court's instructions to the jury with reference to other verdicts which it might bring in were prejudicial, inharmonious, inconsistent and tended to confusion.

This assignment is unique, in that it really is an objection by defendant Grafft that he was convicted of murder in the second instead of the first degree, for, from the evidence adduced at the trial, the jury might very properly have found defendant Grafft guilty of murder in the first degree. The error of which he complains redounded to his advantage rather than to his prejudice. People v. Tugwell, 32 Cal. App. 520, 163 Pac. 508.

The judgment and order as to the defendant Dunn, and the judgment as to defendant Grafft, are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GORDON. (Cr. 936.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 24, 1923. Rehearing Denied March 24, 1923.)

1. Assault and battery 🔑92—Robbery 🔑24(1)—Evidence held sufficient to support conviction for assault with intent to rob and assault with deadly weapon.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to commit robbery and assault with a deadly weapon, two of the defendants having confessed, evidence held sufficient to support a conviction of the third defendant.

2. Criminal law 🔑1159(2)—On appeal truth of evidence not subject to question.

On appeal the truth of the evidence implicating defendant is not subject to question.

3. Criminal law 🔑407(1)—Defendant failing to resent incriminating statement in his presence, both statement and defendant's conduct admissible.

Where a defendant under arrest on hearing a statement made incriminating him fails to act as it might reasonably be expected that an innocent person would act under such circumstances, both the statement and defendant's conduct are admissible as some evidence of guilt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Barry Gordon was convicted of assault with intent to commit robbery and of assault with a deadly weapon, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Mart Coles, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The defendants, Barry Gordon, Ralph O'Brien, and William Shea, were prosecuted jointly under an information containing three counts. The first charges assault with intent to commit robbery; the second, assault with a deadly weapon; and the third, assault to commit murder. O'Brien was committed to an asylum for the insane. Shea pleaded guilty to assault with a deadly weapon, and Gordon was found guilty as charged in the first and second counts.

[1, 2] It is urged that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. As against this particular defendant the evidence is circumstantial, but we think it cannot be said that the jury were not warranted in their conclusion as to his guilt. On appeal the truth of the evidence implicating the defendant is not subject to question. This was to the effect that at the time of the commission of the offense, and for a short period prior thereto, Gordon and Shea jointly occupied a room in the Dorris Apartments in Los Angeles. Gordon registered under the name of Thomas and Shea under that of Wright. Before the 26th of June, 1922, Gordon and Shea discussed holding up and robbing a cashier of a film employment concern. On the morning of the 26th of June, 1922, after planning among themselves to rob Harry St. Alwyn, Gordon drove Shea and O'Brien to a point near Eleventh and Hill streets by automobile. At about the same time Harry St. Alwyn left his place of business carrying a satchel containing about $1,847. After walking a short distance O'Brien approached him and demanded the satchel.

O'Brien threatened St. Alwyn with a gun and ordered him to "put them up, put them up." A struggle ensued in which St. Alwyn was badly beaten with a gun in the hands of Shea. But the assailants were unsuccessful in their efforts to secure the satchel and they finally ran. Shea went down an alley, coming out on a street where he stopped for a moment and looked around and then jumped upon a passing automobile, which at that point slackened its speed slightly. This machine was driven by Gordon, and its number was obliterated. Gordon and Shea were later arrested in their room at the Dorris Apartments. Shea subsequently made a statement concerning the attempted robbery which was read in the presence of Gordon, upon which occasion he (Gordon) said:

> "I have nothing further to say. You have enough on me to hang me now. If I say anything, my attorneys will talk for me."

In addition to the claim that the evidence is not sufficient to connect Gordon with the commission of any offense, it is insisted that the evidence did not warrant a verdict of guilty upon two counts of the information. No definite reasons are advanced to maintain this proposition nor are any authorities cited except People v. Warriner, 37 Cal. App. 107, 173 Pac. 489. However, that case was one having to do with a matter of pleading and is not in point here. The evidence showed that appellant's codefendants and coconspirators, Shea and O'Brien, engaged in a physical encounter with the witness St. Alwyn, in which they struck him a number of blows both with their fists and with a gun. A construction may have been placed upon the evidence to the effect that at least one of the assaults was made with intent to commit robbery, but that before running Shea struck St. Alwyn with the gun without the specific intent to rob. Such matters involve the weighing and construing of evidence which are within the province of the jury.

[3] The trial court, over the objection of the appellant's counsel that it was hearsay, allowed this statement to be read, and a witness to testify to the remark above quoted having been made by Gordon. Shea's confession admittedly implicated Gordon in the crime. There can be no doubt as to the correctness of the ruling to which objection is made. If a defendant, upon hearing a statement made incriminating him, fails to act as it might reasonably be expected that an innocent person would under such circumstances, both the statement and the conduct of the accused are admissible. People v. Bradley, 23 Cal. App. 44, 136 Pac. 955; People v. Teshara, 134 Cal. 542, 66 Pac. 798; People v. Philbon, 138 Cal. 530, 71 Pac. 650. The defendant's conduct here was not an unequivocal admission of guilt, but it was susceptible of such a construction and was therefore a matter for the jury to weigh. People v. Bradley, supra. Nor does the fact that the entire incident occurred while the defendants were under arrest render the evidence of what was said and done subject to objection. People v. Schoon, 177 Cal. 678, 171 Pac. 680; People v. Byrne, 160 Cal. 217, 116 Pac. 521; People v. Amaya, 134 Cal. 531, 66 Pac. 794.

It is next objected that counsel for the people caused a court reporter to read in the presence of the jury a statement made by a deputy district attorney at the time Gordon's codefendant, Shea, was sentenced. We are assured that the reading of this statement was "without any color of right." However, an inspection of the record clearly discloses that at the time the evidence was offered and admitted, the prosecutor indicated that it was offered as impeachment of Shea, and as such there can be no doubt that it was admissible. The facts in regard to the introduction of this evidence were as follows: Shea first testified that Gordon had refused to take any part in the attempted robbery, and that when the witness boarded the automobile in which the escape was made he was greatly surprised to see Gordon driving it. After laying a foundation for impeachment, Shea was then asked if he had not at the time of his arraignment answered "yes" to a question put by the court as follows: "Those were substantially the facts?" This inquiry had reference to a statement just read by Deputy District Attorney Fricke, and which the witness had said was substantially correct, contained assertions entirely inconsistent with the testimony which he had given as a witness in the trial of this case, and which we have quoted. Fricke purported to briefly review the salient facts of the holdup, and, among other things, he said that—

> "Gordon was driving the automobile. It was waiting in the vicinity, and which pulled up there right after this thing had happened. * * * Shea ran and jumped on an automobile which had an obliterated number on it. That is the automobile which we believe the evidence shows was driven by Gordon. * * * Both Shea and O'Brien confessed and said Gordon was in on the holdup, and drove them to the place in the automobile and was the driver of the car in which Shea escaped from the scene."

It is too apparent for argument that this was proper impeachment.

The judgment is affirmed.

An extension of time granted by the mortgagee to a grantee of the premises who had personally assumed to pay the mortgage, which was not supported by any consideration, and was therefore not binding on the mortgagee, does not release the liability of the grantor as surety for the grantee so as to make the grantor's payment of the deficiency judgment voluntary and preclude his recovery thereof from the grantee.

Though as between a grantor and grantee of mortgaged property the grantee who assumed the payment of the debt is the principal debtor, and the grantor his surety, the right of the mortgagee is entirely several as to each of them, and his consent that the grantee should have a new trial after judgment against him in the foreclosure proceedings did not release the liability of the grantor as surety.

3. Mortgages 🔑291—Trustee through whom title is conveyed can bind grantees to assume mortgage.

Where an owner of mortgaged premises conveyed them to a grantee, who did not assume the mortgage debt, but who had no beneficial interest in the premises, and was merely a conduit through whom the title was conveyed to a purchaser who did assume the payment of the debt, the original grantee was merely a trustee and could bind his grantee by the assumption of the mortgage debt, though he could not have done so if he had been a grantee of the beneficial interest who did not assume the payment of the debt.

4. Appeal and error 🔑197(3)—Variance curable by amendment must be called to trial court's attention to be available.

A variance resulting from failure to plead that a grantee in the chain of title was a mere trustee, so that he could bind his grantee to assume the mortgage debt without having assumed it himself, can be cured by amendment, and is therefore not available on appeal to sustain an order of nonsuit, where that variance was not called to the attention of the trial court in the motion for nonsuit.

On Petition for Rehearing.

5. Evidence 🔑419(4)—Assumption of mortgage as part of consideration for conveyance can be shown by parol.

An exception to the parol evidence rule occurs when the parol testimony is directed to the consideration for a deed, so that parol evidence is competent to show that, as part of the consideration for the deed, the grantee assumed the payment of a mortgage.

6. Evidence 🔑419(4)—Assumption of mortgage as part of consideration for preliminary contract can be shown by parol.

Parol evidence is competent to show that part of the consideration for a preliminary contract for the conveyance of land was the assumption by the purchaser of the mortgage debt.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Kernan Robson against Michael O'Toole, John G. Hoyt, and another. From a judgment entered upon an order granting the motion of defendant Hoyt for a nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

James P. Sweeney and Frank J. Fontes, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. J. Lermen and G. K. Burgren, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered upon an order granting the motion of the defendant John G. Hoyt for a nonsuit. Different phases of this litigation have been considered before by the Supreme Court and District Court of Appeal of this state. Robson v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 588, 154 Pac. 8; Robson v. O'Toole, 45 Cal. App. 63, 187 Pac. 110. Many of the questions discussed in the briefs in the present case have been authoritatively settled by the opinions filed upon the former appeals. As the facts are quite completely discussed in said opinions, reference is made to the same, and an extended statement of facts will not be made herein. Only those matters will be discussed which differentiate the present case from the cases previously considered upon the appeals involving the same controversy.

At the outset, in view of the rule that all the evidence is to be taken most favorably for the plaintiff in considering the defendant's motion for a nonsuit, we must say that the record shows that the payment of the mortgage under consideration was undertaken personally by the respondent Hoyt, as a part consideration of the purchase price of the property involved.

[1] In the trial court it was urged by respondent that in paying the amount of the deficiency judgment to the mortgagee, Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, Robson was a volunteer, and therefore was not entitled to be reimbursed by Hoyt. This is upon the theory that Hoyt was the principal debtor and Robson the surety, and that the creditor, the mortgagee, by granting an extension of time to Hoyt within which to pay the debt, had released the surety. We think this position is unsound. In the first place, there was no valid, binding agreement upon the part of the bank to extend the time of payment of the loan. The bank was asked if it would be agreeable to it to extend the time of payment upon the loan, and replied that this would not be objectionable. There was no consideration for this extension of time, and it was unenforceable. In the case of Title Guarantee & Trust Co., v. Weiher et al., 30 Misc. Rep. 250, 63 N. Y. Supp. 224, it was said:

> "The agreement made by the mortgagee with the owner of the equity of redemption, who had purchased the premises subject to the mortgage, that the payment of the mortgage debt might be delayed until March 12, 1899, apparently left the owner at liberty to pay off the mortgage [debt] at once, if he wished to do so, and was therefore without consideration, and not enforceable. See Moser v. Walker, 23 App. Div. 91, 48 N. Y. Supp. 341."
> "To have the effect of discharging the surety, an agreement for the extension of time of payment made by the creditor with the principal debtor without the consent of the surety must be upon a valid consideration, such as will preclude the creditor from enforcing the debt against the principal; and an agreement by a mortgagee to extend the time of payment of the bond and mortgage until a future day, without other consideration than the continuance of the original terms, including the tax, insurance, and interest clauses, is void for want of consideration. See Olmstead v. Latimer, 158 N. Y. 313." Title Guarantee & Trust Co. v. Weiher et al., 30 Misc. Rep. 250, 63 N. Y. Supp. 224.

To discharge a surety by giving time to the principal, the time must be given by a positive contract that can be enforced. Olmstead v. Latimer, 158 N. Y. 313, 53 N. E. 5, 43 L. R. A. 685.

[2] It is also urged by defendant and respondent that, as the mortgagee consented that the defendant Hoyt should have a new trial after judgment against him in the foreclosure proceedings, the rights of the surety, the plaintiff herein, were prejudiced, and consequently he was released from his obligation, and therefore his payment of the deficiency judgment was merely voluntary. That contention is answered by the opinion in the case of Robson v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 588, 154 Pac. 8, which considered the effect of the mortgagee's action in relation to that matter. As stated in the opinion in Robson v. O'Toole, supra:

> "The Supreme Court held that the relation between each of the defendants Robson and Hoyt arising out of the successive assumptions by each of the mortgage debt was an entirely several and separate relation as to the plaintiff in said foreclosure proceeding, and that, this being so, the plaintiff therein was in a position to stipulate with the defendant Hoyt as it pleased with respect to his motion for a new trial, and that the defendant Robson was in no wise affected by such stipulation. * * *"

It is true, of course, that as between Robson and Hoyt, Hoyt was principal and Robson surety. However, as between these parties and the mortgagee, the relation took on a different aspect.

> "This right existing in the mortgagee was entirely several as to each of said persons, none of whom would have a right, as against said mortgagee, to insist that any of the others should be made parties defendant to the foreclosure proceedings or be embraced in any judgment in the mortgagee's favor to be rendered therein." Robson v. O'Toole, supra.

See, also, Robson v. Superior Court, supra; Hopkins v. Warner, 109 Cal. 133, 41 Pac. 868.

[3] The most formidable defense of the order granting the motion for nonsuit is maintained by respondent in his position that the showing made by plaintiff does not meet the rule, that, where a grantor of real property is not personally liable for a mortgage debt, a stipulation in a deed from him to his grantee that said grantee shall pay, personally, the mortgage indebtedness will not be regarded in law or equity as a contract intended for the benefit of a third person. Case v. Egan (Cal. App.) 207 Pac. 388, and cases therein cited. This position is taken because the chain of title to the real property involved here runs from Theresa Lewin to Robson, with assumption of mortgage by Robson; from Robson to O'Toole, to hold merely as a trustee for Robson, no consideration being paid by O'Toole; from O'Toole, upon the direction of Robson and on his behalf, to Curtis Hillyer, who agreed to assume the mortgage as a part consideration for the property; from Hillyer to Hoyt, with the same agreement as a partial consideration. It is contended that, because O'Toole never assumed the mortgage indebtedness, he could not impose this burden upon his grantee, Hillyer, and consequently it could not have been imposed upon Hoyt. But, viewing the evidence upon a motion for a nonsuit made by the defendant, the record indicates that O'Toole never had any beneficial interest in the property. He was a mere conduit, as such a position has been aptly characterized. He held title for Robson and acted for him in making the transfer to Hillyer, and O'Toole's lack of beneficial interest and absence of personal obligation cannot take from Robson his right to bind his grantee (even though the grant be made indirectly through the medium of a trustee) to pay the mortgage debt. In the case of Riverdale Mining Co. v. Wicks, 14 Cal. App. 535, 112 Pac. 899, it was said:

> "But the fact is, the legal relation existing between Kellogg and Cornell as to the property was at all times only that of principal and agent. In the conveyance of the property to McDonald it transpired that it was more convenient for Kellogg to use Cornell as an instrumentality or a trustee—a conduit, so to speak, through which that act might be consummated. Cornell first proposed that the property be bonded to him, but Kellogg refused to accede to that proposition, and then suggested the deed in escrow, said deed to remain undelivered until Cornell either bought the property himself or it was sold to others, and finally the delivery of the deed to Cornell was not because Cornell had bought the property or had acquired any interest whatever in it, but for the sole reason, as suggested, that, under the circumstances, that was the most convenient way of conveying to McDonald, the actual purchaser. Cornell's part in the transaction was, therefore, as both he and Kellogg declared on the witness stand, that of a mere trustee of Kellogg."

[4] The respondent does not seriously contend that Hoyt would not be liable upon his assumption of the mortgage, if O'Toole was a mere trustee for Robson, and not a beneficial grantee, but he meets this situation by urging that the complaint did not so allege the facts, but that it alleged that O'Toole had assumed the mortgage as a part of the consideration for the transfer to him, and that therefore there is a fatal variance between the pleadings and the proof.

Of course, the trial court might have permitted an amendment of the pleadings to conform to the proof, or might have found the facts in accordance with the proof. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 469, 470. That neither of these things was done is perhaps due to the fact that the defendant and respondent did not call the matter to the attention of the court or of the plaintiff. The nonsuit was not asked for this reason, and defendant's strongest position with reference to the matter is that this was an implied ground for nonsuit. It is the policy of courts to favor liberal amendments in the interest of justice, and undoubtedly a party relying upon appeal upon a variance between pleadings and proof should call attention to the matter explicitly in the trial court. Keefe v. Keefe, 19 Cal. App. 310, 125 Pac. 929; Breidenbach v. McCormick, 20 Cal. App. 184, 123 Pac. 423; Stover v. Stevens, 21 Cal. App. 261, 131 Pac. 332; McCarthy v. Phelan, 132 Cal. 404, 64 Pac. 570; Palmer v. Marysville Democrat Pub. Co., 90 Cal. 168, 27 Pac. 21. As stated in the case of Moore v. Moffatt (Cal. Sup.) 204 Pac. 220:

> "It was a defect in the plaintiff's case which might have been remedied had attention been called to it by the motion for nonsuit, and, inasmuch as it was not made a ground for the motion for a nonsuit, it could not, upon that motion, be considered by the trial court, nor can it, for the same reason, be considered by this court in determining the merits of the motion."

The order granting the nonsuit cannot be sustained, therefore, because of a variance between the pleadings and proof. We find no theory upon which such order was proper.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: STURTEVANT, J.; NOURSE, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

LANGDON, P. J. In the above-entitled matter, after decision by this court, respondent John G. Hoyt has petitioned this court for a rehearing. The first matter urged upon our attention by the petition for rehearing has reference to the following statement in the opinion heretofore filed herein:

> "At the outset, in view of the rule that all the evidence is to be taken most favorably for the plaintiff in considering the defendant's motion for a nonsuit, we must say that the record shows that the payment of the mortgage under consideration was undertaken, personally, by the respondent Hoyt, as a part consideration of the purchase price of the property involved."

[5] Petitioner admits the correctness of the rule stated, but urges that the testimony in record which tends to show that Hoyt assumed the payment of the mortgage as a part consideration for the purchase price of the property was parol testimony, and, since such assumption of the mortgage does not appear by the deed conveying the property to Hoyt nor by the written preliminary agreement between the parties, the plaintiff is precluded from showing it by parol, under the well-settled rule that no variation of a written instrument by parol will be permitted. In response to this contention we desire to point out that an exception to the parol evidence rule occurs when the parol testimony is directed to the consideration for a deed. It has always been held that the amount or kind of consideration recited in a deed is open to contradiction or explanation. White v. Schader, 185 Cal. 606, 198 Pac. 19, 21 A. L. R. 499; 10 R. C. L. p. 1042, § 236.

[6] The same rule applies to the instrument setting forth the preliminary contract. The amount or kind of consideration is not considered an essential part of a contract and is open to contradiction or explanation like a common receipt. 10 R. C. L. p. 1042, § 236; Moffatt v. Bulson, 96 Cal. 106, 30 Pac. 1022, 31 Am. St. Rep. 192. The testimony tending to show that Hoyt assumed the mortgage was given by the agent who negotiated the sale between Hoyt and his grantor, and he stated that Hoyt had undertaken to pay the mortgage as a part consideration for the transfer of the property. This evidence was properly admitted and was sufficient to go to the jury. It should have been given full weight by the court upon defendant's motion for nonsuit.

The other matters urged in the petition for rehearing are sufficiently covered we think by the opinion heretofore filed.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

All concur.

61 Cal. App. 110

RICHARDSON et al. v. BROWNING et al. (Civ. 2565.)

1. Statutes 🔑207—Section last in numerical order must prevail in case of conflict.

Where conflicting provisions are found in different sections of the same chapter or article, the provisions of the section last in numerical order must prevail under Pol. Code, § 4484, unless such construction is inconsistent with the meaning of such chapter or article.

2. Drains 🔑67—Sections of statute relating to assessments for maintenance charges construed together.

Pol. Code, §§ 3455, 3456b, as amended by St. 1919, p. 604, should be construed together, and, as so construed, the former section was intended to provide for the assessment for maintenance charges made before the completion of the reclamation work, and should cover only the period of construction, and assessments for future maintenance should be governed by the provisions of section 3456b.

3. Drains 🔑91—Remedy provided by statute against illegal assessment exclusive.

Under Pol. Code, § 3455, as amended by St. 1919, p. 604, providing for notice to be given by the trustees of a reclamation district of a hearing of any objections to plans and estimates and under subdivision 5 thereof, providing that the action of the reclamation board after hearing shall be final, and under section 3462, providing that the final order of the board of supervisors approving assessments shall be final, the remedy provided to landowners by section 3462, by an action in the superior court to have the assessment corrected, modified, or annulled, is exclusive.

4. Drains 🔑91—Levy and collection of assessments not enjoined where property owners failed to make statutory objections.

Where property owners assessed for maintenance of reclamation district failed to make any objection before the trustees at the hearing held as provided for in Pol. Code, § 3455, as amended by St. 1919, p. 604, and made no objections to the action of the board of supervisors as required by section 3462, they had no standing to bring an action in equity to enjoin the levy and collection of assessments, the principal objection to which was excessiveness of amount and manner in which apportioned.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Suit by John C. Richardson and others against J. W. Browning and others, as Board of Trustees of Reclamation District No. 833, to enjoin defendants from levying and collecting assessments. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

King & King, of Gridley, for appellants.

A. H. Hewitt, of Yuba City, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. This action was begun in the superior court of Butte county on June 2, 1922, for the purpose of—

> "restraining and enjoining them (the trustees of reclamation district No. 833) from proceeding in any manner to levy, assess, or collect said assessment No. 2, or in any manner, or by any bond issue whatsoever, attempting to proceed with the collection of said assessment No. 2 of said district No. 833, and that no further proceedings whatsoever be had by the board of trustees of said reclamation district in connection therewith, and that this honorable court decree and adjudge that all proceedings heretofore had by said board of trustees in connection with assessment No. 2 are void and of no effect and as in excess of and beyond the jurisdiction of said board, and that a writ of injunction issue on an order to show cause enjoining and restraining said board of trustees from proceeding in any manner with the levy, collection, and furtherance of said assessment No. 2 and for further relief."

An alternative writ and a temporary restraining order were issued by the superior court, and on the return day a general demurrer was filed. This was sustained by the court, and from the judgment entered thereon dismissing the action and vacating the temporary restraining order the appeal has been taken.

The complaint, after setting forth the regularity and validity of the organization of the district and the election and qualification of defendants as members of the board of trustees, proceeds:

> "That on the 18th day of August, 1921, said trustees approved and adopted certain plans and report, by them designated 'First Supplemental Plan and Report of Reclamation District No. 833,' and the estimates of the cost of the work of reclamation done and to be done, both under the original plan as modified and changed by said supplemental plan and report and under said supplemental plan and report, were also approved and confirmed. Said plan and report recites that theretofore there had been assessed against the lands of said district to meet the expenses and costs estimated in the original report and plan of reclamation in the sum of $500,000; that work under said original plan was then progressing, and the sum of $345,855.22 had already been spent under said original plan, and approximately 36 per cent. of the work provided to be done under the original plan had been completed; that the difference between the cost of the work to be done under the original plan, including expenses of all character, as therein estimated, and the estimated cost of the same as shown in the supplemental plan and report, is the sum of $725,099.32, and the estimated cost of new work provided in the supplemental plan is the sum of $71,835.47, and the estimated amount to be raised for maintenance for the period of 20 years is the sum of $202,065.21, making a total amount to be raised to complete the reclamation of the lands of the district in the sum of $1,000,000; that said plan and report was filed in the office of the county clerk of Butte county on the 19th day of August, 1921."

It appears further that on October 11, 1921, said trustees presented to the board of supervisors of the county their petition for the appointment of commissioners to view and assess upon the lands of the district and to apportion the same according to benefits the said sum of $1,000,000, reciting in said petition that the amount to be raised for the work done and to be done is the sum of $759,357.10, the amount for maintenance for the period of 20 years the sum of $202,065.21, and for incidental expenses $38,597.69; that said petition was granted, the commissioners appointed, who made and apportioned the assessment on said lands and filed their assessment list on May 3, 1922, with the clerk of said board of supervisors, "and proceedings had and taken thereon as under an original assessment pursuant to the provisions of law respecting an original assessment."

Then follows an allegation:

> That on May 11, 1922, said trustees ordered a special election to be held on Tuesday, June 6, 1922, at Gridley, in said district, to vote upon the question whether bonds of the district shall be issued to the amount of $1,000,000; that said assessment is about to be approved and confirmed by the board of supervisors, and proceedings had by the trustees whereby either bonds will be issued and sold or payment demanded of petitioners of their proportion of said assessment in a very large sum of money; that it nowhere appears that it will require 20 years to complete the work of reclamation, and that all of said reclamation works, as estimated in the original and supplemental plans, were substantially completed on or about January 1, 1922, and "said trustees well knew at all times herein mentioned that all of said proposed reclamation works would not, nor could not, require 20 years, * * * and that said trustees have not since the completion of said reclamation works instituted any proceedings to obtain maintenance funds as provided by section 3456, subd. B, of the Political Code.
> "That the said proceedings had and made in connection with said assessment No. 2 are unlawful and in excess of the jurisdiction of said board of trustees, in this, that said board has no jurisdiction to combine in one assessment an assessment for reclamation works and incidentals with another assessment for prospective and future maintenance over a long period of time; that said future maintenance assessment of $202,065.21 can be based only on assessment valuations as provided in section 3456b of the Political Code, and in the form and manner as therein provided, and cannot be combined with the assessment for reclamation works and incidentals as provided by law; that so to do was and is beyond the jurisdiction of said board of trustees and in excess of the powers delegated or authority vested in said board by law."

The foregoing is sufficient to indicate the ground of petitioners' alleged grievance. It is apparent that the trustees acted under the authority and direction of section 3455 (b) of the Political Code, as amended by St. 1919, p. 604, providing that:

> "(1) The board of trustees of such reclamation district must report to the board of supervisors of the county in which the district, or the greater part thereof is situate, by filing with the county clerk of said county two copies of every new, supplemental, or additional plan, if any, together with estimates of the cost of the contemplated works of the district, including incidental expenses, maintenance and repairs, necessary for the reclamation of the lands of the district in pursuance of any such plan.
> "(2) Thereupon the board of supervisors of such county must appoint three commissioners. * * * Said commissioners must view and assess upon the land within said district the said sum so estimated and shall apportion the same according to the benefits that will accrue to each tract of land in said district, respectively, by reason of the expenditures of said sums of money, and shall estimate the same in gold coin of the United States," etc.

But it is the claim of appellants that, to meet the expense of the future maintenance of the reclamation district, the trustees should have proceeded under said section 3456 (b), as amended by St. 1919, p. 607, providing:

> "In all cases when the work contemplated by the original or any supplemental plan of reclamation of any reclamation district shall have been completed, the trustees may so report to the board of supervisors of the county in which the district, or the greater part thereof is situate, together with a petition to the said board of supervisors to appoint assessment commissioners. Said report and petition shall set forth that the work contemplated by the original or supplemental plan of reclamation has been completed, and that hereafter the said reclamation district will only require funds for the maintenance and repair of the said works of reclamation. Upon filing said report and petition the said board of supervisors shall appoint three commissioners, each of whom shall be similarly qualified, and shall make and subscribe the same oath as is provided hereinabove for commissioners. When so appointed and so qualified such commissioners shall prepare an assessment list, which list shall contain the following information in separate columns. * * * Thereafter said assessment valuations shall be used as a basis for assessments in raising funds for the maintenance and repair of the works of reclamation and incidental expenses of said district. * * *
> "Thereafter, whenever, in the opinion of the trustees of the district, it shall be necessary to raise any sum for the construction, maintenance or repair of the works of reclamation, or for the incidental expenses of the district, the said board of trustees shall make an order, which order shall be entered in the minutes of the board and shall recite the total amount necessary to be raised and shall fix a rate designating the number of cents to be levied on each hundred dollars of assessment valuation shown on the list prepared and approved in the manner hereinabove provided."

In support of their contention that the trustees have no discretion to proceed otherwise than as provided in said section 3456b, appellants have traced the history of the legislation upon the subject, and they assert that "the species of maintenance provided for in section 3455 and the second clause of section 3459 was clearly limited to the duration of actual construction, and there was before 1917 no provision for maintenance after completion," but in that year the Legislature saw fit to depart from the former uncertain and irregular method of raising maintenance funds, and by said section 3456b was provided a "definite and reasonable way for the maintenance of the district after completion of the reclamation works." The clause of said section 3459 to which appellants refer provides:

> "If the original assessment is insufficient to provide for the complete reclamation of the lands of the district, or if further assessments are from time to time required to provide for the protection, maintenance and repair of the reclamation works, the trustees may file with the clerk of the board of supervisors of the county in which the district or the greater part thereof, is situated two copies of the plan of reclamation and a statement of the work done or to be done and its estimated cost, and the same proceeding shall be had thereon as provided in section three thousand four hundred fifty-five for an original plan of reclamation."

[1] Appellants contend that the two methods are entirely irreconcilable, since the basis for the assessment for construction of the works is the benefit to accrue to the land, while for future maintenance it is the assessed valuation. It is furthermore claimed that, if the two sections are in conflict, 3456b, being later in time and in numerical order, must prevail over 3455 and should be regarded as prescribing the only rule of procedure for expenditures in maintenance after the completion of the works. People v. Dobbins, 73 Cal. 257, 14 Pac. 860; section 4484, Pol. Code. In this connection, however, it is to be observed that section 3459, as we have quoted it, was enacted at the same time as 3456b (Stats. of 1919, p. 604), and the rule of construction prescribed by said section 4484 is:

> "If conflicting provisions are found in different sections of the same chapter or article, the provisions of the sections last in numerical order must prevail, unless such construction is inconsistent with the meaning of such chapter or article."

Said section 3459 does undoubtedly authorize the trustees to proceed according to the directions in section 3455, not only in providing for the complete reclamation of the lands, but also for the "maintenance" of the district without prescribing any limit as to the time of said maintenance.

[2] However, the reasonable view of these various sections is that the Legislature thereby intended that the assessment for maintenance made before completion of the works should cover only the period of construction, and that it should be apportioned and levied as prescribed in said section 3455, but the assessments for future maintenance should be governed by the provisions of said section 3456b. Manifestly it is difficult, if not impossible, to determine in advance with accuracy what the cost of maintenance would be for 20 years in the future, and why the trustees should have attempted it is probably known to themselves, but the reason does not appear upon the face of the record. We may assume, though, that in the sale of bonds and in the collection of the assessment the burden will be made as light as possible upon the property owners. Of course, the purpose of the reclamation legislation is commendable, but it is a matter of common knowledge that many farmers are staggering under the load of taxation thereby imposed, and it is but a truism to say that the trustees of these districts, clothed as they are with almost unlimited power to tax, which may be exercised so as to destroy the value of lands within the district, should exercise the power with the utmost regard for the welfare of those who carry the burden.

[3] But it does not appear to us that the act complained of was void, so as to be set aside in this proceeding.

Said section 3455 provides for notice to be given by the trustees of a hearing of any objections that may be made to the plans and estimates and (subdivision 5) "when the said reclamation board shall have taken action approving, modifying, or rejecting any such original, supplemental or new plan of reclamation after a hearing as herein provided, such action shall be final, and thereafter the sufficiency of said plans shall not be subject to attack either before the reclamation board or in any court." Herein it does not appear that appellants made any objection to said action of the trustees, nor is it questioned that notice of the hearing was given as required by the statute.

After providing for the appointment of commissioners of assessment and prescribing their duties and what the assessment lists shall contain and where they shall be filed, and requiring notice to be given of the hearing of any objections to said assessment, and authorizing the board of supervisors to hear any evidence that may be offered at said hearing and to modify or amend the assessment in any particular or to make a reapportionment of the entire assessment, the Legislature, in section 3462, has provided as to the final order of the board of supervisors approving the assessment that—

> "Such decision of said board of supervisors shall be final, and thereafter said assessment lists shall be conclusive evidence that the said assessment has been made and levied according to law, except in an action commenced as hereinafter provided. * * * No objection to such assessment shall be considered by the board of supervisors, or allowed in any other action or proceeding, unless such objection shall have been made in writing to the board of supervisors as above specified.

"Any person aggrieved by the decision of the board of supervisors may commence an action in the superior court of the county in which the greater part of said district is situated to have said assessment corrected, modified or annulled. Such action must be commenced within thirty days after said assessment list has been filed in the office of the county treasurer."

It is not disputed that all the steps required in said statutory proceeding were taken by the trustees and supervisors as therein prescribed, and it is not claimed that appellants made any objections whatever before the board of trustees or the board of supervisors, Indeed, it affirmatively appears that, at the time this action was brought, said assessment, which is herein challenged, was before said board for modification, amendment, or reapportionment, and it had not become final. It was undoubtedly the purpose of the Legislature to provide in said section 3462 an exclusive remedy for the landowner against an excessive or illegal assessment. Therein a tribunal is designated for the hearing and determination in the first instance of any objection that might be made by a landowner, and in case of an adverse decision an action may be brought in the superior court to correct or annul the assessment.

[4] We understand that this section would not operate to curtail the power of a court of equity to entertain an original proceeding to nullify an assessment in case of fraud or where it has been levied for a purpose not authorized by law (Finnan v. Reclamation Dist. No. 273, 26 Cal. App. 714, 148 Pac. 227, 152 Pac. 1197), but we have no such case. No element of fraud is suggested by the complaint nor is it claimed that it was not competent for the board of trustees to provide for the assessment of the lands for "maintenance" of the reclamation district, but the objection goes to the time and amount of the assessment—questions which appellants should have presented to the board of supervisors as required by said section 3462. The contention of appellants really amounts to this, that the assessment was excessive, and that it should have been differently apportioned. The policy of the law is to expedite the determination of such objections by requiring the pursuit of the method set forth in said section, and there seems to be no reason why it should not be regarded as furnishing an exclusive remedy in this case.

The subject is more elaborately considered in the Finnan Case, supra, and we deem it unnecessary to prolong the discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re LASLEY. (Motion No. 4051.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2. California. Feb. 21, 1923.)

Attorney and client ⚷40—False affidavit of attorney filed with application for admission to bar ground for revocation of license.

An attorney's false affidavit that he had never been charged with unprofessional conduct, filed with application for admission to the bar, made with knowledge that a charge of unprofessional conduct had in fact been made against him in other state in which he had practiced, held ground for revocation of license regardless of whether the charge was well founded.

Application by the Los Angeles Bar Association for revocation of license admitting James Frank Lasley to practice law. License revoked.

Robert B. Murphy and John E. Biby, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner Los Angeles County Bar Ass'n.

W. T. Helms, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. James Frank Lasley, who had been a practicing lawyer in Illinois before coming to this state, filed with the clerk of this court his application to be admitted to the bar of California. He accompanied his application with an affidavit, in the form prescribed for that purpose, wherein he swore that, so far as he was aware, no charges of unprofessional conduct or proceedings for disbarment had been filed against him before any bar association, court, or other body. On the recommendation of the board of bar examiners, to whom his application had been referred, this court, on March 8, 1920, made its order admitting him to practice law in all the courts of this state. The Los Angeles County Bar Association has filed a petition for the revocation of that order, alleging that Lasley's affidavit was false, in that, while practicing his profession in Illinois, charges of unprofessional conduct had been filed against him before the Peoria Bar Association. Lasley filed an answer which, admitting that charges had been preferred against him as alleged, attempts to justify his false affidavit by pleading, with much detail, that the charges were false and destitute of merit. He admits that when he filed the affidavit in this court he was fully aware of the charges previously made against him in Illinois.

Lasley's affidavit that he had never been charged with unprofessional conduct and his concealment of the fact of such charges was a fraud upon this court and upon the bar examiners. Regardless of whether the charges against him were well or ill founded, it was his duty to report them to this court and to the board of bar examiners, and to set forth in his affidavit a truthful statement of all the facts, in order that his previous record might be carefully delved into by those charged with that responsibility. In re Mash, 28 Cal. App. 692, 153 Pac. 961.

The order heretofore made admitting James Frank Lasley to practice in the courts of this state is set aside, his license is revoked, and his name is stricken from the roll of attorneys and counselors at law.

PEZZALIA v. SAN JOAQUIN LIGHT & POWER CORPORATION et al.

(Civ. 2558.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 14, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 12, 1923.)

1. Negligence ⚷136(9)—Contributory negligence question for jury.

Contributory negligence is a question of fact for the jury, even when the facts are undisputed, if reasonable men may draw different conclusions therefrom.

2. Electricity ⚷19(12) — Lineman, injured when telephone line, held by him, came into contact with defendant's high voltage wires, held not contributorily negligent as a matter of law.

Lineman, with 15 years' experience, who climbed pole to put new brackets thereon, with knowledge that a single telephone wire extended from such pole under high voltage electric power line on other side of road about 18 inches or 2 feet from such high voltage wire, and who was injured when pole swayed, causing telephone wire to come into contact with high voltage wire at a time when telephone wire was being held by lineman, held not contributorily negligent as a matter of law, question being one for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by Charles A. Pezzalia against the San Joaquin Light & Power Corporation and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Lindsay & Conley, of Fresno, for appellants.

Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. In an action for damages, a jury awarded the plaintiff the sum of $10,000, and from the judgment entered thereon the appeal has been taken. The nature of the action may be shown by the following allegations of the complaint:

"That on or about the 3d day of May, 1918, defendants owned, controlled, maintained, and operated a certain high voltage electric power line, in the said county of Merced, situated on the east side of a certain county highway in said county, which highway extends from the towns of Los Banos to Newman in said county. * * * That the defendants at all times herein mentioned transmitted and conducted electric current over and through said power line, and said wires carried and conducted more than 600 volts of electricity.

"That on or about the 3d day of May, 1918, the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Company owned, operated, and maintained a certain telephone pole line along the west side of said highway. * * * That said telephone pole line at all times herein mentioned carried and conducted less than 600 volts of electricity. That at a point on said highway about 2½ miles in a northerly direction from the said town of Los Banos, and in the county of Merced, and as a part of said telephone pole line, the said the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Company maintained a certain pole known as No. 61/12. That connected with said pole and running thence in an easterly direction there was at all times herein mentioned a certain single telephone wire. That said single telephone wire forms a part of a telephone system connected with a certain farmhouse in the vicinity of said pole No. 61/12. That in leading from said pole to said farmhouse said single telephone wire passes under the said high voltage electric power line of the defendants herein before referred to, and said power line passes over said single telephone wire. * * * That said single telephone wire and said telephone pole line were erected and operated prior to the erection and operation and maintenance of said high voltage electric power line.

"That on or about the 3d day of May, 1918, the plaintiff was employed by the said the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Company as an electric lineman * * * and while in the course of his employment, plaintiff was required to climb to the top of said telephone pole No. 61/12. That when plaintiff was near the top of said pole, and while at a height from the ground of about 25 feet, and while he was working on a wire forming a part of said telephone pole line and had said wire in his hands, the top of said pole was caused to sway slightly. That thereupon and without any carelessness and negligence of plaintiff the said single telephone wire was caused by said slight sway to come in contact with said high voltage electric power line.

"That immediately upon said contact, approximately 11,000 volts of electricity were transmitted through said single telephone wire to said pole No. 61/12 and into said wire being held in the hands of plaintiff, and into plaintiff's body."

Then follows an allegation and a description of the serious injury caused to plaintiff, and the particular negligence of defendants is specified as consisting "in constructing, operating, and maintaining said power line in such close proximity to said single telephone wire" and thereby causing "a high voltage of electricity" to be "transmitted to the body of plaintiff as aforesaid," and inflicting "upon him the injuries hereinbefore enumerated."

Appellants introduced no evidence at the trial, resting their case upon the showing made by respondent, and their only contention is that "the evidence shows conclusively that the respondent was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law," and that the trial court should have granted their motion for a nonsuit based upon that ground.

[1] Of course, there is no dispute as to the principle of law that applies to such situation. In Fernandes v. Sacramento City Ry. Co., 52 Cal. 45, it is stated as follows:

> "But when there is no controversy as to the facts, and from these it clearly appears what course a person of ordinary prudence would pursue under the circumstances, the question of negligence is purely one of law. In such a case there is no function for the jury to perform in respect to the question of negligence. But there is a large class of cases in which, though all the facts are admitted, a question arises whether the act imputed to a party as negligence was such as persons of ordinary prudence would have performed under the circumstances, and the court is unable to determine that question from the nature of the act itself and the other undisputed facts. In such cases it should be submitted to the jury whether the act in question was such as ordinary prudence dictated, or to the contrary."

It is unnecessary to multiply authorities on this question, but we may call attention to the emphasis placed by the Supreme Court in Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 Pac. 651, and Zibbel v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513, upon the solicitude that should be exercised by the courts to refrain from any unwarranted invasion of the province of the jury to pass upon disputed questions of fact or to determine between conflicting rational inferences.

In the former it is said:

> "The rule is, that negligence is a question of fact for the jury, even when there is no conflict in the evidence, if different conclusions upon the subject can be rationally drawn from the evidence. * * * If one sensible and impartial man might decide that the plaintiff had exercised ordinary care, and another equally sensible and impartial man that he had not exercised such care, it must be left to the jury. McKune v. Santa Clara Co., 110 Cal. 480. Our ideas as to what would be proper care vary according to temperament, knowledge, and experience. A party should not be held to the peculiar notions of the judge as to what would be ordinary care. That only can be regarded as a standard or rule which would be recognized or enforced by all learned and conscientious judges, or could be formulated into a rule. In the nature of things no such common standard can be reached in cases of negligence, where reasonable men can reach opposite conclusions upon the facts."

And hence it was declared that, in such instances, the question should be submitted to the jury.

In the Zibbell Case, the court declared:

> "It is only where no fact is left in doubt, and no deduction or inference other than negligence can be drawn by the jury from the evidence, that the court can say, as a matter of law, that contributory negligence is established. Even where the facts are undisputed, if reasonable minds might draw different conclusions upon the question of negligence, the question is one of fact for the jury."

[2] With this well-established principle, as thus enunciated, in view, must we say that plaintiff's conduct was such that no other reasonable inference can be drawn than that imputing to him such want of ordinary care as to deprive him of any right to recover, no matter how gross was the negligence of appellants contributing to the injury?

By his own testimony must he be judged, as no other evidence presents him in any more favorable light. He testified he had been an electric lineman for about 15 years prior to the accident. His work that day required the placing of two new brackets, one on each side of the pole, and the transferring of the iron circuit on the middle bracket down to the new bracket, and putting a copper circuit on said middle bracket. Before going up the pole he observed the high tension wire of appellants and said telephone wire to be quite close together, "about 18 inches, 2 feet, something like that it looked from the ground." He knew that the line on the east side of the road was a high power line and that contact between those two lines was likely to cause injury. He consulted with the other two members of his crew, and it was agreed that if he would go up there carefully he could do the work required. He started up the pole, and when he arrived at the point where the brackets were to be nailed on, in his own language:

> "I done just the same as I always did, I put my safety around the pole and nailed the bracket, and then moved to step up a little higher to lower my iron wires. I had to unbuckle my safety to do that, and I got up a little higher, and while I was doing it I put my hand up on this drop wire, and about that time the pole swayed and that was the last of me."

He further testified that he put his hand on top of the bracket; that, after he had nailed the bracket, one step further was required to go higher on the other circuit and, as quick as he moved, the pole moved "a little bit," about six inches.

> "Q. Was there any way, Mr. Pezzalia, that you, in that position that you were in, could have then prevented the pole moving? A. I don't know how. Q. Well, was there any way? A. There was not, unless you would have the guys, four guys, and that ain't practicable. Q. And were you moving on the pole after you had taken this one step as carefully as it was possible for you to do? A. Yes, sir."

It appears further that he had tools in his belt with which to remove the wires, and, in response to questions as to his conduct in putting his hand on the bracket, he replied:

> "Well, it is customary to get hold of anything that is on a pole when you are moving and working on it. I could have taken hold of the board or the other bracket, but I didn't know that this one bracket was going to give me this shock, it just happened that it came from that. I put it on the bracket to hold myself going up, steadying myself."

It is apparent that in many cases it is difficult, if not impossible, for the trial or a reviewing court to determine whether "sensible and impartial" men might disagree as to whether plaintiff exercised due care. In the last analysis it is plain that the attempt to apply the rule prescribed by the law results in the expression of the opinion of the court as to whether the party acted as a sensible and prudent man ought and might be expected to act. The case may be so clear and palpable that the opinion against the plaintiff may be declared with assurance of general acquiescence on the part of intelligent and informed persons. But, if there appears to the court any element of uncertainty as to whether a rational exculpatory inference may be drawn, the court then should not substitute its judgment or opinion for that of a jury. In applying the test to the peculiar accident the court may in some instances, no doubt, be guided wholly by its own knowledge and judgment of human nature and rational conduct, but, generally speaking, the court will be aided by the opinion of those having had experience in the particular line of work. Herein it is the claim of appellants that the court should of its own knowledge say that the conduct of respondent, as revealed by the evidence, is so incompatible with reasonable caution and prudence as to deprive him of the right to complain of the admitted negligence of appellants.

On the other hand, the contention is that the bare facts are not such as to coerce the judgment and conscience of the judge against the plaintiff, but the case falls within that debatable zone wherein other circumstances, including the opinions of other persons, may be accorded some significance. Respondent says:

> "In this case four experienced linemen, after due consideration of the problem confronting Pezzalia, came to the conclusion that the work could be safely done. The fact that it was subsequently safely done is a justification of this opinion. (This refers to the subsequent restoration by one of the employees of the line on said pole.) Here the undisputed evidence shows that Pezzalia was doing the work as carefully as he could. He had partially accomplished his purpose, when the pole gave an unusual, as distinguished from the anticipated, sway, causing the accident. This is not a case where a man forgot dangers. The evidence shows that Pezzalia knew and appreciated the possible danger at all times, and was endeavoring to avoid it. It is not a case where the injured man went heedlessly into danger. He acted upon the combined experience of men engaged in this particular line of work, when he carefully undertook to do it under the unjustifiable belief that it was safe."

Of course, it is no answer to say that he was engaged in a hazardous and dangerous piece of work. The occupation of a lineman is necessarily dangerous, and he is only required to exercise that degree of caution which should be expected of ordinarily prudent men occupied with that kind of endeavor. If we may attach any importance to the opinion of those experienced in such matters, we may not lay aside the view of those who were participating with him. It is true that the danger was increased by the act of appellant in placing their wires so close to the telephone wire, but it should be a clear case of recklessness and indifference to consequences on the part of plaintiff that would permit appellants to maintain that, by reason of their own negligence, he should have abandoned his business rather than subject himself to the increased peril. At any rate, we feel sure that it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that plaintiff's conduct in ascending the pole in pursuance of his duty as a lineman manifested such imprudence and want of caution as to make the consequences of his injury necessarily imputable to his own negligence.

The only feature in the case, as we view it, that injects any doubt into the question is the act of plaintiff in placing his hand upon said wire or bracket at the time he took the last step. But it must be remembered that the wire was then perfectly harmless, and the contact would have resulted in no injury if it had not been for the unusual swaying of the pole, which brought the wires together. We think he was not bound at his peril to anticipate such contingency, and it is fairly debatable whether, under the circumstances, said act was excusable.

We may say that the jurors were fully and accurately instructed as to every feature of the case, and especially as to the doctrine of contributory negligence, and some consideration should be paid to their opinion, as expressed in their verdict, of the care exercised by plaintiff, as well as to that of the trial judge, manifested in the denial of the motion for nonsuit, unless the reviewing court is compelled by its own judgment to say that, in reason, only a decision opposed to plaintiff can be reached.

Many interesting cases are cited by appellants, which, they claim, point the way to a reversal herein, but most of them are easily distinguishable in their facts and can therefore afford little aid, but we may notice specifically those that are more nearly analogous.

In Woodward v. City of Taunton, 203 Mass. 63, 89 N. E. 114, as stated by appellants, an experienced lineman was injured while engaged in the performance of his duties by reason of a contact of an electric light wire with the telephone wire upon which he was working. The plaintiff was sent out to lower a messenger wire because it was too close to an electric light wire of high voltage. The plaintiff testified "that the wires were moving a little at the time," and that the wires were very close to each other. He touched the telephone wire while he was standing on a copper roof, a thing which he knew to be dangerous. Defendant's motion for a nonsuit was granted, and the judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts. It was not clear just how the accident happened, but the court declared:

> "As we have said, the two wires must have been brought together by him [the plaintiff] or been so near each other that they came in contact without any action on his part. It is of no consequence which was the fact. In either event, for an experienced man to grasp the wire under those circumstances, while standing on a copper roof, is as matter of law an act of negligence."

It may be observed, however, that the wires were so close together, being only 4 or 5 inches apart, that several times they were seen to be "flickering and sparking," and the danger was so great and menacing that the conduct of plaintiff could be properly characterized as destitute of ordinary care. Herein the wires were from 18 inches to 2 feet apart, and there was ground for the opinion that the work might be done without injury.

Another Massachusetts case is Chisholm v. New England Telephone & Telegraph Co., 176 Mass. 125, 57 N. E. 383. Therein a lineman met his death by contact with an electric wire of a third person at a point where, by the chafing of the wire against a tree, the insulation had been worn off. The relation of master and servant existed between the plaintiff and the defendant, and the court, after noting that the deceased had violated a standing order of the defendant that linemen should examine poles before ascending them, said:

> "The danger from an imperfectly insulated wire is the most characteristic risk which a lineman has to encounter. That general risk the deceased assumed by entering upon his employment."

It was also impliedly, if not directly, held that the defendant was not guilty of negligence.

In Columbus R. Co. v. Dorsey, 119 Ga. 363, 46 S. E. 635, a lineman was killed upon ascending a pole in the discharge of his duty by coming into contact with a heavily charged wire belonging to a third person, from which wire the insulation had worn off near the pole. It was held that the danger was so obvious that it was the duty of the deceased to avoid it, and that he should have taken a safe way to pass, or, if none was available, he should have declined to proceed rather than to incur such peril.

In Dwight Mfg. Co. v. Word, 200 Ala. 221, 75 South. 979, the cause was reversed for errors in rulings upon the pleadings and in giving certain instructions. The plaintiff, who was an expert lineman, ascended the tree where the accident occurred for the purpose of wrapping a telephone wire with tape, to prevent its contact with a limb. In doing this he pushed his shoulder against defendant's wire and was severely injured. The tree was from 10 to 15 feet from the power and telephone pole, from which the wires of both companies ran into and through the branches of the tree, about 15 feet above ground. Plaintiff had known for five years of the presence of the power wires on the street, had seen the poles, and knew the wires carried high voltage. He testified that he did not know that they were in the tree or so close to the telephone wires, and that he went about his work without looking for or thinking about the power wires, which he never saw at all at the time of his injury. The Supreme Court did not hold that the plaintiff was necessarily chargeable with contributory negligence, but only that he could not excuse himself for his ignorance of the danger, if he failed to exercise ordinary care to discover and avoid the danger and the injury.

In Ergo v. Merced Falls Gas & Electric Co. 161 Cal. 334, 119 Pac. 101, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 79, the decisive factor was the forgetfulness of the danger on the part of the plaintiff, and the court followed the rule of the authorities that:

> "It is negligence for one to remember and avoid a known danger in one moment, and forget it the next, where nothing has happened to confuse or distract him or cause such forgetfulness, except his own failure to exercise his memory."

Therein the employee of the defendant was working in close proximity to wires carrying a high current of electricity, which he knew to be dangerous and to be avoided, and he came in contact with such wires as the result of his own forgetfulness, there appearing to be no reasonable excuse for his forgetfulness.

In Andrews v. Valley Ice Co., 167 Cal. 11, 138 Pac. 699, plaintiff's testate was an employee of the defendant, Valley Ice Company. He was working on the construction of a building near wires heavily charged with electricity, and he brought his ruler in contact with one of these wires and was killed by the resultant shock. It is quite apparent that the conduct of the decedent was inexcusable, but it is worthy of note that the Supreme Court, although stating that the case fell under the rule that "one who places himself in the way of an obvious and well-understood peril is guilty of contributory negligence" and that "temporary forgetfulness or a reckless curiosity hurried him to an untimely death," also based the decision upon the ground that deceased "was acting outside the scope of his employment and against the order of his master."

Of all the cases cited respondent thinks that Teachout v. Grand Rapids, G. H. & M. R. Co., 179 Mich. 388, 146 N. W. 241, is the most nearly in point. Therein however, there was no eyewitness to testify, the lineman having been killed. The Supreme Court of Michigan, though, held that whether such lineman "was negligent in coming in contact with certain high tension electric wires, strung not more than 18 inches above the telephone wires, while he was repairing the latter" was a question for the jury, the presumption being that he was in the exercise of ordinary care. Therein was reiterated the rule declared in 15 Cyc. 475, and other authorities, to the effect that to give rise to the defense of contributory negligence in an action for injury done by electricity—

> "it must be shown that plaintiff, in coming in contact with the appliances, voluntarily and unnecessarily exposed himself to danger, and if reasonable men might honestly differ on the question, the court will not hold plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law."

As we view the record and understand the principles of law that must be applied to the facts, we do not feel warranted in holding that the plaintiff was so clearly negligent as to require the case to be withdrawn from the jury.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

ANDERSON v. SAN FRANCISCO-OAKLAND TERMINAL RYS. (Civ. 4377.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 17, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 18, 1923.)

1. Carriers 🔑327—Prospective passenger struck by car while crossing track to board car traveling in opposite direction held not contributorily negligent.

Prospective passenger who was struck by interurban street car while crossing the private right of way to board other car going in opposite direction, with notice that the car which later struck her was coming faster than usual, held not guilty of contributory negligence.

2. Carriers 🔑280(1)—Carriers owe extraordinary duty to passengers.

Carriers owe more than an ordinary duty to their passengers.

3. Carriers 🔑318(1)—Street railroad held negligent where car struck prospective passenger crossing right of way to waiting station.

Where street car operating between two cities struck prospective passenger crossing private right of way of railroad toward waiting room established by railroad for persons desiring to board its cars, at a point from which the passenger could have been seen by the trainmen for a distance of 600 feet, while the car was passing the waiting room at a speed of 15 miles an hour, without ringing a bell, or giving any warning of its intention of passing the station without stopping, the evidence was sufficient to warrant finding the railroad guilty of negligence.

4. New trial 🔑131(2)—Motion on ground of insufficiency of evidence without specifying insufficiency denied.

A motion for new trial on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict without specifying in its bill of exceptions any particulars in which the evidence was insufficient could not be considered.

5. Damages 🔑130(3)—$12,000 verdict for painful injuries to scalp, wrist, right clavicle, fourth cervical vertebra, and four ribs held not excessive.

Where plaintiff suing for personal injuries was 78 years old at the time of the accident, with an expectancy of five years, was not shown to be dependent on her earnings for her living, nor to have had any earning capacity, nor to have suffered impairment of earning power, and where the injuries consisted of laceration of the scalp, numerous abrasions on the body, injury to wrist, fractures of the right clavicle, the fourth cervical vertebra, and four ribs, causing her to suffer great pain and to expend for medical treatment more than $2,000, a verdict of $12,000, held not excessive under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 5.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Action by Lois Anderson against the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck and M. M. Bourquin, all of San Francisco, and Chapman & Trefethen, of Oakland, for appellant.

Snook & Brown, of Oakland (Geo. M. Naus, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The defendant operates street cars between Piedmont and Oakland. From Highland avenue to the east the cars are operated over a private right of way. The diagram attached to the transcript shows a section of that right of way 100 feet wide and 900 feet in length. On the south the private right of way is bounded by Park way. Hillside avenue approaches from the south and ends in Park way. The railroad track comes from a southerly direction, and at Highland avenue swings into the private right of way, and then down a grade of 7 to 8 per cent. throughout the strip of ground included in the diagram. For the uses of the patrons of the road the defendant has located on the private right of way opposite the foot of Hillside avenue a waiting place which is marked on the diagram "Umbrella Shed." An intending passenger from Hillside avenue can cross Park way, then cross a concrete sidewalk, then pass up some stairs to the umbrella shed, and, if he desires to board a car going toward Oakland, it is necessary for him to cross the tracks leading to Piedmont and then continue on his course, going still further north until he reaches a fence that is on the north side, and there he will be in a position to enter the cars operated by the defendant, which have a side entrance located in about the middle of the car. The right of way on both sides of the tracks has been planted with small bushes and palms. Photographs attached to the transcript show that the distances and obstructions are such that between the umbrella shed and the curve in the tracks at the east end of the private right of way are such that one of fair vision can see a person 5 feet 6 inches tall without difficulty. The railroad tracks consist of ties and rails placed on the surface of the ground in about the same manner as the ordinary tracks of a steam railroad. In some places fillings appear making the surface somewhat more nearly level and regular. One of these filled spots is the space between the umbrella shed and the fence opposite. The locations of objects, distances, etc., as above described, have existed since 1913, and ever since the plaintiff went to reside in that immediate neighborhood.

[1, 2] On the 20th day of January, 1921, the plaintiff left the place where she was residing with her daughter (the second house on the street from the station), and went to the umbrella shed, intending to go to Oakland. The exact time is not clear, but in any event it was in the neighborhood of half past 1 or 2 o'clock in the afternoon. When she arrived at the umbrella shed, she looked for a car coming from the east, and seeing none she took a seat. Later she arose from her seat, and looking up the track, she saw a car coming around the curve into the private right of way. She then commenced to cross the right of way to the fence opposite the umbrella shed. She stated that she looked toward the on-coming car at least three times, which she specifically mentioned. She also stated that she looked at other times, but in this connection she based that statement upon her habit of doing so, and did not claim to have any independent recollection of facts as to the specific time and specific place of such observations. In reply to a question propounded by the appellant she stated that when the car was from 50 to 120 feet away from her she was 5 feet or 6 feet on the south side of the inbound car. At about that time she noticed that the car was coming faster than usual; nevertheless she proceeded toward the fence. In view of the testimony that we have just mentioned the appellant urges most vigorously that the respondent was guilty of contributory negligence, and cites and relies on such authorities as Arnold v. San Francisco-Oakland T. Rys., 175 Cal. 1, 164 Pac. 798. Such authorities are not in point in the case at bar.

> "They are, most of them, if not all, cases of strangers or persons acting independently, and having no relation to the defendant—cases of persons toward whom the defendant owed no duty other than that which all persons owe to each other under like circumstances of meeting by chance, not cases involving the duties and obligations of a carrier to a passenger. Carriers owe more than an ordinary duty to their passengers. * * *" Franklin v. Motor Road Co., 85 Cal. 63, 70, 24 Pac. 723, 725; 10 C. J. 1112, § 1492; Chunn v. City & Suburban Ry., 207 U. S. 302, 308, 28 Sup. Ct. 63, 52 L. Ed. 219.

[3] The appellant urges with equal vigor that the record does not show any negligence on the part of the defendant. We think the contention is not sustained by the record. In addition to the circumstances of time and place as above indicated, the record shows that the plaintiff left the umbrella shed and was walking out across the defendant's right of way and in the direction of the fence where it was necessary for her to go to board a car for Oakland. In very short, she was inside of the premises of the defendant and by the movements of her body she was indicating to the employee of the defendant that she was an intending passenger to go to Oakland. She was in a position where she could see and could be seen for a distance of 600 feet up the track toward the curve. She was near by a point that the company had established as a waiting room for persons desiring to board its cars. It owed to her a higher degree of care than it owed to persons in the public streets. While she stood in that position the defendant's car approached from the east, one witness testified, at a speed of 25 to 30 miles an hour; and, as it passed the umbrella shed, the car was going at a speed of 15 miles an hour without ringing a bell or giving any warning of its intention of passing the station without stopping. It was going so fast that after it struck the plaintiff it ran on a distance of 75 or 100 feet before it was brought to a standstill. If the jury based its verdict on the facts which we have stated it cannot be said that the verdict was not sustained by the evidence. Chunn v. City & Suburban Ry., supra; 10 C. J. 929, § 1351.

[4, 5] The jury brought in a verdict for $12,000. Judgment was entered accordingly. Thereafter the defendant moved for a new trial on all of the statutory grounds, the motion was denied, and at this time the defendant attacks the verdict as being excessive. At the time of the accident the plaintiff was 78 years of age; her expectancy of life was 5 years. The evidence does not show that she was dependent upon her earnings for her living, or that she had any earning capacity, and there is neither allegation nor proof that her earning power has been impaired. In the accident her scalp was lacerated. There were many abrasions on the body and many black and blue spots. The left hand suffered what is known as wrist drop, caused by the injury to the seventh cervical nerve. The right clavicle was fractured a little to the left of the middle. There was also a fracture of the fourth cervical vertebra, and of the second, third, fourth, and fifth ribs. There was angulation and some displacement of the fourth rib, and angulation on the right side. The break of the cervical vertebra constituted what is commonly called a broken neck. The kidneys apparently suffered an injury, as was evidenced by the passing of blood shortly after the accident. The plaintiff was taken forthwith to a hospital, where she was given immediate and continuous aid. While there she suffered great pain, especially in breathing. She remained at the hospital until the 28th day of February, and then was taken home. Until March 5th it was necessary that she should have two nurses. Apparently she received the most attentive and most expert medical assistance, and the expenses of the treatment amounted to $2,127.18. Those special damages were hardly controverted by the defendant. At the time of the trial, four months after the accident, the plaintiff stated she was recovered except that she was more timid than formerly, and that she could not pick up small objects like pins, and she further stated and illustrated to the jury that the movement of her head was limited so that she could not turn her head to the right or to the left to the same extent that an ordinary person can do. Assuming, in support of the judgment, that the bill for special damages was allowed in full, it then follows that the jury allowed $9,872.82, the balance of the verdict, as for pain and suffering. The question addressed to us at this time, therefore, is: Was the sum so allowed for pain and suffering excessive? In its motion the appellant made the attack on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict; but it did not specify in its bill of exceptions any particulars in which the evidence was insufficient. The attack from this angle cannot be considered. Graybill v. De Young, 140 Cal. 323, 327, 73 Pac. 1067. The appellant also attacked the verdict on the ground that the same was excessive; the excess appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice. Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 5. In reply to this attack the respondent cites and relies on the leading case in California, Aldrich v. Palmer et al., 24 Cal. 513, 516. In that case the Supreme Court said:

> "Where the law furnishes no rule for the measurement of damages, their assessment is peculiarly the province of the jury, and the court will never interfere with their verdict merely on the ground of excess. * * * The amount of the verdict is not suggestive of either passion or prejudice, or corruption. * * *" (Italics ours.)

The language used above by Mr. Chief Justice Sanderson was apparently carefully chosen from the authorities. In 1812 Mr. Chief Justice Kent was called upon to decide a similar question in Coleman v. Southwick, 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 45, 52, 6 Am. Dec. 253, 258. In his decision, probably the leading case in America, he stated:

> "In short, the damages must be flagrantly outrageous and extravagant, or the court cannot undertake to draw the line; for they have no standard by which to ascertain the excess. These are the principles which have been laid down by the most eminent judges who have presided in the English courts since the year 1760, and by which they have uniformly governed themselves in cases in which the damages would appear to have been beyond all comparison, more excessive than in the present case. Leeman v. Allen, 2 Wils. 160; Boardman v. Carrington, 2 Id. 244; Wilford v. Berkley, 1 Burr. 609; Redshaw v. Brook, 2 Wils. 405; Bruce v. Rawlins, 3 Id. 60; Huckle v. Money, 2 Id. 205; Leith v. Pope, 2 W. Bl. 1327; Gilbert v. Burtenshaw, Cowp. 230; Duberly v. Gunning, 4 T. R. 651. In one case in an action for crim. con. the jury gave £5,000, and Lord Kenyon said he would have been satisfied if only nominal damages had been given, yet he knew of no case that would authorize the court to interfere, and he said he had not courage enough to make the first precedent. The doctrine contained in these cases has been acknowledged to be sound law, and has been adopted and sanctioned by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in the case of Coffin v. Coffin, 4 Mass. 1, 3 Am. Dec. 189, and by this court in the case of Tillotson v. Cheetham, 2 John. 63, 3 Am. Dec. 459." (Italics ours.)

Some of the American states have fixed the amounts by statute. We are not permitted to consider those amounts in determining such questions. Redfield v. Oakland C. S. Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 277, 285, 42 Pac. 822, 1063. By parity of reasoning we are not entitled to consider the amounts that have been approved or disapproved in the courts of other jurisdictions. We are bound, however, to confine our consideration to the record in each particular case. Doolin v. Omnibus Cable Co., 125 Cal. 141, 144, 57 Pac. 774. The record on its face does not show passion or prejudice.

The judgment is affirmed.

SLEEPER v. BOARD of SUP'RS OF LAKE COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2536.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 9, 1923.)

Mandamus ⚷13—Waters and water courses ⚷225—Proponents of water district must furnish board of supervisors with sufficient information as to purposes of creating such district.

Proponents of a water district sought to be organized under the County Water District Act must furnish the supervisors with sufficient information as to their purposes and objects to enable the supervisors intelligently to exercise the discretion vested in them in establishing the boundaries of a proposed district and excluding and including lands, and, failing to do so, proponents may not compel action by the board to establish the boundaries of such a proposed water district and to call an election to determine whether such district shall be incorporated.

Original application by J. M. Sleeper for writ of mandate to compel J. M. Adamson and others, as members of the Board of Supervisors of Lake County, to establish a county water district. Writ denied.

William Henion, of Lakeport, and Fred J. Harris, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

H. B. Churchill, Dist. Atty., of Lakeport, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. Petitioner makes original application to this court for a writ of mandate requiring respondents to establish the boundaries of a proposed county water district sought to be organized under the County Water District Act approved June 10, 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 1049), and to call an election "for the purpose of determining whether such water district shall be incorporated."

A petition for the formation of such district was presented to the respondents, and after due hearing the board found that "no lands situated in said proposed water district will be benefited by said district or the formation thereof" and denied the petition. The proposed district embraces a large territory. About one-fifth thereof is composed of a number of valleys around Clear Lake, and the remainder is mountainous. The petition is silent as to the purposes for which it is proposed to organize the district, except such as may be inferred from the law itself. The source of water supply is not stated. It is apparent that all of the lands of the proposed district cannot be irrigated, and the petition does not disclose where the water, if any, is to be applied. The evidence produced at the hearing before the board is as silent as the petition on the foregoing questions. The witness of proponents who appeared to be most familiar with the situation described several possible reservoir sites, widely separated, and testified on cross-examination by the district attorney:

> "If this was solely for irrigation, no land would be benefited except what was irrigated. They may not only irrigate, but they may develop power, and every bit of land can be benefited by development of power. Q. What is the proposed system of works of the water district? A. I don't know. Q. Do you know what the object of the proposed district is? A. For which? Q. The proposition of the formation of the various reservoir districts? A. I don't know; I can't answer you that, Mr. Churchill. Q. Before the board can determine the matter, it would be essential to know that fact, what their proposed system would be, and how they are going to be benefited by the district. A. No; because the law provides it may be organized for three things, irrigation, domestic use, or furnishing of power. It must be for one of those three things, or it may be for the protection of water rights. That would be a great thing, even though they did not irrigate. I look on this that it is a protection of the rights of the land around the lake. That would be the greatest benefit that could accrue. * * * Q. You would not object to having a man taxed in Upper Lake for land that was irrigated in Big Valley? A. I would not, because anything that develops any section of Lake county is a benefit to any other section."

A large number of landowners protested against the formation of the proposed district. One of them testified at the hearing before the board as follows:

> "Q. Have you ever been able to ascertain what these proponents propose to do after they have organized a district? A. No; I don't know what they intend to do. Q. Have you ever conversed or asked them what they proposed to do? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did they tell you? A. Just form a water district to keep somebody else from doing anything, that was about the way I was able to size up the question. Q. You have never been able to get a definite statement from any one of them as to what they proposed doing? A. No, sir; not one, and I have tried to do so."

Section 3 of the statute provides:

"On the final hearing said board shall make such changes in the proposed boundaries as may be deemed advisable and shall define and establish such boundaries. But said board shall not modify said boundaries so as to exclude from such proposed district any territory which would be benefited by the formation of such district; nor shall any lands which will not, in the judgment of said board, be benefited by such district, * * * be included within such proposed district."

The valleys included within the boundaries of the proposed district are on different sides of a large lake, and it is apparent that it would not be practicable to irrigate some of these valleys from a water supply available for the irrigation of others. The respondents were not informed as to the source from which a water supply, if any, was to be obtained. They were not given any information which would enable them to determine what lands would or what would not be benefited by the formation of the proposed district or to decide intelligently whether or not to exclude the lands of any of the protestants. If it be said that the statute does not require the petition to state the purposes of the proposed district or the source of its water supply, the law does contemplate that an intelligent judgment shall be given by the board upon the question of including and excluding lands, and the basis for that judgment must be found, if not in the petition, at least in the evidence produced at the hearing. Under this statute it is possible to organize a water district without the consent and against the protest of every landowner therein, and the landowners are entitled to be reasonably informed of the nature of the proposed works and the objects intended to be accomplished in order that they may show, if such be the fact, that their lands will not be benefited. In the absence of such information, both the landowners and the board of supervisors would be required to proceed in the dark, if petitioner's contentions be sound. If organized, the district would be authorized to incur indebtedness and issue bonds which would become a lien on all the lands of the district, even though some of the lands might receive no benefit from such district. It is reasonable to require the proponents of such a district to furnish the supervisors with sufficient information as to their purposes and objects to enable the supervisors to intelligently exercise the discretion vested in them in the matters of establishing the boundaries of the proposed district and excluding and including lands. Since the proponents failed to supply the respondents with such information, petitioner is not entitled to the writ prayed for.

The petition is denied.

PEOPLE v. KADY. (Cr. No. 924.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District Division 1, California. Feb. 2, 1923. Rehearing Denied Feb. 27, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court, April 3, 1923.)

1. Arson 🔑37(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction.

Evidence that the circumstances under which a fire occurred in a room, in which defendant had insured goods, indicated that the fire was of incendiary origin, and that defendant had stated before the fire that he had previously burned a stock of goods and collected insurance thereon and would do so again, held sufficient to sustain a conviction for arson.

2. Criminal law 🔑371(12)—Evidence of intention to burn building for insurance is admissible to show motive.

In a prosecution for arson, evidence that defendant had made proof of loss under insurance policies issued to him covering the insured goods which were in the building was admissible to show motive for burning them, though it also tended to show the commission of the separate offense of burning a building with intent to defraud the insurer.

3. Criminal law 🔑956(13)—Misconduct of jurors cannot be shown by affidavits made on information and belief based on jurors' statements.

Misconduct of jurors in making experiments out of court cannot be established by affidavits of counsel made upon information and belief, based upon statements of certain jurors made to counsel.

4. Criminal law 🔑957(1)—Verdict cannot be impeached by jurors' evidence except to show determination by chance.

The verdict of a jury may not be impeached by the evidence of the jurors themselves, with the single exception that it may be shown that the verdict was determined by chance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; John L. Hudner, Judge.

M. F. Kady was convicted of arson, and he appeals from the judgment of conviction and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

Frank E. Dominguez and W. T. Helms, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Appellant, and one Farris, were charged by the information of the district attorney with the crime of arson, which was alleged to have been committed on or about the 16th day of November, 1921, in the county of Santa Barbara. That the crime charged was of the first degree was shown by appropriate allegations. The jury failed to agree as to the guilt of Farris, but found appellant to be guilty of the crime in the second degree. There was a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and the judgment of imprisonment followed. The appeal is taken from the order denying the motion and from the judgment.

[1] Appellant's principal contention is that the evidence produced by the prosecution failed to show that the fire which he was accused of having kindled was of incendiary origin; he claims that the contrary was established, and that it was made to appear by the evidence that the fire was caused by sparks emanating from a fireplace during his absence from the place. A statement of the facts as the evidence for the prosecution disclosed them to be will demonstrate that this contention is without merit.

Defendants were natives of Syria and were engaged as vendors of oriental stuffs, rugs, etc. They appeared in the city of Santa Barbara in September, 1921, and made inquiries of the custodian of a building looking to the renting of rooms. The building was used in part for office purposes and in part for living quarters of persons regularly residing there. For the most part, if not altogether, this appellant acted as spokesman for the two men. Rooms such as they wanted were not available in September. They returned again early in October and learned that two rooms would be vacated on the 1st of November. Appellant engaged the rooms, paying the November rental in advance. On the 1st or 2d day of November the two men appeared and took possession of the rooms, and in the course of the next few days brought in a few articles of furniture, a rug, cretonne curtains for the windows, and a number of boxes containing articles of wearing apparel. In one of the rooms was a fireplace, and in this room all of the merchandise was placed. Some wooden shelves were installed, and a rack upon which to hang clothing was erected. After the merchandise and furniture had been placed in the room, Farris requested the custodian of the building to introduce him to an insurance agent. The custodian referred him to an agent who had an office near by, and two policies of insurance were issued covering fire loss which might occur. The total amount covered by the policies was the sum of $5,150. About a week after the men had taken possession of the rooms, the custodian of the building observed this appellant carrying a sack of charcoal to the apartment. He expressed surprise that charcoal should be used in grates instead of coal, but was assured by appellant that charcoal was "the best to use." On the evening of the 16th of November a tenant in the building, noting the presence of smoke, investigated to determine its source, and found that it was emerging from the rooms occupied by the appellant and Farris. Neither of the latter were at that time about the premises and the door was locked. Upon entrance being effected, fire was found in the room, and charcoal was burning in the grate. There were evidences that articles of apparel had been destroyed. Some of the charcoal remaining in a bag was burned in a grate by the custodian of the building some days after the fire occurred, and it was found that, upon being ignited, the charcoal threw sparks for a distance of several feet into the room away from the grate. This fact furnishes a basis for the argument of appellant that the fire must have been caused by these sparks from the charcoal during the absence of the defendants. In view of certain testimony given by other witnesses, it may strongly be inferred that, in choosing the charcoal as fuel, appellant sought either to use it as a means of igniting inflammable material placed near the grate, or to aid a defense of accident after he had purposely set on fire the merchandise which he had stored in the room. We revert now to the testimony of witness Boury. This witness was a fellow Syrian, a missionary priest, who had been acquainted with the two defendants for more than a year. He had purchased merchandise from them and had been visited in a social way by the defendants. On an occasion about a year before the date of the commission of the crime charged, defendants were visitors at the priest's house. The latter had some Syrian newspapers published in America in which he had observed accounts relative to bankruptcy proceedings affecting other Syrian residents in the United States. Boury testified that appellant told him it was all "bluff" about those Syrian men having lost their goods through bankruptcy. The narrative may be continued in the language of the witness as used on the stand:

> "He (Kady) says, 'I know every state, and I know the different Syrian people there.' He said: 'That is all bluff. I was doing that myself.' I said, 'How?' He told me he was in San Francisco, and near San Francisco, a little place by Oakland, I think, and a man he have a business store, by the name of Ayoube —I think the fellow is a relative of Mr. Kady; the wife of Mr. Ayoube and Mr. Kady are cousins, and this man has a good name. He took the goods from him and shipped it to Salt Lake, and 'at Salt Lake,' he said, 'I have a fire.' I said, 'How you have a fire, and you get out that way?' He says: 'I know how. I never was caught in my life.' I said, 'How you do it?' He said, 'I dig a little hole in the place and I put the charcoal, and the charcoal—nobody know it, and it take the charcoal the time to be burned out, and 10 or 11 o'clock I have the fire, and I collect from the insurance,' he said, 'between fifteen and eighteen thousand,' something like that; I don't remember. Q. Was Charles Farris present all of that time? A. Charles Farris with him, and my housekeeper too. Q. And did Charles Farris make any denial of those statements? A. He said: 'I am satisfied, Father Boury. We know it, how we do.' Q. Was anythhing else said by either of them on that occasion? A. After that he said he was going to open a store in Santa Barbara. I said: 'How you can open a store? You have no goods.' He said, 'Wait and you will see,' and he goes and walks in the room, and he said, 'In 60 days you will see my pocket full of money.' I said, 'How is that?' He said: 'I will have that stuff; it isn't more than $200, you can see before your eye.' I said, 'Yes, I see that.' He said, 'We have about $200,' and he says: 'You will see about five or ten thousand coming into our pocket. I will put that in the store, and do the same thing, and the charcoal, and do the same fire I been doing in Salt Lake.'"

This testimony was admitted without objection, and it established clearly a premeditated design on the part of the defendants to commit a crime involving acts such as were charged against them. The statements made by appellant to witness Boury were not confessions in any sense; they were revelant as showing motive and intent and, taken in connection with other circumstances proved in the case, furnished logical evidence of guilt. The testimony of the witness Boury as to the statement made by Kady of the plan to get money by burning insured property was corroborated by the housekeeper employed by the priest, who was present and heard the statements made. There was evidence given by other witnesses as to the location of burned spots in the room, from which we must assume the jury might have inferred that the fire was of incendiary origin. Some of this testimony was illustrated by gestures and other explanatory means to the jury, but as to the effect produced by such means of illustration we cannot determine from the transcript. In such a case we may assume that the explanation of the witnesses was illuminating to the jury on the important question being considered, even though the pages of the record do not so disclose it. The tenant who gave the alarm of fire upon discovering the smoke was satisfied that the fire had been purposely kindled among the merchandise. He was allowed to express his opinion in this regard without objection, but he also gave reasons for the opinion. Perhaps the strongest expressions of the witness, indicating his observation and opinion respecting the incendiary nature of the fire, were brought out by the cross-examination of defendant's counsel. A portion of the testimony so given will show its nature:

"Q. You were sure it had been set on fire, before you talked with the fire chief? A. Yes, absolutely. I did not talk with the chief, as I remember, at all. Q. How long had you been in that room before you concluded it was so, absolutely? A. About five minutes. Q. And you are sure now it was set on fire? A. Yes. Q. What led you to believe it was set on fire? A. Simply because this window was burned there, and not a slight indication of fire down here. This was the same; the window sill was burned, the curtains burning, the glass broken; no evidence of fire here; not the slightest. The same here. No negligence of fire on this floor. The side of the walls, the curtains, were burned, and the window broken."

[2] It was shown in evidence that defendant Farris made proof of loss under the policies which had been issued to him, and attached to the documents was an inventory of the property alleged to have been destroyed. This proof of loss was offered and received in evidence. The only objection made was that the evidence tended to show the commission of a separate offense, to wit, the offense of burning a building with intent to defraud an insurer. This objection was untenable. The fact that merchandise stored in the room where the fire occurred had been previously insured was revelant for the purpose of showing motive on the part of the defendants. "On a charge of arson, it is relevant to show that the accused insured the building, and that he was insolvent; or that the securing of the insurance money was his motive for burning certain buildings." Wharton's Criminal Evidence, vol. 2 (10th Ed.) § 880. If the tendency of such evidence was to prove a different and distinct offense from that charged, it would not be error to admit it. "The test of the admissibility of evidence of other offenses than the one charged, is the connection between the offenses in the mind of the criminal. When such a connection is shown, evidence of the others is admissible for the purpose of establishing identity in developing the res gestæ, or in making out the guilt of the defendant by a chain of circumstances connected with the crime for which he is on trial." People v. Cunningham, 66 Cal. 668, 6 Pac. 700. The cross-examination of appellant, respecting the taking of an inventory of the property prior to the time of the fire, furnishes no ground for the claim of error which counsel make, for that examination was not met by any objection except that appellant's counsel did make objection to the language used by the district attorney in framing certain questions. As to that matter we find no reason to conclude that the district attorney's language was such as to prejudice the case for the defendant.

[3, 4] One of the grounds upon which the motion for a new trial was based was that of misconduct of the jury, consisting, first, in an alleged experiment made by one of the jurors while the trial was in progress to determine how long it would take a box, similar to those in which merchandise of the defendants had been placed, to burn after being ignited. The sole evidence offered in support of this ground was an affidavit of the attorney for the appellant. While this affidavit contained the preliminary phrase that the affiant offered the same "based upon his personal knowledge of the facts therein contained," at the hearing of the motion it was admitted by said counsel that he had no actual knowledge of the facts, but that the latter were intended to be stated upon information and belief from statements made by the jurors. The district attorney very properly objected to a consideration of the affidavit on the ground that the law required direct proof of the facts sought to be presented, and that any statement made solely upon information and belief would not be proper evidence. The position of the prosecutor on that question is fully sustained by the decisions. People v. Findley, 132 Cal. 301, 64 Pac. 472; Gay v. Torrance, 145 Cal. 144, 78 Pac. 540. Defendant asked leave to call the jurors to the witness stand to require them to testify as to the alleged misconduct, to which procedure the court properly sustained objection. Nothing in our law is more firmly established than that the verdict of the jury may not be impeached by the evidence of the jurors themselves, with the single exception that it may be shown by the jurors that the verdict was determined by chance. The early cases are reviewed and the rule restated in People v. Azoff, 105 Cal. 632, 39 Pac. 59, to which citation may be added People v. Findley, supra, and the case of People v. Chin Non, 146 Cal. 561, 80 Pac. 681.

A careful examination of the record demonstrates that it is barren of any substantial error which would justify a reversal of the order and judgment.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. THAL. (Cr. 1108.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 20, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 19, 1923.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1134(3)—Error in permitting filing of amended information not considered as respects count on which appellant was acquitted.

Error, if any, in permitting the filing of an amended information will not be considered so far as it relates to a count on which appellant was acquitted.

2. Criminal law 🔑1031(4)—Objection that defendant was not arraigned on amended information to which he filed no demurrer or other objection not considered on appeal.

An objection made on motion in arrest of judgment that defendant was not arraigned and did not plead to a charge contained in an amended information will not be considered on appeal, where he filed no demurrer or other objection when the motion for leave to file such amendment was made, but announced himself as ready for trial, and only requested that both informations be read to the jury, which was done with his former plea of not guilty.

3. Criminal law 🔑1144(1)—Evidence at preliminary examination assumed to have shown commission of offense alleged in amended information on which appellant was convicted.

In the absence of the evidence at defendant's preliminary examination, the appellate court will assume, in support of a judgment of conviction on an amended information charging an offense embraced in that originally charged, that such evidence showed commission of the offense charged in the amended information.

4. Indictment and information 🔑161(5)—Amended information for passing fictitious check held proper in action for obtaining property under false pretenses by such method.

In a prosecution for obtaining property under false pretenses by passing a fictitious check, the court did not abuse its discretion under Pen. Code, § 1008, in permitting the filing of an amended information charging violation of section 476 by passing a fictitious check with intent to defraud, though such crime was not expressly charged in the first information.

5. Criminal law 🔑970(7), 1032(5)—Mere uncertainties in information not available on motion in arrest or on appeal, in absence of demurrer.

Mere uncertainties in the information are not available on motion in arrest of judgment or on appeal in the absence of a demurrer.

6. False pretenses 🔑49(4)—Evidence held sufficient to show that purported drawer of check on bank's branch had no account in bank or branch.

Testimony of the paying teller of a bank's branch on which an alleged fictitious check charged to have been passed with intent to defraud in violation of Pen. Code, § 476, was drawn, that the purported drawer had no account with the bank when the check was dated, passed, and presented at the branch, and that he turned down the check because the branch had no account with the bank, held sufficient evidence that such drawer had no account with either the bank or the branch.

7. False pretenses 🔑49(1)—Evidence held sufficient to show that purported drawer of check was fictitious person.

Testimony that the purported drawer of an alleged fictitious check, charged to have been passed in violation of Pen. Code, § 476, had no account with the bank on which it was drawn, held prima facie evidence of the nonexistence of such drawer, and sufficient, with defendant's statement to the arresting officer that he knew no such person and had never seen the check or the person to whom he delivered it, to show that such drawer was a fictitious person.

8. Criminal law 🔑829(18)—Refusal of instruction on reasonable doubt held not error in view of instruction given.

In a prosecution for passing a fictitious check with intent to defraud, where the jury were instructed that the burden was on the prosecution to prove every element of the offense charged beyond a reasonable doubt, refusal to instruct them to acquit unless the prosecution proved certain allegations beyond all reasonable doubt was not error.

9. False pretenses ⚷49(1)—Evidence that purported signer of check had no account with bank on which drawn prima facie evidence of fictitious character.

Evidence that no such person as the purported signer of a check had any account with the bank, banker, or depository on which it was drawn, at the time of making, drawing or uttering it, is prima facie evidence of the fictitious character thereof.

10. Criminal law ⚷823(2)—Instruction held not erroneous as charging as to effect of particular witness' testimony in view of other instructions.

An instruction that evidence that no such person as the purported signer of a check had any account with the bank, banker, or depositor on which it was drawn, at the time of making, drawing, or uttering it, is prima facie evidence of the fictitious character thereof, held not erroneous as instructing the jury that the testimony of a bank's paying teller was prima facie evidence of the fictitious character of a check drawn on such bank, especially where the court elsewhere instructed the jury that they were the exclusive judges of the witnesses' credibility and the weight of the testimony.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Justin Thal was convicted of passing a fictitious check, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Sullivan and Jas. F. Brennan, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

RICHARDS, J. The defendant herein was convicted of the crime of violating the provisions of section 476 of the Penal Code, by making, passing, uttering, and publishing a fictitious check, with intent to defraud one Michel Marclescu. The information upon the second count of which he was tried and convicted was an amended information in two counts which had been presented by the district attorney and filed by leave of court on the day upon which the defendant's case was called for trial and prior to the impaneling of the jury in the cause. The charge in the original information against the defendant was that of obtaining property under false pretenses. It was in a single count, but set forth in detail the transaction out of which the charge arose, which was alleged to consist in obtaining from one Michel Marclescu the possession of said property, to wit, wood alcohol, by the false and fraudulent representation that he, the defendant, had a deposit in the Bank of Italy in excess of $1,000 available for withdrawal by check, and by then and there drawing and presenting to said Michel Marclescu his check for the sum of $1,000, representing the same to be good and valid and receiving therefor said property, the said Marclescu accepting said check therefor believing said false representations to be true, whereas in truth and fact said representations were utterly false and untrue. To this information the defendant pleaded not guilty, and the cause was set for trial. The district attorney on the morning of the trial moved the court for leave to file the amended information "to meet the proof which was introduced in the lower court." The first count in said amended information charged the defendant with obtaining money under false pretenses. It varied from the original information in the respect that it stated that the property which the defendant obtained from said Marclescu by false pretenses was glycerine. It also varied in the statement of the false representations in respect to the check offered and received for such property, the amended information stating that it was the check of one John R. O'Connor drawn upon the Market Street Branch of the Bank of Italy, in which the defendant falsely represented said O'Connor as having an account exceeding the amount of said check, whereas he was a nonexistent person having no account at said bank, which the defendant well knew. The second count in said amended information charged the defendant with the uttering and passing of said fictitious check in violation of section 476 of the Penal Code. The defendant objected to the introduction of the second count of said amended information as prejudicial to the rights of the defendant, but consented to the amendment of the original information as to the first count. The motion for leave to file the amended information was granted. The defendant presented no demurrer or other objection at that time, but announced himself as ready for trial and only requested that both informations be read in full to the jury, which was done by the clerk, together with the defendant's former plea of not guilty. The trial then proceeded, and at its close the court, at the request of the district attorney, instructed the jury to return a verdict of not guilty upon the first count of said amended information upon the ground of the failure of proof. The defendant was convicted upon the charge embraced in the second count in said amended information. After his conviction he made a motion for a new trial upon all the statutory grounds. He also made a motion in arrest of judgment, upon the ground that he had not been arraigned, nor did he plead to the amended information or either count thereof, and upon the further ground that the amended information contained a separate and specific offense from the offense attempted to be alleged in the original information, and also in the first count of the amended information, and on the further ground that the amended information was not an amendment of the original information for the reason that it set forth an entirely separate and distinct offense than that contained in the original information. Both of these motions were denied by the trial court, and the defendant was thereupon sentenced to be punished by imprisonment in the state's prison, whereupon he took and now prosecutes this appeal.

[1, 2] The first and main contention which the appellant makes upon this appeal is that it was error of the trial court in permitting the filing of the amended information. So far as this objection relates to the first count of said amended information, it has ceased to be vital, since as to that count the defendant has been acquitted under the instruction of the court and at the request of the prosecution. The contention of the appellant must therefore be confined to the second count in said amended information. By this count the defendant was for the first time charged with a violation of the provisions of section 476 of the Penal Code. His objection made upon motion in arrest of judgment that he was not arraigned and did not plead to this charge is not insisted upon upon this appeal, but, had it been so, it would have been sufficiently answered, we think, by the decision of this court in the case of People v. Tomsky, 20 Cal. App. 672, 130 Pac. 184.

[3, 4] The contention of the appellant now relied upon is that, since by the original information the only offense with which he was charged was that of obtaining property under false pretenses, said second count in the information charging another and different offense cannot be held to be an amendment of the original information within the meaning of section 1008 of the Penal Code, permitting the amendment of informations. It is true, as claimed by the appellant, in the original information the offense expressly charged against said defendant was that of obtaining property under false pretenses; but when we look to that information we find that, in pleading the gravamen of said offense with the particularity required in such cases, the defendant was alleged to have also, and as the particular false and fraudulent pretenses by which he obtained said property, committed the further crime of uttering and passing a fictitious check. These two crimes are thus made to appear by said information as a part of the same transaction, out of which the charge of obtaining property under false pretenses arose. This being so, we are of the opinion that such matter in the second count of the amended information was proper matter for the amendment of the original information, even though it charged the defendant with the commission of another crime not expressly stated in the charging part of the first information. Section 1008 of the Penal Code, providing for the amendment of informations after plea, permits by implication at least such amendments to be made, charging such offenses as are shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination to have been committed. We have not the evidence taken at the preliminary examination before us on this appeal, and hence in support of this judgment we must assume that the evidence there taken was such as to show the offense to have been committed as charged in the second count of this amended information. The motion to amend was in fact made by the district attorney upon that express ground. The fact that another or additional offense was thus charged is not of itself sufficient to justify us in holding that the addition of this charge was not the proper subject of the amendment or that the trial court abused its discretion in permitting it to be made. We are cited to no authority which would sustain such a conclusion. On the other hand, we are referred to the case of People v. Chober, 29 Cal. App. 627, 157 Pac. 533, which holds that under section 1008 of the Penal Code it is within the discretion of the trial court to permit a change in the charge against the defendant where the new or additional crime charged was included within the original offense as stated in the first information. That would seem to be precisely the present case. According to the original information, the defendant, in committing the crime of obtaining property by false pretenses, did so through the commission of the further crime of uttering and passing a fictitious check. Upon the authority of the case above cited, we therefore hold that the appellant's objection to the order of the trial court permitting the filing of the amended information in this case is not well taken.

[5] The next contention of the appellant is that the second count in said amended information upon which he was convicted was fatally defective in that it failed to state a public offense. We shall not follow out in detail the argument upon which the appellant attempts to support this contention, since we are satisfied from the reading of this count in the amended information that, at most, the objections which the appellant aims at said count amount to mere uncertainties therein which must have been taken advantage of by demurrer, and which cannot be availed of either upon motion in arrest of judgment or upon appeal, in the absence of such demurrer. People v. Welton (Cal. Sup.) 211 Pac. 802.

[6] The next contention of the appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the defendant's conviction under said second count of the said amended information. This contention is chiefly founded upon appellant's claim that the evidence adduced on the part of the prosecution failed to show that John R. O'Connor, the purported signer of the check which the appellant undertook to pass as genuine, did not have an account in the "Market Street Branch of the Bank of Italy."

The witness Radovich, an employee of the Bank of Italy and paying teller of the Market Street Branch of the Bank of Italy at the time, testified that John R. O'Connor had at the time said check was dated passed and presented no account with the Bank of Italy. The appellant contends that there is no sufficient evidence that the Bank of Italy and the "Market Street Branch" of the Bank of Italy are the same institution. There is no merit in this contention. The name of the latter institution itself indicates that it is a part of the former, of which it is a "branch." The evidence of the witness Radovich shows that he was at one and the same time the employee of one and paying teller of the other. These facts are sufficient in our opinion to show such interconnection between the two institutions as to justify the conclusion that, if John R. O'Connor had no account with the Bank of Italy, he had no account with the Market Street Branch of the Bank of Italy. In addition to this, however, the testimony of the witness Radovich shows that in his capacity of paying teller of the Market Street Branch of the Bank of Italy he turned down the check of John R. O'Connor at said branch bank for the reason that said branch had no account with the Bank of Italy. The inference is irresistible that he had no account at either place.

[7] The appellant's next contention is that there is no sufficient evidence that John R. O'Connor was or is a fictitious person. It has, however, been uniformly held to be prima facie evidence of the nonexistence of the drawer of a check claimed to be fictitious that no such person has an account with the bank upon which the check is drawn. People v. Eppinger, 105 Cal. 36, 38 Pac. 538; People v. Bernard, 21 Cal App. 56, 130 Pac. 1063; People v. Walker, 15 Cal. App. 401, 114 Pac. 1009. In the instant case this prima facie showing was supplemented by the statement of defendant himself, testified to by the arresting officer, that he never knew such a person as John R. O'Connor and had never seen either the check or the person to whom he was charged with having delivered it.

[8] The final contentions of the appellant relate to alleged errors of the trial court in instructions to the jury. It is first contended that the trial court erred in omitting from an instruction asked by the defendant the italicized portion thereof:

> "I instruct you that, before you can find the defendant guilty, it is incumbent upon the prosecution to prove three essential things: First, that the check was fictitious; second, that there was no such person in existence at the time as John R. O'Connor; and, third, that the defendant knew that the check was fictitious, and that there was no such person as John R. O'Connor in existence at the time. Unless the prosecution proves these three allegations beyond all reasonable doubt, it will be your duty to find the defendant not guilty."

The answer to this contention is that the court had already instructed the jury that—

> "The burden is upon the prosecution to prove every element of the offense charged beyond a reasonable doubt."

It was not necessary to repeat this instruction in connection with each or any of the instructions requested by the defendant.

[9, 10] The next instruction which the defendant assigns as error is the following:

> "You are instructed that, in a case where a check is drawn upon some bank, banker, or depository for money, purporting to be signed by an individual, evidence that no such person as the one whose name purports to be signed to such check had any account with said bank, banker, or depository for the payment of money at the time of making, drawing, or uttering of such check is prima facie evidence of the fictitious character of the check."

The alleged vice in this instruction, according to the appellant's claim, is that it singles out the testimony of Radovich and practically instructs the jury that the testimony must be taken by him to have established prima facie the fictitious character of the check in question. We do not find this instruction to be subject to the vice which the appellant attributes to it. It is an instruction drawn in the abstract and correctly states the law. The court elsewhere instructed the jury that they were the exclusive judges of the evidence, of the credibility of the witnesses, and of the weight of the testimony. The instruction assailed was therefore not only correct in law, but proper in form. People v. Kehoe, 123 Cal. 224, 55 Pac. 911, 69 Am. St. Rep. 52.

No other points being urged as error, the judgment is affirmed.

SVOBODA v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR ALAMEDA COUNTY et al.

(S. F. 10396.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 5, 1923. Rehearing Denied May 5, 1923.)

1. Reformatories 🔑11—Parent financially able may be required to reimburse county for maintenance of his child committed to industrial school, though deprived of his custody; "other persons liable for support."

Under Juvenile Court Law, § 11, as amended by St. 1921, p. 803, § 3, dealing with a ward of the juvenile court, and requiring the parent, parents, guardian, "or other person liable for support" to reimburse the county for support and maintenance of a ward after commitment to the Preston School of Industry, the juvenile court may direct a parent, financially able, to reimburse the county for expense of maintenance, though such parent was deprived of his custody in divorce proceedings, and Civ. Code, § 196, provides for support of a child by the parent entitled to his custody, the words quoted from the statute of 1921 not relating back to the preceding words, but relating to such persons as stand in loco parentis to the ward, as trustees of a fund for the support of the minor or persons who may have adopted the child.

2. Divorce 🔑324—Superior court held to have general jurisdiction to require divorced husband to reimburse county for maintenance of child committed to industrial school, though previous divorce decree awarded custody of child to wife.

The superior court, sitting as a juvenile court, has general jurisdiction in proceedings requiring a parent to reimburse the county for maintenance expense of his minor child, committed to the Preston School of Industry, though a previous divorce decree awarded the custody of such child to the other parent.

In Bank.

Application for writ of review by Frank Svoboda to annul an order of the Superior Court in and for the County of Alameda and E. C. Robinson, Judge thereof, ordering payment by a parent for support of a minor confined in Preston School for Industry. Order affirmed.

George D. Collins, Jr., of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Ezra W. Decoto, Dist. Atty., Earle Warren, Deputy Dist. Atty., and Frank Mitchell, Jr., all of Oakland, for respondents.

WASTE, J. Petitioner seeks by this proceeding in certiorari to annul an order of the superior court in and for the county of Alameda, sitting as a juvenile court, requiring him to pay the sum of $20 per month as reimbursement to the county for the expense of support and maintenance of his minor child. He admits that "the juvenile court in the proper exercise of its jurisdiction adjudged the minor child a ward of the court and committed him to the Preston School of Industry, where he is now detained," but challenges the authority of the court to direct him to reimburse the county for the maintenance of the ward while at the school.

Petitioner and his wife were divorced. The community property was divided between them, and the custody of the minor child was awarded to the mother. The decree, which has not since been modified, did not in terms impose any obligation on the father to support the child. Subsequently petitioner filed a complaint in the respondent court, wherein he alleged that the minor was an incorrigible youth, within the meaning of the law, and praying he be adjudged a ward of the juvenile court. Thereafter such proceedings were had that the commitment issued, and the order directing the father to reimburse the county was made.

[1] Respondents' first answer to the petition is that an appeal lies from the order, and therefore certiorari will not lie. Whether or not this is so need not be determined, for the contention of the petitioner is obviously based on a misconception of law, and is untenable. He contends that, under the statute, the power and jurisdiction of the juvenile court to make an order requiring the father of a delinquent minor to contribute to his support while in the Preston School of Industry under commitment is limited to cases where the father is made liable by law for the minor's support, and that where the care and custody of the minor have been previously awarded the mother by a decree of divorce, remaining in full force and effect up to and at the time the juvenile court adjudged the minor a ward of the court, the law makes the mother, and not the father, the parent liable for such support and maintenance.

This contention is predicated on section 196 of the Civil Code, which provides that "the parent entitled to the custody of a child must give him support and education suitable to his circumstances"; emphasis being laid on the words "entitled to the custody of a child." There are cases holding that where there has been a decree of divorce, and such decree vests the custody of the minor children in the mother, the father is under no obligation to provide for such children any support or education beyond that which may be directed by the court which has granted the divorce, either in its decree or by subsequent modification, and that the obligation of the father so deprived of the custody of the child, under a divorce decree which made no provision for its support, is one to be enforced by the court which granted the divorce, and in the divorce action itself. It was so held in a separate action by a child against his father to compel him to furnish support and education. Lewis v. Lewis, 174 Cal. 336, 163 Pac. 42. It was also held that, under section 196, supra, and section 204 of the Civil Code, which declares that the authority of the parent ceases "upon the appointment, by a court, of a guardian of the person of a child," the father could not be proceeded against in a criminal action where the mother had been awarded the custody of minor children in a divorce proceeding, and had also been appointed their guardian. Matter of McMullin, 164 Cal. 504, 129 Pac. 773. This court has since held, however, "that, as between parent and child, the father is" not "absolved from his legal duty to provide support to his minor child who has no other source of maintenance, because, on account of his own fault, he has been deprived of the custody of such child. Both a legal and moral obligation rest upon a father to support his minor children. And while, as between himself and third parties, that obligation may be shifted in proceedings of divorce or guardianship, and he may by misconduct forfeit his right to the custody of his child, it may be doubted if by such proceedings, to which he is not a party, a minor can be deprived of his natural right to turn to his father for maintenance, if the substituted source of supply fails." Pac. Gold Dredging Co., v. I. A. C., 184 Cal. 462, 466, 194 Pac. 1, 3 (13 A. L. R. 725).

The rule relied upon by petitioner has no application to the present case. He admits that the juvenile court law, which was enacted long after the passage of section 196 of the Civil Code, in dealing with the subject of the commitment and support of minors sent to the Preston School of Industry, supersedes all other laws on the subject. Section 11 of that act (Stats. 1921, pp. 798, 803) provides that:

> "Any order providing for the care and custody of a ward of the juvenile court in such case where it is necessary that provision be made for the expense of support and maintenance of said ward, must direct that the whole expense of such support and maintenance of said ward, up to the amount of twenty dollars per month, shall be paid from the county treasury of the county, and in such case shall state the amount to be so paid from the county treasury of the county, the amount so ordered to be paid not to exceed, in the case of any one ward, the sum of twenty dollars in any one month.
> "At the time of making any order providing for the suport and maintenance of a ward of the juvenile court, said court shall inquire into the earnings, property or estate of said ward, and into the ability of the parent, parents, guardian of said ward, or other person liable for the support and maintenance of said ward, to pay for the expense of support and maintenance of said ward. * * *
> "Said court shall further order, and direct that the county for its expense of support and maintenance of any such ward shall be reimbursed, either in whole or in part, from the earnings, property or estate of said ward, or by the parent, parents, guardian of said ward, or other person liable for the support of said ward, if it is found that there are earnings, property or estate of said ward sufficient therefor, or that said parent, parents, guardian of said ward, or other person liable for the support of said ward, is able to pay, either in whole or in part, for such expense of support and maintenance of said ward, and for the purpose of said reimbursement may order and direct payments to be made to the probation officer from the earnings, property or estate of said ward, or by the parent, parents, guardian of said ward, or other person liable for the support of said ward, the amount of which payments shall be determined by said court and which said payments shall be paid by said probation officer in turn to the county treasurer of said county on account of said reimbursement."

There is no language in the section which expressly, or by implication, limits the power of the court to direct the parent "liable for the support and, maintenance of said ward," or who is "entitled to the custody of the child," to pay for the expense of such support and maintenance at the school. If the phrase "liable for the support and maintenance of said ward" related back to and modified the word "parent," or "parents," it might be argued that until the duty of the father to maintain his child, which has been taken from his custody by divorce proceedings, has been established in a proper proceeding in the divorce action, the juvenile court is without power to make an order requiring the father to support such minor. We have examined the statutes relating to the Preston School of Industry, including and since its establishment, and the juvenile court law first adopted and as amended, with a view of ascertaining the proper construction to be given to that portion of section 11 providing who may be required to reimburse the county for the expense of support and maintenance of a ward after commitment. This examination confirms the view, borne out by the plain reading of the present statute, supra, that the court may direct the parent, or parents, of such ward, financially able to do so, to reimburse the county, regardless of whether or not he, she or they may have been deprived of the custody of the child in any previous divorce proceeding. The words in the section, "or other person liable for the support and maintenance of said ward," do not modify or relate back to the words "parent, parents, guardian of such ward." They relate to a class of persons, such as those who stand in loco parentis to the ward, as trustees of a fund for the support of the minor, or persons who may have adopted the child. It follows, therefore, that the respondent did not act in excess of its jurisdiction in requiring the petitioner to reimburse the county of Alameda for the expense of the support and maintenance of his minor child at the Preston School of Industry.

[2] That respondent had general jurisdiction in the matter is well settled. In Dupes v. Superior Court, 176 Cal. 440, 168 Pac. 888, this court held that the fact that the superior court, in an action for divorce, had made an order providing for the custody of the minor children of the litigants did not deprive the juvenile court of jurisdiction to dispose of such children in any manner it might deem best for their welfare.

The order made by the respondent is affirmed.

NEWBERT v. McCARTHY et al.

(S. F. 10282.)

1. Work and labor 🔑7(1)—Relative receiving services of another not presumptively bound to pay reasonable value.

It is a general rule that a person receiving the services of another is presumptively bound to pay the reasonable value of same, but this rule is not controlling as between near relatives where the inference is not that the services were rendered in expectation of remuneration, but that they were spontaneous acts of courtesy and kindness.

2. Work and labor 🔑4(2)—Liability of recipient of services from another determined by intent of parties.

Whether one receiving the services of another is bound to pay the reasonable value for the same is determined by the intention of the parties in the particular case, and, if the services were reasonably intended to be gratuitous, they cannot be converted into a pecuniary demand.

3. Executors and administrators 🔑221(5)—Finding that services rendered sister since deceased were intended to be gratuitous held warranted.

In an action against executors to recover the reasonable value of services rendered to decedent, where plaintiff and decedent were sisters, evidence that decedent had frequently visited plaintiff in her home for periods of two or three weeks, during which time the services were rendered, and that during such periods plaintiff owed decedent a sum on a promissory note, which was allowed to outlaw, and was subsequently bequeathed to plaintiff, together with a cash legacy of $500, held, that a finding that the services rendered were intended to be gratuitous was warranted.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by Margaret Newbert against George W. McCarthy and Frank R. Enright, executors under the last will and testament of Elizabeth Enright, deceased. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Edward J. Lynch, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John T. Thornton, of San Francisco, and D. M. Burnett, of San Jose, for respondents.

LENNON, J. [1] In this action the plaintiff sued to recover a judgment against the estate of her deceased sister in the sum of $750 as compensation for personal services alleged to have been rendered by the plaintiff to the deceased during her lifetime. The defendants, the executors of the estate of the deceased sister, had judgment in the court below. In support of plaintiff's appeal from that judgment it is contended that, inasmuch as the rendition of the services in suit was an admitted fact in the case, the judgment should have gone for the plaintiff because of the general rule that a person receiving the services of another is presumptively bound to pay the reasonable value of the same. Ordinarily this is the rule. Moulin v. Columbet, 22 Cal. 509; Crane v. Derrick, 157 Cal. 667, 109 Pac. 31; Estate of Rohrer, 160 Cal. 574, 117 Pac. 672, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 479. This presumption, applicable as it may be to transactions between persons unrelated to one another, is not pertinent to nor can it prevail over the facts of the instant case.

In the instant case the plaintiff and decedent were sisters, and all of the services in suit were rendered by the plaintiff while the decedent was visiting her at her home in San Francisco. In such a situation the natural inference is not that the services were rendered in expectation of remuneration, but, on the contrary, that they were spontaneous acts of courtesy and kindness, prompted by the natural affection of one sister for another. This being so, the presumption ordinarily prevailing that the services were to be paid for cannot be invoked and applied in favor of the plaintiff's case.

[2] The question in all cases of this character is one of intention. If at the time the services were originally rendered they were intended to be gratuitous, prompted by friendship, kindness, and the relation existing between the parties, and were tendered without any expectation of remuneration, they cannot later be converted into a pecuniary demand. Moulin v. Columbet, 22 Cal. 509, 511.

As was said in Murdock v. Murdock, 7 Cal. 511:

> "All the circumstances of the case must be considered, to ascertain what were the expectations of both of the parties existing while the relation continued." It is "incumbent upon the plaintiff 'to show that at the time, it was expected by both parties that he should receive such compensation, or that the circumstances under which the services were performed, were such that such expectation was reasonable and natural.'"

To authorize compensation, therefore, for services rendered by one relative to another, it is necessary that the circumstances be such as to reasonably warrant the inference that it was the expectation of both of the parties that compensation should be made by the recipient of the services. Crane v. Derrick, supra; Gjurick v. Fieg, 164 Cal. 429, 129 Pac. 464, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 111; Ruble v. Richardson (Cal. Sup.) 204 Pac. 572.

[3] In the instant case the trial court found, in the light of all the circumstances, that it was not the expectation of the parties at the time the services in suit were rendered that they should be compensated, but to the contrary found that said services were rendered "voluntarily and gratuitously and of plaintiff's own motion, and were intended to be gratuitous." This was, we think, the natural implication from all of the facts and circumstances arising from the situation of the parties at the time the services were rendered.

In the case of Smith v. Riedele (Cal. App.) 213 Pac. 281, the implication that the services of one friend living in the home of another were intended to be gratuitous was sustained. This applies, of course, with even greater force to cases of blood relationship. Murdock v. Murdock, supra; Friermuth v. Friermuth, 46 Cal. 42; Gjurick v. Fieg, supra. In such cases the relationship existing between the parties, as parent and child, stepparent and stepchild, brother and sister, and the like, is itself strong negative proof that no remuneration was intended. Hall v. Finch, 29 Wis. 278, 9 Am. Rep. 559; Price v. Price, Ex'r, 101 Ky., 28, 39 S. W. 429. Furthermore, there are the corroborating circumstances that, although the decedent had for many years visited her sister, the plaintiff, at frequent intervals, and had remained two and three weeks at a time, no payment was ever requested or required by plaintiff for her services during such period. And the services rendered were of the character which one would ordinarily expect one sister to render to another. During the whole of this period there was a promissory note due from the plaintiff to the decedent which was permitted by the decedent to outlaw, and was subsequently bequeathed to the plaintiff. And in addition to this debt which was forgiven her sister by decedent plaintiff was left by the terms of the other's will a legacy of $500 in cash.

True, there is in the record testimony of one witness, a daughter of the plaintiff, to the effect that deceased tendered a check for $750 to the plaintiff by way of a gift for the services rendered and sued for. The tender of the check, however, may be eliminated from consideration inasmuch as this testimony was evidently disbelieved by the trial court. The daughter, who testified as a witness for the plaintiff, admitted that she had personally filled out the check, and that there were three other checks signed in blank in the check book of the decedent. She also testified that at the same time she had, at the request of her aunt, the decedent, filled out a check for $100 to one George McCarthy. Evidence was introduced by defendants to show that the only check received by McCarthy from the decedent was one filled out for her by another niece, Annie Canelo. In these circumstances the trial court was justified in believing that the check above referred to was never tendered to the plaintiff by the deceased for the purpose stated by the witness or for any other purpose.

Upon the whole we are satisfied that the evidence supports the findings of the trial court, and that the findings in turn support the judgment.

Judgment is accordingly affirmed.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1047(3)—Trial 🔑91—Failure to strike answer suggested by question unobjected to held not harmful.

Where defendant was forewarned by a question that the answer would be a conclusion, and no objection was made thereto, the failure to strike the answer was not error, and, in view of the court's instruction to the witness to describe what was done and state what was said, which was in effect a withdrawal of both question and answer, the error was not harmful.

5. Trial 🔑395(6)—Findings held not too indefinite to support judgment.

Where findings that none of defendant's denials are true could be made definite by specific reference to the pleadings, and which denials were on material issues and were not misleading, they were sufficient to support the judgment.

6. Evidence 🔑269(2)—Subsequent declarations of grantor admissible to show intention at time deed was made.

Where a deed was delivered in escrow, to take effect at grantor's death, subsequent declarations and acts of grantor are admissible to show intention at the time the deed was made.

7. Appeal and error 🔑533(1), 717—Opinion of trial court not part of record, and may not be looked to.

The opinion of the trial court is not a part of the record, and cannot be considered on appeal, as indicating what operated on its mind in coming to a conclusion as to the ultimate facts of a case.

8. Appeal and error 🔑716—Findings of fact and conclusions of law constitute decision which is final.

The deliberations of the court are conclusively merged in the judgment, and the findings of fact and conclusions of law constitute the decision, which is the final, deliberate expression of the court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action of interpleader by Helena De Cou against H. G. Howell, as administrator of the estate of Elizabeth E. Sitton, deceased, and others, in which defendant H. G. Howell filed a cross-complaint against plaintiff, defendant Lois E. Lillie, and other defendants. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Howell appeals. Affirmed.

Manning & Thompson and O. M. Gipson, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Adair & Winder, of Riverside, for respondent.

De Cou, Sarau & Thompson, of Riverside, for plaintiff.

SEAWELL, J. Plaintiff, Helena De Cou, initiated this action in the superior court of Riverside county, primarily to compel conflicting claimants to interplead and litigate between themselves their several claims and rights to receive payments due and to become due from her under a contract for the purchase of a 9-acre tract of land of the value of about $4,000, situate in said Riverside county, which she had made with the record owner thereof, Elizabeth E. Sitton, since deceased. The parties claiming an interest in the subject-matter, all of whom are defendants, subsequently interpleaded.

The whole case depends upon a decision of the question whether or not the alleged delivery of a deed made and executed by Elizabeth E. Sitton to her niece, Lois E. Lillie, was a sufficient delivery as to have vested title in the latter.

A brief statement of the case becomes necessary to make clear the relations that the principal actors sustained to each other and the circumstances attending the execution and delivery of said deed.

On December 18, 1915, Mrs. Elizabeth E. Sitton visited the office of John P. Kuhns, a conveyancer and notary public, for the purpose of engaging him to prepare for her a deed conveying title to the property which forms the basis of this action, to her niece, Lois E. Lillie. After advising with Kuhns, she executed a grant, bargain, and sale deed in favor of said niece, and delivered it to Mr. Kuhns with instructions to hold it in his custody until her death, thereupon to be delivered to said niece.

On October 9, 1919, she entered into a contract with plaintiff, Helena De Cou, agreeing to convey to her at the price of $4,000, payable on terms, the same property she had previously conveyed to said Lois E. Lillie. In compliance with the terms of said contract, $50 was paid forthwith, and the further sum of $500 was paid a short time before December 1, 1919. The contract provided for the payment of the remainder, both principal and interest, at stated periods, the details of which are not here important. At the time of the execution of the agreement of purchase and sale, plaintiff, Helena De Cou, had no knowledge whatsoever of the execution or existence of the deed dated December 18, 1915, and delivered into the custody of Kuhns. On February 15, 1920, said Elizabeth E. Sitton died intestate, and thereafter her brother, H. G. Howell, was appointed administrator of her estate.

To settle the conflicting claims made by H. G. Howell, as administrator of said estate, that all future payments arising out of or accruing upon said contract of sale and purchase should be paid to him as such administrator, and the asserted counterclaim of Lois E. Lillie that all of said payments belonged to her as the grantee of said Elizabeth E. Sitton by deed dated December 18, 1915, and for the reason that plaintiff was ignorant of and uncertain as to the rights of said respective parties, she brought this action to have determined by a decree of court which one of said defendants was entitled to receive the payments due and to become due under said agreement of sale.

The trial court decreed that the deed was valid in all respects, and vested Lois E. Lillie with title, and that the only interest left thereafter in Elizabeth E. Sitton was a life estate.

[1] Appellant makes the claim here, as he did in the court below, that there was no delivery of the deed and that the transaction was but an attempted testamentary disposition of property, which did not divest Mrs. Sitton of title. In this particular it is urged that the court's findings are not supported by the evidence. Other objections of minor importance will be noticed latterly.

We have read the record attentively and cannot agree with appellant's claim that the evidence fails to support the findings. If the testimony of John D. Kuhns, the conveyancer who prepared the deed and assisted in its execution, was believed by the court, as it undoubtedly was, inasmuch as it was the only testimony offered in the case that bore immediately and directly on the questions of execution and delivery, and was undoubtedly indicative of the wish and intention of Mrs. Sitton, as shown by language and conduct during the moments of execution and delivery, his testimony alone would be amply sufficient to sustain the court's finding on this important issue.

Mr. Kuhns, whose business was that of a conveyancer, notary public, real estate and insurance agent, had known Mrs. Sitton for a period of 35 years and had transacted business for her at intervals during their long acquaintanceship. His credibility is not attacked, and his testimony seems to be free from criticism. In brief, he testified that Mrs. Sitton came to his office on December 18, 1915, without previous appointment, to advise with him about the legal method of conveying the property described in the deed to Mrs. Lillie. She said "she wanted to convey that property to Mrs. Lois E. Lillie and that she wanted me to hold that deed as custodian, and at her death instructed me to deliver it to Mrs. Lois E. Lillie." The witness further stated that Mrs. Sitton said nothing about having the right to repossess the deed because the witness had advised with her and told her what he understood the law to be in that respect. Mr. Kuhns further told her that to make a legal delivery she should leave the deed with him unconditionally, as the lawyers put it, "without any strings to it." After explaining to her that there must be an unconditional delivery of the deed, Mr. Kuhns prepared the deed, and Mrs. Sitton signed and acknowledged it and delivered it to the witness, and he placed it in his deposit box, which was kept at the Consolidated Bank at Elsinore, where it remained until after the death of Mrs. Sitton. It is very apparent from the questions propounded and the answers given as they appear from the record that Mrs. Sitton was fully informed as to the effect of a delivery such as she made, and that it was her purpose and desire to invest her niece with title and retain for herself a life estate. The deed was subsequently delivered by Kuhns to Mrs. Lillie. Neither Kuhns or Mrs. Sitton ever spoke about the deed thereafter. Mrs. Lillie was never informed by either Kuhns or her aunt that the latter had made a deed in her favor. A week after the death of Mrs. Sitton, Mrs. Lillie obtained the deed from Kuhns. She and her husband had been told by Mrs. Sitton some years prior to her death that should "anything happen" to her at any time she would find papers with Mr. Kuhns. She had often told her niece and said to others that everything she had was to go to her and her husband. It was because of the directions given to Mrs. Lillie by her aunt that she inquired of Kuhns if her aunt had left with him any papers or documents.

We find nothing in the testimony of Kuhns which would lead us to question the purpose of Mrs. Sitton. In fact, the execution and delivery of the deed was a very natural disposition of her property. Mrs. Lillie had lived with her aunt when a child for a number of years. The marriage ceremony with her husband was celebrated at the home of her aunt. After marriage and for 16 or 17 years immediately preceding the death of Mrs. Sitton she lived in a house of two rooms constructed at her cost, but which was built on the property of the niece and husband, and stood near to the door of their house. Mrs. Sitton, during this long period of time, took her meals with her niece and the latter's husband. There is no evidence that a disagreement ever occurred between them. Mutual love, respect, and a tender consideration for the comfort of each seemed to have been the rule of the household. F. C. Lillie was extremely kind to his wife's aunt; she reposed full confidence in his integrity and judgment and advised with him freely. In fact, Mrs. Sitton made him her attorney in fact, with full and absolute power to manage and dispose by sale of the property in question. It is true that later Mrs. Sitton made a contract with plaintiff by which she agreed to convey to her the same property described in said deed. Kuhns, who then held the Lillie deed in his deposit box, drew the contract. Lillie, the advisor of Mrs. Sitton, was present. He, of course, had no knowledge that a deed conveying the property to his wife had been previously made or he doubtless would have mentioned the fact to her that she was bargaining away property deeded to his wife. Kuhns says that the matter did not occur to him during the negotiations. It is also true that Mrs. Sitton had shortly before this transaction listed her property with a real estate agent for sale.

At the time of this transaction she was pressing her sixty-sixth anniversary. Whether the attempt to dispose of her property subsequent to the delivery of the deed of 1915 is to be accounted for on the theory of lapse of memory, or whether it was the result of importunity on the part of others, or whether she concluded that she needed the proceeds to meet her necessities, fancied or real, or, finally, whether she regretted the step she had taken in 1915 and sought to evade the effect of it, are questions which we are not required to determine. This much is true, however, that shortly after she had entered into the contract to dispose of her property to Helena De Cou she made reference to it by stating that she intended to assign the contract to her niece.

Witnesses were produced by the respective parties to prove statements made by Mrs. Sitton in affirmance and also in disaffirmance of her intent at the time she executed said deed. Also her conduct and treatment of the property subsequent to the execution of said deed is shown. This class of testimony is not persuasive as against the testimony of the character given by witness Kuhns. Mrs. Sitton's intention was clearly indicated at the very time of the transaction, and whatever she may have done or said thereafter does not carry sufficient strength to overturn her evident desire and purpose as expressed on December 18, 1915. That she paid the taxes on the property subsequent to the delivery of said deed, spoke of it as her property, improved it, and stated that her niece would come into everything she should leave upon her death cannot separately or collectively prevail against the statements and acts heretofore referred to. It would be but natural for a person under the circumstances related to make reference to property standing of record in his or her name in a sense of proprietorship. Expressions suggestive of testamentary intention, when disassociated from the central purpose, are also to be expected. Doubtless she treated and used her property as she would have had she been the absolute owner. The evidence in the case, independent of the witness Kuhns, is quite convincing that it was the wish and intention of Mrs. Sitton that her niece should come into the possession of all the property upon her death. In fact, she approved the plan of disposing of property by deed in a conversation had with Mrs. Anida Perry, a neighbor, in 1918, in which conversation the most satisfactory method of disposing of property in view of death was the particular subject of discussion. In this connection Mrs. Sitton said she wanted Mr. and Mrs. Lillie "to have" everything she possessed. Mrs. Zora Dell Teeters, a niece of Mrs. Sitton by marriage, testified that Mrs. Sitton, in the fall of 1919, in speaking to her of Mr. and Mrs. Lillie, said:

> "We certainly are repaid for all we do in this life. No son could ever be more devoted to a mother than Claire has been to me. * * * Lois has repaid me for everything I have done for her in love and affection. No mother could have children who would love her more than Lois and Claire."

To the same effect is the testimony of Mrs. Clare H. Lowman.

[2] Upon the bare record as it comes to us we are satisfied that the validity of the deed in question has been established by the evidence. The trial court, however, occupied a superior advantage over us in this respect and, even if the case appeared upon the record to be a close one from an evidentiary viewpoint, we would be constrained under the well-established rule to uphold its finding, if there was any substantial evidence tending to sustain it.

While it is a fact to be regarded that H. G. Howell, the administrator, was a brother of Mrs. Sitton, it is also true that he shared to some extent in his sister's bounty, as his unpaid promissory notes found among her papers show.

[3, 4] Complaint is made that the court failed to strike out a part of an answer made by witness Kuhns in reply to an interrogatory as to what he said to Mrs. Sitton by way of instructing her as to the method of conveying title by deed to be held in escrow. The answer was: "That in order to make a legal delivery she should leave it with me unconditionally, as lawyers put it, 'without any strings to it.'" Mr. Manning: "We move to strike that out, unless it is understood that he [witness] said the words, 'without any strings to it.'" No action was taken by the court. There are three answers to appellant's objection: First, it appears that the witness used the words "no strings to it" in the conversation with Mrs. Sitton which he was then relating; second, if counsel regarded the language as uncertain he had an opportunity to clear it up on cross-examination; third, the word "unconditionally" and the phrase " no strings to it" were used as synonymous expressions. No objection was made or could have been made to the use of the word "unconditionally." Surely, no harm was done by a failure to strike out a few words and permit the equivalent to remain. Objection is also made to a failure of the court to strike out an affirmative answer given by Kuhns to the question as to whether or not Mrs. Sitton "assented" to his instructions in a certain particular. Admitting that the answer was a conclusion, counsel was forewarned that it would be such by the question propounded. Both were in the following form: "Q. Did she assent to that? A. She did." Appellant should have objected to the question. Moreover, the testimony sets out in detail the conversation and conduct of the parties, and no possible injury was done defendant by the questions and answers complained of. The court immediately interceded and instructed the witness to describe what was done and state what was said. The court's suggestion was accepted by Mrs. Lillie's attorney, which in effect was a withdrawal of both question and answer.

[5] Objection is also made to finding No. 2, on the ground that it is indefinite and is not a specific finding upon a material issue. The first complaint is directed to the following language:

> "2. That none of the denials set forth by the defendant, H. G. Howell, in the first clause of paragraph 2 of his answer are true."
> "That none of the denials of said defendant set forth in the second clause of paragraph 2 of the said answer are true."

Paragraphs 1 and 2 of said answer contain admissions and denials respectively separately stated. The paragraphs are brief, and there is nothing to confuse or mislead by the reference made in the findings to the respective paragraphs of said answer. We experience no difficulty whatever in ascertaining what was intended and surely the matter contained in appellant's pleading should be as clear to him as it is to us. The case of Krug v. F. A. Lux Brewing Co., 129 Cal. 322, 61 Pac. 1125, presents a situation entirely different from the one before us. The answer in that case contained both denials and affirmative allegations, and a general finding that all of the allegations of the answer, so far as they are inconsistent with the allegations of the complaint, are true could not support a judgment for the plaintiff. In Johnson v. Squires, 53 Cal. 37, an indefinite, general finding was made, and the court properly held it to be too indefinite and insufficient to support a judgment. In the case at bar the findings are made definite by specific reference to the pleadings. They are upon material issues, and are not misleading.

[6] Appellant, Howell, administrator, caused to be inserted in the clerk's transcript a copy of the opinion of the trial court, giving its reasons for its conclusion. The purpose of incorporating the opinion is to show by its language that it disregarded material evidence offered by appellant to prove certain statements, declarations, and acts made and done by the grantor subsequent to the execution of the deed, which are claimed to be inconsistent with the contention that Mrs. Sitton divested or intended to divest herself of title. Appellant was permitted to offer evidence to show that Mrs. Sitton exercised acts of ownership over her property and referred to it as her ranch, received the income therefrom, paid taxes thereon, and entered into a contract to convey it. This testimony was not stricken out, and constitutes a part of the record. The court in its opinion misstated the law as shown by the following observations:

> "The law of this state seems to be settled by our Supreme Court decisions that only such evidence as will confirm the title in the grantee is proper for consideration; that declarations against such title so conveyed of the grantor are not admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing a different intent."

[7] The law is clearly settled that subsequent declarations and acts of the grantor are admissible to show the intention of the grantor at the time the deed was made. The issue in this class of cases is whether or not the grantor delivered his deed with the intent that it should convey title. In such cases the acts and declarations, in short, the conduct of a deceased grantor, may be given in evidence either in confirmance of delivery or in disproof thereof. Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 151 Pac. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703; Donahue v. Sweeney, 171 Cal. 388, 153 Pac. 708; Moore v. Trott, 162 Cal. 268, 122 Pac. 462; Tweedale v. Barnett, 172 Cal. 271, 156 Pac. 483; Rice v. Carey, 170 Cal. 748, 151 Pac. 135. The law is definitely settled in this state by a long line of decisions that the opinion of the trial court is not a part of the record and cannot be considered by an appellate court as indicating what operated upon its mind in coming to a conclusion as to the ultimate facts of the case. It has been directly held that the opinion, though printed in the transcript, is no part of the record on appeal, and cannot be considered by the court in any manner or for any purpose. Estate of De Laveaga, 165 Cal. 607, 133 Pac. 307; Goldner v. Spencer, 163 Cal. 317, 125 Pac. 347; Estate of Kendrick, 130 Cal. 360, 62 Pac. 605; Wilson v. Wilson, 64 Cal. 92, 27 Pac. 861; People v. Quong Sing, 20 Cal. App. 26, 127 Pac. 1052; Bouchard v. Abrahamsen, 4 Cal. App. 430, 88 Pac. 383; Spencer v. McCament, 7 Cal. App. 84, 93 Pac. 682.

[8] The deliberations of the court are conclusively merged in the judgment. The findings of fact and conclusions of law constitute the decision which is the final, deliberate expression of the court. To hold that oral or written opinions or expressions of judges of trial courts may be resorted to to overturn judgments would be opening the door to mischievous and vexatious practices. Neither a juror nor a judge is permitted to impeach his verdict or judgment.

We have, however, given full consideration to the evidence which appellant insists was disregarded or minimized in the opinion of the court, and we are satisfied, after giving such evidence full consideration, that the conclusion reached by the court below is sustained by the evidence.

The order and judgment appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DOMINGUEZ. (Cr. 928.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1169(5) — Erroneous admission of subsequently stricken confession of codefendant held harmless.

The erroneous admission of the confession of a codefendant held harmless, in view of the action of the court in granting a motion to strike the confession from the evidence and admonishing the jury to disregard it and to attach no weight thereto, it being assumed on the appeal that the jury obeyed the admonition.

2. Criminal law 🔑1037(2)—Prosecutor's misconduct not available on appeal, in absence of formal assignment of misconduct and request for admonitory instruction.

An appellate court will not consider a claim of misconduct on the part of a prosecutor, unless defendant's counsel at the time made a formal assignment of misconduct and requested an admonitory instruction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Frank Dominguez was convicted of robbery, and, from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Charles R. McCarty and Robert Black, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of the crime of robbery. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, urging, as grounds for the appeal, that the court's error in admitting in evidence the confession of a codefendant prejudiced his cause, and that he likewise was prejudiced by misconduct on the part of the deputy district attorney.

[1] The confession was first admitted and then stricken out. When granting the motion to strike, the court admonished the jury to disregard the confession and to attach no weight to it. We must assume that the jury obeyed the admonition, and that therefore appellant's cause was not prejudiced by the erroneous admission of the confession.

[2] On rebuttal, the deputy district attorney improperly propounded to a witness for the people certain questions which might well have met with a stern rebuke. But ap-pellant's counsel made no assignment of misconduct. It is well settled that an appellate court will not consider a claim of misconduct on the part of a prosecutor, unless defendant's counsel at the time make a formal assignment of misconduct and request an admonitory instruction. People v. Babcock, 160 Cal. 537, 545, 117 Pac. 549; People v. Ong Mon Foo, 182 Cal. 697, 705, 189 Pac. 690; People v. Steelik, 187 Cal. 361, 377, 203 Pac. 78.

Any prejudice which may have been caused by misconduct on the part of the prosecuting attorney during his argument to the jury was removed by the court's prompt admonition to disregard the improper remarks.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

ARTHUR R. BRIGGS ESTATE v. BARR.
(Civ. 4425.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 1, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 30, 1923.)

1. Waters and water courses ⚷158½(1)—Evidence held to sustain finding that defendant agreed to reserve plaintiff's rights in pumping plant.

Where plaintiff and defendant erected, on defendant's land, a pumping plant to be used for irrigation purposes, each party contributing one-half of the cost, and it was understood that, if defendant sold the land, plaintiff's rights were to be reserved, but such agreement was not put in writing, and defendant in fact did sell the land without reserving plaintiff's rights, in an action by plaintiff as for money had and received, evidence held to sustain a finding that defendant agreed to reserve plaintiff's rights.

2. Money received ⚷6(4)—Action held to lie to recover money spent in construction of pumping plant.

Where plaintiff and defendant installed a pumping plant for irrigation purposes on defendant's land, each paying one-half of the cost, defendant agreeing to protect plaintiff's right in case of sale of the land but failing to do so, in an action for money had and received to recover one-half of the cost paid by plaintiff, held, that plaintiff was entitled to recover in such form of action, the subject-matter of the action not being the right to use the ditch across the land formerly owned by defendant, but the amount advanced by plaintiff toward construction of the plant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by Arthur R. Briggs Estate against Thomas A. Barr. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Harris & Hayhurst, of Fresno, for appellant.

Lindsay & Conley, of Fresno, for respondent.

ST. SURE, J. Plaintiff and defendant owned adjoining 40-acre tracts of land. Under the terms of an executed oral agreement, they installed on defendant's land a pumping plant to be used, and which was used, in irrigating both tracts. Each party contributed $700, or one-half of the costs of the pump and its installation. A written agreement incorporating the terms of the executed oral agreement was contemplated, and it was understood that, should defendant sell his land, he would reserve to plaintiff a perpetual right in the plant and the use thereof. Defendant thereafter sold his land and failed to reserve to plaintiff any rights. When this was discovered by plaintiff it was called to the attention of defendant, and an effort was made by the latter to remedy his obvious neglect, but without success. Plaintiff thereafter demanded of defendant that it be restored to its rights in the plant, or compensation for such refusal. Receiving neither, and having, as the evidence shows, made reasonable effort to obtain amicable adjustment, and being finally compelled to install a new pump on its land, this suit resulted. The trial court gave plaintiff judgment for $700 and costs. Defendant appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] Defendant's first contention is that the trial court's finding to the effect that an agreement was had between the parties that defendant should, on a sale of his land, reserve to plaintiff its rights in the plant, is not supported by the evidence. We are of the opinion that the finding is based upon evidence from which such an inference was properly drawn. The undisputed facts show that defendant fully understood plaintiff's rights in the premises and appreciated that he had agreed with plaintiff that should he sell his land he was to protect the rights of plaintiff by making proper reservation in his deed of conveyance. Defendant admits this in his testimony, and his counsel state it as a fact in their opening brief.

[2] The next contention of defendant is that plaintiff, having entered upon defendant's land to install the plant, acquired an easement or irrevocable license to maintain the pump and conduct the water therefrom by means of a ditch to its land; and that, as plaintiff acquired either an easement or an irrevocable license in defendant's land, of which it has not been divested, it has mistaken its remedy and should be relegated to an action to quiet title or "some other proper and appropriate proceeding." The pleadings present a cause of action in the nature of a suit for money had and received. The prayer of the complaint asks for judgment against defendant for the sum of $700. The subject-matter of the action is not the right to use the ditch across land formerly owned by defendant, but is the sum of $700, one-half of the cost of purchase and installation of the pumping plant which was paid by plaintiff to defendant, and which defendant admits he received. Plaintiff's rights in and to the plant and its use were lost through the fault of defendant. Clearly the plaintiff is entitled to have his money returned. The findings are supported by the evidence. Such being our view, discussion of the further points made by defendant is unnecessary.

The judgment is affirmed.

CRANDALL et al. v. SHAY, Sheriff.

(Civ. 3932.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 21, 1923.)

Records 🔑9½, New, vol. 12A Key-No. Series—Lien on automobile held superior to interest acquired by purchaser to whom registration certificate was issued after attachment.

Under Motor Vehicle Act, § 8, as in force May 12, 1921, providing that title to an automobile shall not be deemed to have passed until transferee has received and signed a certificate of registration from the Motor Vehicle Department, an attachment created a lien superior to any interest acquired by one to whom the car was transferred prior to levy where compliance with registration law was not made until after levy.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Rex B. Goodcell, Judge.

Action by G. L. Crandall and another against W. A. Shay, as sheriff of the County of San Bernardino. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

G. C. De Garmo and H. B. Cornell, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lester G. King, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

JAMES, J. This action was brought by the plaintiffs to recover possession of an automobile, or its value, which latter was alleged to be the sum of $800. The judgment which was entered required the defendant to deliver to the plaintiffs the automobile described in the complaint, and awarded recovery of certain money as damages for detention, also costs. Defendant has appealed from the judgment.

On the 12th day of May, 1921, defendant as sheriff, under writ theretofore duly issued, attached the automobile as the property of Abraham Marks. Prior to April 27, 1921, the automobile had been registered with the state vehicle department in the name of the said Marks, who was represented in the certificate of registration as being the legal owner thereof. On said last-mentioned date Marks caused a transfer of registration to be made to show ownership in his wife, Tillie Marks, and the vehicle remained so registered up to and including the time when the attachment was levied by the defendant sheriff at the instance of creditors of Abraham Marks. On May 11, 1921, there was filed with the state automobile department a request by Tillie Marks that registration be transferred from her name to that of plaintiff Fortier. Agreeable to this last request for transfer, the state vehicle department issued to Fortier under date of May 13, 1921, a certificate of registration covering the automobile in question. We observe, then, that at the time the attachment was levied, the registration in the state vehicle department had not been changed from that which showed Tillie Marks, the wife of Abraham Marks, to be the owner of the automobile. It was the claim of the plaintiff Crandall, as evidenced by testimony offered and received, that on April 27th he agreed with Mrs. Marks to accept the automobile in lieu of the payment of $800 on the purchase price of a lot; that she added $100, making the initial payment the sum of $900; that he then arranged to sell the machine to plaintiff Fortier on a lease contract and delivered to the latter possession of the machine. It was the trial court's view, as evidenced by its findings that plaintiff Crandall acquired title to the machine by virtue of the sale to him by Tillie Marks and that Fortier was entitled to have his possession undisturbed by reason of his contract with Crandall.

Defendant sheriff cites provisions of the state vehicle act as supporting his contention that no title had passed from Tillie Marks up to the time the attachment was levied, and argues that, as Tillie Marks is not asserting claim of ownership in the machine, defendant had the right to hold it and sell whatever interest Abraham Marks might be shown to have in it. In investigating the question presented, we have not been aided by either oral argument or briefs from counsel for respondents. Section 8 of the Motor Vehicle Act, as it was in force at the time material to this action (Deering's Supplement, Codes and General Laws, 1917–1919, act 2331b), contained specific provision as to acts required to be done by vendor and vendee in the making of the transfer of registration of a motor vehicle upon sale thereof. The law provides that, after receiving a certificate with the proper indorsements made thereon, the motor vehicle department shall issue a new certificate of registration to the transferee. The following provision then occurs:

> "Until said transferee has received said certificate of registration and has written his name upon the face thereof in the blank space provided for said purpose by the department, delivery of said motor vehicle shall be deemed not to have been made and title thereto shall be deemed not to have passed and said intended transfer shall be deemed to be incomplete and not to be valid or effective for any purpose."

Giving effect to this provision according to the import of the language used, we must conclude that appellant is correct in his position, and that at the time the attachment was levied it created a lien which was superior to any interest acquired by plaintiffs in the vehicle. As to whether the transfer from Abraham Marks to his wife was bona fide and effectual to vest title in her, free from the claims of creditors, is not involved. It is to be remarked, however, that no evidence was offered tending in any wise to show that money with which the original purchase of the automobile was made by the Markses was other than community funds, and, if the latter, of course the property would be subject to claims of the husband's creditors.

Appellant's counsel has cited Boles v. Stiles (Cal. App.) 204 Pac. 848, which fully supports his argument. It should be noted, however, that a rehearing was granted by the Supreme Court in that case, and that in the decision on rehearing (204 Pac. 848) the effect of the motor vehicle statute on the question of when title passed where a sale was intended to be made was not the pivotal point upon which the decision was made to turn.

In our opinion, the trial judge was in error in holding that there had been a valid transfer of title to plaintiff Crandall prior to the time defendant sheriff made his levy under the writ of attachment.

The judgment is reversed.

CINCOTTA v. CATANIA. (Civ. 4384.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 19, 1923.)

1. Sales 🔑391(1) — Buyer cannot recover down payment without showing breach or mutual rescission.

Where buyer's complaint was in form a common count for money had and received to recover his part payment of the purchase price, he could not recover without showing breach by defendant of his contract to deliver the goods or a mutual rescission.

2. Sales 🔑404—Form of pleading by buyer to recover part payment stated.

Where buyer had paid a part of the purchase price, his complaint in action against the seller, in form a common count for money had and received, was proper, if his theory was that there was a mutual rescission of the contract of purchase or an abandonment thereof, but, if he claimed that the defendant had breached the contract and rendered himself liable in damages, plaintiff should have pleaded the facts or have adopted the common count as for quantum meruit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. E. Woolley, Judge.

Action by Santoro Cincotta against Santo Catania. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

George G. Graham, of Fresno, for appellant.

Ohannesian & Ohannesian, of Fresno, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff was awarded a judgment by the trial court in the sum of $1,015.45, and the defendant appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The plaintiff's complaint is in form a common count for money had and received. The defendant filed an answer in which he denied the material allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, and in addition thereto he presented a cross-complaint. In view of the conclusions which we have reached regarding the cause of action pleaded by the plaintiff, it will not be necessary for us to consider the questions presented regarding the cross-complaint.

The uncontradicted testimony shows that on or a short time before the 18th day of October, 1920, the defendant had sold, of the 1920 crop, to Mr. Guccione, a carload of ripe olives which was thereafter to be cured by salting, etc., and then delivered on board of the cars at Fresno. When the plaintiff heard of that sale, he went to the defendant and purchased a carload to be cured and shipped, and agreed to pay 12 cents a pound. A carload of olives amounts to 12 tons or thereabouts. The purchase so made by the plaintiff was oral, and no time for the delivery was specified. But the defendant did state that, after he had filled the order for Mr. Guccione, he would then fill the plaintiff's order. At the time of the purchase the plaintiff wrote out and delivered to the defendant his check in the sum of $1,000 as a part of the purchase price.

[1, 2] On the trial of the case the plaintiff did not introduce any evidence that he did at any time, except once, demand of the defendant a delivery of the olives. However, he did testify that on the 15th day of November, 1920, he asked the defendant to deliver to him some olives to place in a car which he was loading with grapes to ship to the East, and that the defendant did not comply with such request. The plaintiff did not introduce any evidence that 30 days or less time is reasonable time within which to procure, pack, and ship two carloads of olives, of the current season, in the neighborhood of Fresno during the months of October and November. Furthermore, the record does not even purport to show that the contract of purchase had been rescinded by mutual consent. In the absence of a mutual rescission, there can be no recovery by the vendee under such circumstances. Tomboy Gold & Copper Co. v. Marks, 185 Cal. 336, 339, 197 Pac. 94. We do not understand that as for a breach of contract it is even claimed that the plaintiff was entitled to recover under a common count as for money had and received. McConnell v. Corona City Water Co., 149 Cal. 60, 65, 85 Pac. 929, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1171. But, be that as it may, the evidence introduced was not sufficient to show a breach of contract on the part of the defendant. As the case must go back for a new trial, it is proper to suggest that the plaintiff, did, under the facts proved in this case, adopt an improper form of pleading. Barrere v. Somps, 113 Cal. 97, 45 Pac. 177, 572. He thereby caused a material variance between his pleading and his proof. If it is his theory that there was a mutual rescission of the contract of purchase, or an abandonment of the contract of purchase, the plaintiff may stand on a complaint as for money had and received. Bray v. Lowery, 163 Cal. 256, 261, 124 Pac. 1004; Tomboy Gold & Copper Co. v. Marks, supra. But, if he claims that the defendant has breached his contract of purchase and has rendered himself liable to damages, then the plaintiff should have pleaded the facts or have adopted the common count as for quantum meruit. McConnell v. Corona City Water Co., supra; Pabst Brewing Co. v. E. Clemens Horst Co., 229 Fed. 913, 916, 144 C. C. A. 195.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. RODRIGUEZ. (Cr. 652.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 23, 1923.)

1. Conspiracy 🔑47—Evidence held to sustain conviction for conspiracy to burglarize.

Evidence held to warrant a conviction for conspiracy to burglarize under Pen. Code, §§ 182, 184, as amended by St. 1919, p. 170.

2. Indictment and information 🔑110(10), 119—Allegation of conspiracy to burglarize in statutory language sufficient, and statement of attempt to pick lock held surplusage.

A conspiracy to commit burglary is sufficiently charged in the language of the statute, and the means employed for that purpose is not material and need not be alleged, and an allegation that defendant attempted to pick a lock was mere surplusage, under Pen. Code, §§ 182, 184, as amended by St. 1919, p. 170.

3. Conspiracy 🔑27—Attempt to open door an overt act.

An attempt to open a door of an office, whether by picking it or otherwise, is an overt act sufficient in a prosecution for conspiracy to burglarize under Pen. Code, §§ 182, 184, as amended by St. 1919, p. 170.

4. Conspiracy 🔑41—Act of one act of all.

The act of one conspirator to burglarize in attempting to enter an office was the act of all the conspirators, under Pen. Code, §§ 182, 184, as amended by St. 1919, p. 170.

5. Criminal law 🔑511(4)—Testimony of accomplice sufficiently corroborated.

Suggestion in a letter from one alleged conspirator to another that witness for state was the originator of the crime was sufficient corroboration of such witness' testimony as to the crime, assuming that he was an accomplice under Pen. Code, § 1111.

6. Criminal law 🔑37—No consent on theory of instigation and entrapment.

Where one who had been asked to join a conspiracy to burglarize a mine reported the matter to the mine owners, who did not object to his offer to take part in the burglary for the purpose of bringing the criminals to justice, held, that there was no tacit consent to the burglary or a wrongful entrapment of the defendant.

7. Criminal law 🔑519(9)—Confession held not improperly brought about.

A confession made because of the advice of one thought to be a coconspirator, but who only took part in the conspiracy for the purpose of bringing the criminals to justice, was admissible in evidence, where the advice was not given under circumstances that would lead the accused to believe that it had the sanction of any person in authority or having power to extend leniency in the matter of punishment.

8. Criminal law 🔑1169(12)—Admission of confession in evidence held not prejudicial.

It was not prejudicial error to admit a confession in evidence where the accused took the stand and substantially repeated the confession.

9. Criminal law 🔑822 (1)—Instructions should be considered together.

Instructions to determine their sufficiency should be considered together.

10. Criminal law 🔑823(10)—Instruction as to sufficiency of evidence held properly given.

It was not error in a prosecution for conspiracy to burglarize to give an instruction in the language of Pen. Code, § 184, as amended by St. 1919, p. 170, when followed immediately by an instruction substantially in the language of Pen. Code, § 1104, that "defendant cannot be convicted unless one or more overt acts are alleged in the information, nor unless one of the acts alleged is proved," as against the objection that it told the jury that any overt act which they might find from the evidence was done by defendant and his confederates in furtherance of the conspiracy would be sufficient, even though not charged in the information.

11. Criminal law 🔑806(1)—Repetition of instructions need not be given.

It was not error to refuse part of an instruction which was practically a repetition of the part given.

12. Criminal law 🔑810—Instructions in conspiracy to commit burglary held not inconsistent.

In prosecution for conspiracy to burglarize, an instruction that a defendant in case of conspiracy under Pen. Code, § 182, as amended by St. 1919, p. 170, cannot escape conviction merely because the party designed to be affected or injured thereby or his agents, by laying a trap or otherwise, have facilitated the accomplishment of the purpose of the conspiracy, or because such party or his agents have appeared to co-operate with the originator of the conspiracy in order to detect the conspirators, held not inconsistent with an instruction that, where there exists a suspicion that a crime is about to be committed, while it is proper to employ detectives or agents to watch and discover the persons proposed to perpetrate it, still, if the agents or detectives so employed suggest the commission of the crime to the suspected persons or mingle with the latter, and while so doing "induce, urge or instigate such suspected persons," etc., there can be no prosecution and conviction.

13. Conspiracy 🔑48—Instruction permitting conviction of part of those charged proper.

In a prosecution for conspiracy to burglarize, there was no error in charging that a conviction could be had if accused conspired with one of two other persons, though the information charged that four persons entered into the conspiracy.

14. Indictment and information 🔑174—No material variance where only part of defendants are shown guilty.

The rule as to a material variance between the pleading and the proof has no application where two or more persons are jointly charged with the same crime, and the evidence may be such as to justify the conviction of some of the defendants only and to require the acquittal of the others.

15. Criminal law 🔑829(1)—Covered instructions properly refused.

It was not error to refuse requested instructions where every principle sought to be stated therein was covered by the court's charge.

16. Criminal law 🔑742(1)—Whether conspirator was detective or agent of the party robbed for jury.

In prosecution for conspiracy to burglarize a mining company, whether witness for state, who took part in the attempted burglary, was an agent or detective of the mining company, held for the jury.

17. Criminal law 🔑877—Acquittal of one not an acquittal of all.

Where four persons were charged with conspiracy, acquittal of one of them did not require the acquittal of the others.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; George L. Jones, Judge.

Segundio Rodriguez was convicted of conspiracy to commit burglary, and appeals. Affirmed.

W. E. Wright, of Nevada City, and Russell P. Tyler, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was convicted of conspiracy to commit the crime of burglary (section 182, Pen. Code, as amended by the Legislature of 1919 [Stats. 1919, p. 170]) upon an information charging:

> That he "on or about the 16th day of March, 1922, * * * willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously did conspire and agree with C. Silbelo, Vincent Alvarez, and Albert Greenwald to commit the crime of burglary, to wit, by then and there feloniously to burglarize the office of the North Star Mines Company, a corporation, and the said Segundio Rodriguez, in pursuance and furtherance of said conspiracy, and to effect the object thereof, did attempt to pick the lock of the door of the office of the said North Star Mines Company to enter and consummate the purpose of said conspiracy," etc.

The alleged conspirators, with the exception of Greenwald, who was a feigned accomplice, were given separate trials. The defendant appeals from the judgment and the order denying him a new trial.

The legal integrity of the verdict is assailed on several different grounds, the first of which is that Albert Greenwald, charged in the information as a coconspirator, was the agent of the North Star Mines Company, and as such was employed and directed to originate a scheme whereby the other alleged conspirators would be inveigled and so entrapped into an attempt to burglarize the office of said company for the purpose of abstracting therefrom and stealing a large quantity of bullion stored therein. In other words, it is the contention that the conspiracy charged was, in pursuance of an agreement previously made between said Greenwald and the officers of said company, originated by the former, and that he led the other defendants into the scheme and in an attempted execution thereof; that therefore the arrest, the prosecution, and the conviction of the defendant were the result of an "entrapment," as that term is in criminal law understood, and that, for that reason and for the further reason that the scheme was concocted and sought to be carried out with the consent of the officers of the mining company, no crime was committed, and also the conviction of the accused is opposed to public policy, and consequently void. It is further contended that the verdict should be set aside because of certain errors committed in rulings upon certain evidence, and also because of errors in the giving of and refusing to give certain instructions.

It appears from the evidence that Albert Greenwald is a machinist by trade and an expert locksmith; that he maintained a machine shop in the town of Grass Valley, in Nevada county; that in January, 1922, while engaged in doing some work in a restaurant in Grass Valley, he met the defendant, and that they then engaged in a conversation in the kitchen of said restaurant; that during the course of the conversation defendant stated to Greenwald that he at one time was engaged at working in a mine in Montana, that he had seen there some high-grade ore, and that he had tried to open the lock, but could not, "and that if he knew how to open Yale locks he would never work again"; that he subsequently met the defendant on three or four different occasions and conversed with him, and that the latter on one occasion asked him how much he would charge to teach a friend of his (defendant's) to open Yale locks. Greenwald asked the defendant what his purpose was in having his friend learn how to open Yale locks, to which the defendant replied that "there is so much easy money to be gotten all over the country, and if I had a partner, a friend who could open Yale locks, I would never work any more." Greenwald tried to dissuade the defendant from engaging in any such business, as "practically he would be plotting against government property"; the defendant having in the conversation named a number of places, including postoffices, that could be easily entered and money taken therefrom if some one of experience in the opening of Yale locks would undertake the work with him. The defendant was insistent upon having Greenwald teach his friend how to open Yale locks and wanted to know what the latter would charge for so instructing his (defendant's) friend. Greenwald finally said that he would charge the sum of $200 for instructing the party referred to as to the method of opening such locks. Greenwald testified that in the month of February he closed his shop in Grass Valley and removed his mechanical equipment to Rocklin; that before departing from Grass Valley the defendant requested him (Greenwald) to leave his address with the defendant; and that, having done so, he later received from the defendant a letter in which it was stated that his (defendant's) friend would soon be in Rocklin for the purpose of taking lessons in the business of opening Yale locks. Shortly after Greenwald received the letter referred to, Vincent Alvarez (sometimes referred to in the testimony as Alvarez Rodriguez), one of the alleged coconspirators named in the information, made his appearance at the former's shop in Rocklin and introduced himself as the party of whom the defendant had spoken and written to him (Greenwald) as desiring to learn something about opening Yale locks. Greenwald gave Alvarez some instructions as to how to manipulate Yale locks so as to open them, but testified that he did not impart sufficiently explicit information in that particular to Alvarez to enable him to completely open such locks. A short while after the time just referred to Greenwald moved back to Grass Valley, and on the 2d day of March again met the defendant and in the company of Alvarez. It was on this occasion that the defendant proposed to rob the Empire and North Star mines, Alvarez being present, but not taking any special part in the conversation. The scheme was elaborately discussed by the defendant and he asked Greenwald to join in the criminal enterprise, but Greenwald at this time neither gave his assent to nor expressed dissent from the proposition. It was first suggested by the defendant that they take the bullion from the truck which is employed in conveying the same at certain intervals of time from the mines to the railroad station to be shipped. Greenwald would not agree to this suggestion. The defendant thereupon suggested that the bullion be taken from the train, but as to this Greenwald expressed no opinion. The defendant, Alvarez, and Greenwald met on several subsequent days, and on each of these occasions the proposition of robbing the mines was renewed by the defendant. Finally it was agreed that they would go to the office of the North Star mines, break into it, and steal the bullion.

On the 8th of March, 1922, Greenwald called on a Mr. Nobs, general manager of the Empire Mines Company, and gave him the full details of the proposed scheme of the defendant and Alvarez to rob the Empire and the North Star mines. Nobs in turn communicated the information thus received to Mr. Foote, the general manager of the North Star Mines Company, and these two told Mr. R. H. Bedford, the general superintendent of the North Star Mines Company, of the proposed robbery. Mr. Nobs stated that, when Greenwald first told him of the proposed robbery, he was rather skeptical about it for the reason that many other such reports had frequently come to them theretofore and proved to be groundless; that in those instances such reports were made by persons who desired to secure money from the mining companies for giving them the information and before producing results. He said, however, that after consulting with the officers of the North Star mines and further questioning Greenwald, who appeared at the offices of the mining companies three or four times before the robbery was attempted, he came to the conclusion that there was some foundation for the story. The services of a Mr. De Pue, of San Francisco, a noted finger print expert and investigator of crimes, were brought into requisition by the officers of the North Star mines, and the matter was placed in his hands. On his arrival at Grass Valley and at the office of the North Star mines, Greenwald was sent for, and, in the presence of Mr. Nobs, De Pue questioned Greenwald very fully as to the details of the proposed robbery. De Pue thereupon reached the conclusion that Greenwald was acting in good faith and was truthful in the story he told relative to the proposed robbery. Greenwald was asked by Mr. Nobs how much he wanted for furnishing the information, to which Greenwald replied that what he wanted first was to prove that what he had told them was true; that the defendant and his coconspirators were bent upon robbing the North Star Mines Company office and securing the bullion therein deposited; that, if he succeeded in proving the truth of what he had told them, the mining company could pay him whatever it thought his services were worth. Thereupon De Pue stated that, if the story he had told them proved to be well founded, it would be worth at least $1,000 to receive such information and Mr. Nobs assented to that proposition.

After Greenwald first imparted information to the authorities of the mines of the proposed robbery, Silbelo, also charged as a coconspirator, was brought into the affair by the defendant, the latter having previously told Greenwald that he had another friend, referring to Silbelo, who would enter into the conspiracy. Defendant stated that he had "tried out" said Silbelo, "and that he wouldn't stop at anything, and that he wanted him to go in with them on the holdup." After Silbelo put in an appearance as a member of the confederation, the matter of the robbery was freely and fully discussed by the defendant, Alvarez, Silbelo, and Greenwald, the latter finally agreeing to become a party to the commission of the proposed crime. In this connection, it should be stated that, when Greenwald first told the officers of the mining companies of the intended robbery, he stated that the conspirators had asked him to join them in the scheme, and that he intended doing so for the purpose of assisting in their detection and apprehension. He was advised by the officers of said companies to go ahead and do what he could towards bringing the conspiracy to light and capturing the criminals, if such they were.

The time fixed for the execution of the conspiracy was the night of the 16th of March, 1922. Greenwald so informed the officers of the North Star Mines. The latter had several deputy sheriffs in addition to the regular watchman of the mine stationed inside the building on the night of the 16th for the purpose of frustrating the accomplishment of the conspiracy and capturing the conspirators. On that night the attempt to rob the mine was made. Greenwald accompanied the other three parties to the office of the mine. They were all armed with weapons which, during the period of time the conspiracy was under discussion between the parties, were purchased by the defendant and Silbelo at a hardware store in the city of Auburn, Placer county. When they arrived at the mine, the defendant, who had constituted himself the leader in the scheme, assigned each of the conspirators to certain particular duties. Two were to be stationed at different points near the building so as to give alarm if any one should put in an appearance. Two of them were to go to the office door and undertake to open it. Greenwald testified that this arrangement was carried out. The defendant stationed himself near a tree which was close to the building, and Silbelo was at another point not far distant from where the defendant stood. The latter ordered Silbelo "not to stop at anything" if any one should appear on the scene while they were engaged in the robbery. Alvarez and Greenwald went up to the office door; Alvarez being the first one to get to the door and to take hold of the knob and attempt to open it. Greenwald followed and turned the knob and made a noise with a pick that he put in the door. A noise from another source was also heard. Greenwald was not certain whether it was produced by some one inside the office or by one of the conspirators. Greenwald then returned to where the defendant stood and stated that "the building was bolted on the inside, and I couldn't open the door," and referred to the noise he had heard. A suggestion was then made that they desist in any further attempt to break into the office that night, but the defendant, notwithstanding that he was told by Greenwald that he had heard a noise which might have come from the office or the inside of the building, proposed that they break the window and thus make an entrance into the office. It was, however, finally agreed that they would not make any further attempt to burglarize the office that night, and they returned to Greenwald's shop.

Nobs and Bedford positively testified that Greenwald, prior to the time at which he first gave them information relative to the proposed robbery, was not employed by either the Empire Mines Company or the North Star Mines Company in any capacity; that at no time did they authorize him to lead the defendants into a scheme to rob the mines or to accompany the conspirators to the mines for the purpose of robbing the same. They admitted that, after he had told the story to them and had stated that the other parties desired him to go with them to the mine for the purpose of robbing it, they advised him to "go ahead." This is positively all that was said to Greenwald in regard to the matter, so they testified. They had no contract with him whereby he was to receive any particular sum of money for his services, except any agreement which might be implied from the suggestion of Mr. De Pue, with the acquiescence of Mr. Nobs, that the services of Greenwald would be worth $1,000 if it proved to be true that a conspiracy had been formed by and between the defendant and his coconspirators to burglarize the office of the North Star mines for the purpose of stealing the bullion therein stored. In fact, both Nobs and Bedford positively testified that at no time could they get Greenwald to say how much he wanted for his services; that Greenwald, in reply to the question as to how much he would charge for his services, would invariably say that he had no price to fix; that what he desired, above all other considerations, was to show that the defendants Alvarez and Silbelo had suggested and formed a conspiracy to rob the mines and to have them apprehended in the act. It was admitted by Mr. Bedford that, on the suggestion of Mr. De Pue, he gave Greenwald $25 to be used for defraying any expense to which he might be required to go in bringing about the apprehension of the conspirators if they attempted to carry out the object of the conspiracy.

De Pue testified, in response to questions on cross-examination, that he did not instruct or direct Greenwald to accompany the other men to the mine on the night of the 16th; that there was no necessity for him doing so because Greenwald had himself said that he intended to go with the men upon his own initiative, so that he could prove to the satisfaction of the mining company that he had told the truth regarding the conspiracy.

The defendant and his coconspirators, including Greenwald, were placed under arrest by Sheriff Martin, of Nevada county, in the locksmith shop of Greenwald in Grass Valley on the evening of March 29, 1922. It seems that there was not room enough in the Nevada county jail to hold the prisoners, and they were taken to the county jail at Auburn, Placer county, to remain pending their preliminary examination and trial. While they were confined in said jail the defendant made a statement to Mr. De Pue in the presence of Sheriff Gum, of Placer county, R. C. O'Connor, and Greenwald, in which he admitted that he, Alvarez, Silbelo, and Greenwald had entered into the conspiracy to rob the North Star and Empire Mining Companies, and that they undertook to carry out the conspiracy on the night of the 16th of March, 1922, as explained by Greenwald in his testimony. De Pue, Gum, and O'Connor positively testified that the defendant at no time during the course of his confession stated that Greenwald planned the conspiracy or was the instigator thereof. These witnesses testified that the defendant said that they had taken Greenwald with them because he was an expert locksmith and could be of service in opening the locks of the office and the vault in which the bullion was kept.

The defendant, testifying in his own behalf, admitted that he and the other parties named in the information conspired together for the purpose of robbing the North Star and Empire mines; that they undertook to carry out the conspiracy on the night of the 16th of March, 1922, but, as Greenwald testified, they heard some noises which put them in fear that they were being watched, and thereupon withdrew from the premises of the North Star mines without having entered the office, or, as he stated, without attempting to rob it. The defendant stated that he first met Greenwald in February, 1922, in a restaurant which he (defendant) was conducting in Grass Valley; that they met several times thereafter, and that Greenwald frequently complained of the fact that his business (that of a machinist and locksmith) was not paying him as well as he would like, and, on one occasion, suggested to the defendant that, if he (defendant) had any friend who desired to learn the business of a locksmith or how to open locks, he would teach him the art for the sum of $50; that, when Greenwald left for Rocklin, he gave his address to the defendant, with instructions to send any one to him who might desire to learn how to open Yale locks; that he did later send Alvarez to Greenwald at Rocklin with a letter stating that Alvarez desired to learn how to open Yale locks; that, upon his return to Grass Valley from Rocklin, Greenwald again met the defendant, and, after considerable conversation about "hard times," so far as his business was concerned, and also asking where Alvarez was at that time, made a proposition to the defendant to rob the North Star and Empire mines. This conversation occurred, so defendant stated, between the 8th and 10th of March, 1922, in the room of Greenwald in Grass Valley. Thereafter, proceeded the defendant, he Alvarez, Silbelo, and Greenwald again met and fully discussed and finally completed the plans for robbing the North Star mines; Greenwald being the man who suggested and arranged for the carrying out of the scheme. The defendant admitted that, as a part of the preparation for executing the object of the conspiracy, he and Silbelo bought several revolvers to be used by them on the night of the robbery. These revolvers were purchased at a hardware store in Auburn, so the defendant testified, and so testified the owner of the hardware store, who identified the weapons as those sold to two strangers on the day on which the defendant admitted that they were purchased.

Alvarez, one of the alleged confederates of the defendant, was called to the stand to testify in behalf of the defendant, but, having been informed by the court of his rights as a codefendant, refused to testify on the ground that his testimony would tend to incriminate him.

[1] 1. There can be no doubt but that the evidence clearly warranted the jury in finding that the crime of conspiracy, as defined by our statute, was consummated. See section 182, Pen. Code, supra. Section 184 of said Code, as amended by the Legislature of 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 170), provides:

> "No agreement amounts to a conspiracy, unless some act, beside such agreement, be done within this state to effect the object thereof, by one or more of the parties to such agreement and the trial of cases of conspiracy may be had in any county in which any such act be done."

[2] The indictment alleges that the defendant attempted to pick the lock of the door of the office. This, of course, charged an act in furtherance of the execution of the conspiracy, as required by section 184 of the Penal Code. As seen, the evidence shows that Alvarez, one of the coconspirators, went to the door and got hold of the knob. There is no direct testimony that he actually attempted to pick the lock; yet the evidence shows he had with him lock picks and passkeys, and it seems to us that the jury were, from this fact and the fact that he took hold of the knob of the door, authorized to infer and conclude that he did actually pick the lock or do some other like act for the purpose of opening the door. But, after all, since the gravamen of the offense as charged in the information is the formation of the conspiracy and the attempt to enter the office of the mining company, the allegation that the conspirators attempted to pick the lock of the door of the office merely involves a statement of the means employed by them to effect such entrance, and, in a rational view, amounts only to an allegation that they attempted to open the door for the purpose of facilitating their entrance into the office. Indeed, the allegation that the conspirators attempted to pick the lock of the door would be meaningless if it were not used in the information for the purpose of expressing the idea or thought that they thus attempted to make an entrance into the office. Any attempt on the part of the conspirators to enter the office and to "consummate the purposes of the conspiracy," which is the language of the information, whether the attempt was made by breaking the door or a window or picking the lock of the door or by attempting to open the door by means of a passkey, would constitute the overt act charged in the information as in furtherance of the conspiracy. To be more explicit, in charging the crime of burglary it is sufficient to allege that the accused unlawfully, etc., entered a certain building or structure with the intent to commit grand or petit larceny or any felony, without stating the means employed by him to effect an entrance, and an attempt to commit that crime is sufficiently charged in like language —that is, in the language of the statute. And it follows, therefore, that the means employed for that purpose is not material, and need not be alleged. It is mere surplusage. With the allegation as to the picking of the lock omitted from the information, the charge would thus be sufficiently stated:

> "* * * Did conspire * * * to commit the crime of burglary, to wit, by then and there feloniously to burglarize the office of the * * * company and the said [defendant], in pursuance and furtherance of said conspiracy and to effect the object thereof, did attempt * * * the office of * * * company to enter and consummate the purpose of said conspiracy."

Thus, in effect or substantially, does the information here charge the offense, and it was therefore sufficient, in order to meet the allegation of that pleading as to the overt act, to wit, the attempt to enter the office of the mining company, to prove that the conspirators did make such attempt; the means resorted to by them for that purpose being unimportant and immaterial.

[3, 4] In the recent case of People v. Beck (Cal. App.) 213 Pac. 61, the question as to what constitute overt acts which are required to be shown before the crime of conspiracy is established is reviewed, and many cases cited in which are to be found illustrations of different acts which are in furtherance of the execution of the object of a criminal conspiracy, or which, if done, would effect or tend to effect the object of the conspiracy. But there cannot, of course, be any question but that an attempt to open the door of the office, whether by picking it or otherwise, is an overt act. Manifestly the act of Alvarez in attempting to enter the office was the act of all the conspirators, since it was made for the purpose of accomplishing the object of the conspiracy.

[5, 6] 2. There is a conflict between the testimony of the defendant and that of Greenwald upon the question whether the conspiracy was originated by the latter or by the former and the other alleged conspirators. There is, however, some evidence corroborative of the testimony of Greenwald that the conspiracy was instigated by the defendant, and not by him. While both the defendant and Silbelo were in jail awaiting trial, the defendant wrote and sent to Silbelo a letter in which he suggested that he (Silbelo) admit his guilt, but, in making his confession to the officers, to state that Greenwald was the originator of the scheme to rob the mine and induced the defendant, Silbelo, and Alvarez to join him in the formation and execution thereof. This story, need not have been put in the mouth of Silbelo by the defendant if the truth was that Greenwald originated the conspiracy, and therefore the suggestion in said letter that Silbelo should say to the officers that Greenwald was the originator of the crime is a very strong circumstance tending to support Greenwald's testimony that the defendant was the prime mover or instigator of the conspiracy. This, we think, was sufficient corroboration of Greenwald's testimony as to that matter, assuming that he was a real accomplice, and that it was necessary that his testimony in that particular be corroborated as required by section 1111 of the Penal Code.

There is no evidence and no claim that Greenwald was an officer of the law or anything other than a mere private citizen, and also it is clear that there is abundant support to the implied finding of the jury that Greenwald did not, in the transaction involving the formation of the conspiracy and the attempted execution thereof, act as a detective for or the agent of either the North Star or the Empire Mines Company, and that the officers of neither company consented to or urged either the formation or the execution of the conspiracy. As to the part taken by the officers of the North Star Company in the transaction, we are justified in saying that there is no evidence whatever that those in authority over said company ever suggested or advised the formation of the conspiracy. Indeed, from the evidence it is clear that the officers of the company knew absolutely nothing of any scheme being in progress to rob the company until Greenwald communicated information of the proposed robbery to them, and that they did not then consent to the commission of the burglary, but merely consented to anything Greenwald might find it necessary to do to expose the conspiracy and to capture the conspirators. At the time they received information of the formation of the conspiracy there was wanting in the consummation of the crime charged in the information but one element, to wit, some overt act or acts on the part of the conspirators in furtherance of the object of the conspiracy; and the evidence does not show that the officers of the mine, or any one having authority in the matter of the investigation of the proposed robbery, induced or requested Greenwald to proceed in confederation with the other parties with the execution of the object of the conspiracy or to do any act in furtherance thereof. It will be remembered that the officers testified that Greenwald stated to them that he had been invited by the defendant and his confederates to join them in the conspiracy and to accompany them to the office of the company for the purpose of carrying out the object thereof. It is true the officers made no objection to the proposition of Greenwald to join the conspirators in the actual attack upon the property of the company, and this, it may be conceded, may be considered as a tacit consent on the part of the officers that he should do so: but this does not amount to consent in law. It merely means (in view of the evidence generally) that, having been informed that certain criminals had fixed upon a determined purpose to rob them of their property, they were willing that their informant should pursue any course that would prevent the accomplishment of the designed result of the criminal combination and to bring the criminals to justice. In 25 Cyc. p. 44, the rule is stated as follows:

> "The fact that an agent of the owner acts as a supposed confederate of the thief is no defense to the latter, provided the original design was formed independently of such agent. So, where a detective employed by the owner acts with the thief, the taking is none the less larceny. And so, where a person approached by the thief as his confederate notifies the owner or the public authorities, and, being authorized by them to do so, assists the thief in carrying out the plan, the larceny is nevertheless committed."

In State v. Currie, 13 N. D. 655, 102 N. W. 875, 69 L. R. A. 405, 112 Am. St. Rep. 687, it was held, quoting the résumé of the opinion as given in footnote to State v. Smith, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 951:

> "It was held no defense to a prosecution for burglary that one present with and assisting defendant in the burglary was a detective, if the detective did not instigate the crime, and it was committed, as to every ingredient of it, by the defendant, nor that the owner of the building, to whom the detective disclosed that it was probably about to be burglarized by the defendant with the feigned assistance of himself, acting for the purpose of securing evidence of the intended burglary and other crimes, did not take steps to prevent the crime, but passively allowed it to go on."

The rule is stated succinctly in City of Chicago v. Brendecke, 170 Ill. App. 25, as follows:

> "It is not unlawful entrapment for police officers to afford to a person an opportunity to voluntarily and deliberately do what they had reason to believe he would do if opportunity offered."

The case of State v. Smith, 33 Nev. 438, 117 Pac. 19, is strikingly similar in the facts to the case at bar. The defendant was charged jointly with other persons with the crime of grand larceny in the stealing of gold amalgam from a mining company in the state of Nevada. He and his confederates attempted and thought that they had succeeded in inducing the watchman of the mine, one Zimmerman, to join them in the conspiracy to commit the crime. Zimmerman, however, reported the proposed larceny to the officers of the company, and they advised him to pretend to stand in with the conspirators in the perpetration of the crime. Zimmerman did as he was so instructed, and the attempt to rob the mine was made. The defendant and his confederates were apprehended in the act, placed under arrest, and prosecuted for, and convicted of, the crime. On appeal the point was made that the offense was committed with the consent of the owners of the mine through their agent, Zimmerman, but the Supreme Court held that the defense was not well taken. The court in its opinion reviews many cases covering the proposition of entrapment and the commission of offenses with the apparent assistance of feigned confederates, who were the agents of the owners of the property upon which the criminal trespass was designed to be made, and we refer to those cases as opposing the claim herein made by the appellant that the proposed robbery of the mine was with the consent of the owners thereof, in the sense that they were parties to or instigators of or induced the commission or the attempted commission of the crime. See People v. Bunkers, 2 Cal. App. 197, 209, 84 Pac. 364, 370.

Obviously, if the officers in authority over the North Star Mines Company had actually consented to the formation and the attempted carrying out of the conspiracy, then the element of criminal trespass would have been absent and no crime committed. But, as is clear from the evidence, this is not such a case. Nor does the case here come within the rule of that class of cases of which the case of People v. Collins, 53 Cal. 185, is an exemplar. In that case the defendant asked one Parnell to enter a certain building for the purpose of stealing therefrom a sum of money which he (defendant) knew to be concealed therein and proposed that the money should be divided between them. Parnell, before accepting or acting upon the proposal, communicated the fact of its having been made to him to the sheriff, who, after consultation with the district attorney, advised Parnell to pretend to the defendant that he accepted the proposition and would carry out the enterprise. The understanding between Parnell and the sheriff was that the former, upon taking the money, should mark it with acid, so it could be identified, and when he delivered the money to the defendant a signal should be given by Parnell upon which the sheriff would arrest the defendant with the marked money in his possession. Parnell, it seems, entered the building and secured the money, the defendant remaining on the outside, and, when Parnell gave the money to the defendant, he at the same time gave the signal agreed upon and the sheriff thereupon arrested the defendant with the marked coins in his possession. Manifestly, since the gist of the crime of burglary is the entering of a building with intent to commit certain crimes, and Parnell not having entered the building with such intent, the crime of burglary could not be consummated. The Supreme Court so held and reversed the case. Here Alvarez, one of the conspirators, was himself the first to attempt to enter the office.

[7] 3. The particular criticism of the court's rulings as to the evidence involves the action of the court in allowing to go before the jury the confession of the defendant. The ground upon which the objection was urged below and is pressed here against the propriety of this testimony is that, prior to the making of the confession, Greenwald had attempted to induce the defendant to confess and had said to him that it would be better for him if he would tell the truth about the matter. The claim is that it was under the stress of the advice so given to the defendant that the confession to the officers was brought about, and that it was, therefore, not a free and voluntary admission of guilt. There is some conflict as to whether the confession was thus superinduced. It is very clear, though, that any advice given by Greenwald to the defendant to admit his guilt was not in the presence of any officer or person in authority. Nor does it appear that the circumstances under which Greenwald is supposed to have advised the defendant to tell the truth were such as would have led him (defendant) to believe that such advice was given with the sanction of any person in authority or having power to extend leniency to him in the matter of punishment in case he did confess. In the case of People v. Luis, 158 Cal. 185, 191, 110 Pac. 580, 582, considering the ruling of the trial court admitting in evidence a confession made by the defendant upon the advice of a third party, who was not an officer or in authority, that it would be better for him to do so, the Supreme Court says:

> "We are aware of no case holding that a confession should be excluded merely because it was induced by the advice of a third person to the effect simply that it would probably be better to tell the truth, given in the absence of any officer or person in authority, and not given under such circumstances as to lead the accused to suppose it was given with the sanction of any such person. The mere fact that the accused secretly hoped that the effect of making a complete statement showing his guilt would be to lighten his punishment and make it better and easier for him could not operate to render the statement inadmissible if that hope was not improperly induced. It is manifest that the statement may be free and voluntary notwithstanding the existence of such a hope."

See U. S. v. Stone (C. C.) 8 Fed. 232, 260; People v. Piner, 11 Cal. App. 549, 105 Pac. 780.

The record shows that the defendant's confession to the officers was not made under the influence of any threats or promise of leniency or reward by said officers. Before making his confession the defendant was informed of his rights by the officers and explicitly told that any incriminating statement he might make with reference to the charge against him would be used at the trial for the purpose of supporting the allegations of the information.

[8] But it is unnecessary further to consider this point, since it appears, as we have shown, that the defendant himself took the witness stand and repeated substantially before the jury the confession made by him to the officers in the county jail at Auburn. In other words, he admitted on the witness stand that he was a party to the conspiracy, and that he, with his coconspirators, went to the office of the North Star Mines Company on the night of the 16th of March, 1922, for the purpose of burglarizing it and taking therefrom any gold bullion which they might find deposited therein. In view of this testimony by the defendant himself, the ruling of the court allowing testimony of his confession, even if erroneous, is without prejudice.

4. The assignments of error as to the action of the court in the giving of and the refusal to give certain instructions are so numerous that all of them cannot be specifically noticed herein. We will therefore give special attention to such only of these assignments as it is thought should thus be noticed. The first objection is against an instruction which, so far as it goes, is in the language of section 31 of the Penal Code. It involves a correct statement of the law in the abstract, and manifestly covers a principle which is pertinent to any criminal case in which two or more parties are jointly charged with the commission of the same offense.

[9, 10] Instruction No. 16 is in the language of section 184 of the Penal Code, hereinabove reproduced. The objection to it is that thereby the court in effect told the jury that any overt act which they might find from the evidence was done by the defendant and his confederates in furtherance of the conspiracy would be sufficient, even though such act was not the overt act specifically charged in the information. The instruction is, of course, a correct abstract statement of the rule; but, even if it were necessary to concede that, taken alone, it is obnoxious to the objection thus made against it, when it is considered, as it should be, in connection with the given instruction (No. 17) immediately following it, the reason for the objection is at once dissipated. Instruction 17 is substantially in the language of section 1104 of the Penal Code, and is as follows:

> "Upon a trial for conspiracy, the defendant cannot be convicted unless one or more overt acts are alleged in the information, nor unless one of the acts alleged is proved."

The instruction in the case of People v. Johnson, 22 Cal. App. 362, 366, 134 Pac. 339 cited by the defendant, is entirely at variance with the instruction here criticized, viewed in connection with the succeeding instruction. In the Johnson Case, the court told the jury that it was sufficient "if you find * * * that one or more of the defendants entered into an agreement with another defendant * * * to obstruct and impede the trial of said action, and that in pursuance of said agreement some act was done by one of them toward carrying the agreement into effect." The Court of Appeal, by Mr. Justice James, very properly held that the phraseology of the instruction was such that the jury could therefrom have deemed themselves at liberty to find that an overt act other than any of those charged in the information was sufficient to meet the requirements of a verdict of guilty.

[11] Instruction 18, proposed by the defendant, was given in part and refused in part. The part given, in effect, declared that, where there exists a suspicion that a crime is about to be committed, while it is proper to employ detectives or agents to watch and discover the persons proposing to perpetrate it, still, if the agents or detectives so employed suggest the commission of the crime to the suspected persons or mingle with the latter, and while so doing "induce, urge, or instigate such suspected persons to take part in the commission of the crime or to commit some overt act for the purpose of convicting them, there can be no prosecution and conviction under such circumstances." The refused part of the instruction was practically a repetition, but involved a less accurate statement in concrete form of the principle stated in the portion given. There was no error in modifying the instruction as indicated. At least, the defendant could not have been prejudiced thereby.

[12] There is no merit to the claim that instruction No. 19 is in conflict with or contradictory to instruction No. 18, last above considered. No. 19 is to the effect that a defendant in a case of conspiracy under section 182 of the Penal Code cannot escape conviction merely because the party designed to be affected or injured thereby or his agents, by laying a trap or otherwise, have facilitated the accomplishment of the purpose of the conspiracy, or because such party or his agents have appeared to co-operate with the originator of the conspiracy in order to detect the conspirators in any attempt they might make to accomplish the object of the conspiracy. The instruction, when reasonably viewed, is not inconsistent with instruction No. 19, nor is it objectionable in any sense. It is true, as the instruction in effect says, that an acquittal in such a case is not justified merely because the party against whom or whose property the conspiracy is aimed, having received information of its formation and that it is in process of execution, and not being the instigator of the criminal scheme, makes such preparation for frustrating the accomplishment thereof and the detection of the conspirator as may be conceived to be required for that purpose. In this connection we cite, in addition to the cases cited above as supporting this proposition, the following: Hummelshime v. State, 125 Md. 563, 93 Atl. 990, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 1072; State v. Dougherty, 86 N. J. Law, 525, 93 Atl. 98; Commonwealth v. Wasson, 42 Pa. Super. Ct. 38. The instruction is to be considered, as presumptively the jury so considered it, in connection with other given instructions bearing upon the question of entrapment and in view of the evidence. As so considered, its true meaning—the meaning which is here ascribed to it—if not, when the instruction is considered by itself or alone, plainly apparent, could not be misapprehended by any intelligent man or woman.

[13, 14] Instruction No. 26, proposed by the people, was given after having been modified by the court by eliminating therefrom the name of Greenwald. The instruction, as so modified, stated that, where a conspiracy among two or more persons to commit a crime is proved to exist, "any act in furtherance of the conspiracy done by one of the conspirators is the act of all the conspirators, and all are bound by it." The instruction then proceeds to say that, if the jury were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that, on the day on which it is alleged the burglary was attempted, an agreement existed between the defendant "and either C. Silbelo or Vincent Alvarez [Greenwald's name here stricken out] to commit the crime of burglary, as charged, * * * and you are further satisfied * * * that, on the same date, * * * while such agreement was in existence, in furtherance of said agreement, * * * either the defendant, or C. Silbelo, or Vincent Alvarez [Greenwald's name here eliminated] attempted to enter the office of * * * with intent to commit grand or petit larceny or felony therein, then you should find the defendant guilty, as charged," etc. The principal ground upon which the legal soundness of said instruction is impeached is that it does not state the conspiracy charged because the name of Greenwald was omitted therefrom, or in other words, while the information alleges that four persons joined in the conspiracy, the instruction declares that the defendant could be convicted if the proof satisfactorily showed that the conspiracy to do the act charged was entirely between him and either Silbelo or Alvarez. The objection thus urged against the instruction, as well as some others not necessary to mention, is without legal force. If a dozen persons had been charged with being members of the conspiracy, the jury could have properly found two guilty and the remainder not guilty, assuming that the evidence warranted such a course, and the court was authorized so to instruct the jury, which was in effect no more than the court did by the instruction in question. The rule as to a material variance between the pleading and the proof has no application where, in a criminal case in which two or more persons are jointly charged with the same crime, the evidence may be such as to justify the conviction of some of the defendants only and to require the acquittal of the others.

[15, 16] The defendant complains that the court seriously prejudiced his rights by refusing to give to the jury some 18 different instructions which he proposed. We have examined these proposed, but rejected, instructions with painstaking care, and thus have been convinced that every principle sought to be stated therein was covered by the court's charge to the jury. There was no necessity for repeating a principle or rule of law which was embraced in the court's charge. Besides, some of the instructions referred to were objectionable in that they referred to Greenwald as "the agent" and "the detective" of the North Star Mines Company in the transaction involved herein. It was for the jury to say from the evidence whether Greenwald was a detective or an agent of the mining company in said transaction.

[17] Defendant's instruction No. 18, which was among those rejected by the court, does not state the law in so far as this case is concerned. It was to the effect that the acquittal of Greenwald or the act of the district attorney in dismissing the information as to him would entitle the defendant to an acquittal, inasmuch as "the acquittal of one defendant in an alleged conspiracy is an acquittal of all the defendants in the alleged conspiracy, whether such acquittal is by consent, design, or after trial," etc. As supporting the propriety of the instruction, counsel for the defendant cite the case of State v. Dougherty, 88 N. J. Law, 209, 96 Atl. 56, L. R. A. 1916C, 991, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 950, in which there were only two persons involved in the alleged conspiracy, one of whom was a feigned accomplice, and therefore there could be no conspiracy. Indeed, in such a case the charge of conspiracy would be inappropriate.

We have discovered no just reason for disturbing the verdict, and the judgment and the order appealed from are accordingly affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

61 Cal. App. 92

PEOPLE v. SILBELO. (Cr. 651.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 23, 1923.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1144(17)—Presumed that commitment was for crime charged.

Where on appeal there is no record of a motion to set aside the information (Pen. Code, § 995), and hence nothing to show the nature of the commitment or what the evidence upon which the commitment was based showed, the presumption is that the commitment was for the crime charged in the information.

2. Indictment and information 🔑161(5)—Amendment of information held not erroneous.

An amendment of an information for conspiracy to burglarize mining properties merely relating to or affecting an allegation in the information as to the means employed by the conspirators to commit the overt act, or attempt to effect an entrance, held to involve only a matter of form, and not of substance, and to charge the identical offense, and could not have misled the accused.

3. Conspiracy 🔑28—Gist of offense of conspiracy to burglarize.

The gist of a conspiracy to burglarize consists of the conspiracy, and an attempt to enter in pursuance and furtherance of the conspiracy and the particular manner or means by which the attempt, the overt act, was made is wholly immaterial.

4. Indictment and information 🔑110(10)—Information for conspiracy to burglarize held to comply with requirements of statute.

An indictment for conspiracy to burglarize held to correspond with the requirements of Pen. Code, § 950, subd. 2, and section 952, subds. 2 and 3, the first ingredient of the crime being alleged in clear and concise language, and the second ingredient, the overt act, or the fact of entering a building, or attempt to do so, being stated in the language of section 459, describing the crime of burglary.

5. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Failure to instruct as to corroboration of accomplice held not prejudicial.

Failure to give an instruction addressed to the question whether witness was a real accomplice, assuming that it was the duty of the court to give such an instruction on its own motion, was not prejudicial and did not result in a miscarriage of justice (Const. art. 6, § 4½), where there were plenty of corroborative circumstances, and the evidence was convincing as to the guilt of the accused.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; George L. Jones, Judge.

C. Silbelo was convicted of conspiracy to commit burglary, and appeals. Affirmed.

W. E. Wright, of Nevada City, and Russell P. Tyler, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was, by information filed in the superior court of the county of Nevada, jointly charged with Segundio Rodriguez, Vincent Alvarez, and Albert Greenwald with the crime of conspiracy, under section 182 of the Penal Code, as amended by the Legislature of 1919 (Stats. 1919, pp. 170, 171).

The jury found him guilty as charged, and he appeals from the judgment and the order denying him a new trial.

The information as originally filed alleged that the parties just named and the defendant, on or about the 16th day of March, 1922, in the county of Nevada—

> "unlawfully and feloniously did conspire and agree * * * to commit the crime of burglary, to wit, by then and there feloniously to burglarize the office of the North Star Mines Company, * * * and the said Silbelo, in pursuance and furtherance of said conspiracy and to effect the object thereof, did attempt to pick the lock of the door of the office of the said North Star Mines Company to enter and consummate the purposes of said conspiracy," etc.

Subsequently to the trial and conviction of the defendant's coconspirator, Segundio Rodriguez, in whose case an opinion by this court upholding the result arrived at in the court below has this day been filed, and after the defendant had entered his plea to the information as originally filed, the court allowed the district attorney, upon motion, to amend the information by striking out the words above italicized and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

> "And that on said 16th day of March, A. D. 1922, at and in the county of Nevada, * * * the said C. Silbelo, in execution of said last-mentioned premises, and in pursuance and furtherance of said conspiracy, combination, confederation, and agreement with Vincent Alvarez, Segundio Rodriguez, and Albert Greenwald, and to effect the object thereof, did attempt to unlawfully, feloniously, and burglariously enter said building, to wit, said office of the North Star Mines Company, * * * with the intent then and there to commit the crime of grand larceny, a felony," etc.

The action of the court in permitting the information to be amended as indicated presents the first point submitted here for decision.

The authority for the amendment of indictments and informations is to be found in section 1008 of the Penal Code, which provides:

> "An indictment or information may be amended by the district attorney, without leave of court, at any time before the defendant pleads. Such amendment may be made at any time thereafter, in the discretion of the court where it can be done without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant. An indictment cannot be amended so as to change the offense charged, nor an information so as to charge an offense not shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination."

[1] There is no record here of a motion to set aside the information (Pen. Code, § 995); hence there is before us nothing to show the nature of the commitment or what the evidence upon which the commitment was based showed. The presumption is, in that state of the record, that the commitment was for the crime charged in the information.

[2, 3] Nor does the information, as amended, state a different offense from that set forth therein as the same was originally filed. The information, as amended, as it did prior to the amendment or as it was originally filed, charges that Silbelo and his confederates entered into and formed a conspiracy to burglarize the office of the North Star Mines Company, and in pursuance of said conspiracy attempted to enter said office. The amendment merely relates to or affects the allegation as to the means alleged in the information, as it was originally filed, as having been employed by the conspirators to commit the overt act or attempt to effect an entrance into the office. See People v. Rodriguez (Crim. No. 652) 214 Pac. 452, opinion filed this day. As is said in that opinion, the gist of the offense as charged originally consisted of the conspiracy to burglarize the office and the attempt to enter the same in pursuance and furtherance of the conspiracy, and therefore the particular manner in which or means by which the attempt (the overt act) was made is wholly immaterial. Since, therefore, the offense charged in the amended information is the identical offense charged in said information as it was originally filed, it cannot, of course, be held that the allowance of the amendment was prejudicial to the substantial rights of the accused. The amendment involved a matter of form, and not of substance. The defendant was not called upon by the amendment to prepare for any different defense from that which he could have made had the information been allowed to remain as it was originally drafted and filed. Because of the amendment he could not have been misled as to the nature of the charge which he was required to meet or prepare to meet. In other words, any defense which he might have prepared for the purpose of introducing in impeachment of the allegations of the information as it was originally filed would be equally as pertinent to the allegations of the information as it was amended. See People v. Webber, 44 Cal. App. 120, 186 Pac. 406; People v. Liberty, 39 Cal. App. 360, 178 Pac. 863; People v. White, 47 Cal. App. 400, 190 Pac. 821; People v. Rippe, 32 Cal. App. 514, 163 Pac. 506; People v. Wilhite, 49 Cal. App. 246, 193 Pac. 151.

[4] But it is vigorously contended that the information as amended is defective in that it does not correspond with the requirements of subdivision 2 of section 950 and subdivisions 2 and 3 of section 952 of the Penal Code. There is no merit in this contention. Section 950, subd. 2, provides that an indictment or an information shall contain "a statement of the acts constituting the offense, in ordinary and concise language, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended." Section 952, subds. 2 and 3, provides that the indictment or information must be direct and certain as to the offense charged and the particular circumstances of such offense, when they are necessary to constitute a complete offense. The amended information meets all these requirements. The first ingredient of the crime of conspiracy as alleged in the information is stated in clear and concise language, or so that it can readily be understood what is meant thereby, or in language such as to enable a person of ordinary intelligence to understand what was meant to be charged. The second ingredient of the offense, to wit, the overt act or the fact of entering the building or the attempt to do so, is stated in the language of section 459 of the Penal Code describing the crime of burglary, which is legally sufficient to state the offense to commit which the conspiracy was formed.

The facts of this case are substantially the same as those brought out in the case of People v. Segundio Rodriguez (Crim. No. 652) 214 Pac. 452. In the opinion in that case they are given in extended detail. There is, therefore, no necessity for repeating them herein. The defendant did not testify in the case, and Alvarez, although he was called to the stand, refused to testify on the ground that his testimony would tend to incriminate him. The story as told by the witness Greenwald in the Rodriguez Case of the circumstances leading to and characterizing the formation of the conspiracy and the attempt to put it into execution was retold by him in this case. There is no substantial variance between the story told by him in the Rodriguez Case and that told in this case concerning the transaction. In this case, however, Greenwald described a little more fully the actions of Alvarez in his attempt to open the door of the office of the mining company. He stated that Alvarez opened the screen door and then got hold of the knob of the main door and tried to open it. Greenwald repeated that no directions were given to him by the officers of the mining company as to the part that he should play in the transaction. He also told of the procurement of the revolvers, several sacks in which to carry the bullion, which he said were procured by the defendant here, rubber shoes, and rubber gloves to be used by the conspirators; the use of all those articles in the execution of the conspiracy having been suggested by Segundio Rodriguez. The rubber gloves were to be used for the purpose of preventing finger prints being left on the door or other parts of the building upon which the party attempting to enter the office might place his hands.

[5] In this case it is stated that the reason that no special instructions were requested in the cases of Segundio Rodriguez and the defendant here was because:

> "It had not developed to a moral certainty that the alleged coconspirator, Albert Greenwald, would not be also brought to trial; * * * that the jury were led to believe that it was the theory of the prosecution that Greenwald was a real conspirator and would be prosecuted."

We do not understand the purport of the argument thus essayed. It would seem obvious that it could make no difference what the intention of the district attorney was as to the disposition that was to be made of the case against Greenwald. The nature of the "special instructions" which defendant would have proposed had it been known to his counsel that Greenwald was not to be prosecuted is not indicated in the briefs. An instruction, however, based on section 1111 of the Penal Code, to the effect that "a conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense," was not, but should have been, given in this case, since the question, whether Greenwald was a feigned or an actual accomplice was one for the jury to determine. Such an instruction was properly given in the Case of Rodriguez (Crim. No. 652), at the request of the defendant therein; but no such instruction was proposed by counsel for the defendant in this case. There was, though, plenty of corroboration of the testimony of Greenwald as to the attempt to carry out the conspiracy. In fact, the defendant confessed to Mr. Nobs, in the presence of two other parties, that he, with Segundio Rodriguez, Alvarez, and Greenwald, went to the building of the mining company on the night of the 16th of March, 1922, for the purpose of entering the office and stealing the bullion. At the same time he stated that the party who first proposed the robbery to him was Segundio Rodriguez. There were other corroborative circumstances which it is unnecessary to repeat herein. Indeed, there is no dispute in this case, nor was there any in the Rodriguez Case, that the four parties named in the information as the conspirators went to the mining company office on the night of the 16th of March, 1922, for the purpose of breaking into the office and stealing the bullion. It follows that it makes little if any difference whether Greenwald was a feigned or a real accomplice. The corroboration referred to was also corroborative of the fact of the formation of the conspiracy, since the fact that the four men met together or at the same time at the building and made an attempt to enter the office is convincing evidence of the fact that there had been a prearranged agreement or understanding between the parties to commit the crime as charged in the information. Failure, therefore, to give an instruction addressed to the question whether Greenwald was a real accomplice, assuming that it was the duty of the court to give such an instruction on its own motion, cannot be held to have been prejudicial or to have resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

The charge of the court in this case, except in a few immaterial particulars, was the same as that given in the Case of Rodriguez. The criticisms of the instructions given herein are the same as those aimed at the charge of the court in the Rodriguez Case. There is, therefore, no necessity for reviewing in this opinion these assignments.

The same may be said as to the instructions proposed by the defendant and rejected by the court. With one or two exceptions the refused instructions are the same as those offered by the defendant and rejected by the court in the Rodriguez Case. In the opinion in that case we have disposed of these assignments, and it is not necessary to review them herein. The principles sought to be stated in all the rejected instructions in this case, including the one or two added to those offered and refused in the Rodriguez Case, were covered by the charge of the court.

For the foregoing reasons, and upon the authority of the case of People v. Rodriguez (Cr. No. 652) 214 Pac. 452, the judgment and the order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. RODRIGUEZ. (Cr. 653.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 23, 1923.)

Criminal law 🔑1134(2)—No examination of record necessary where case submitted upon briefs in other cases.

A case having been submitted upon the briefs in other cases, the appellate court is not required to examine the record for the purpose of determining whether the points made in the other cases, when applied to the case in question, have sufficient legal force to warrant a judgment returning the case for retrial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; George L. Jones, Judge.

Vincent Alvarez Rodriguez was convicted of conspiracy to commit burglary, and appeals. Affirmed.

W. E. Wright, of Nevada City, and Russell P. Tyler, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant, Segundio Rodriguez C. Silbelo and Albert Greenwald were charged with the crime of having conspired and confederated together for the purpose of feloniously and burglariously entering the office of the North Star Mines Company to commit the crime of grand larceny. Each of the alleged conspirators, with the exception of Greenwald, who was a mere feigned accomplice, and not tried at all, was given a separate trial. Opinions affirming the judgment and the orders in the cases of Segundio Rodriguez (Crim. No. 652) 214 Pac. 452, and C. Silbelo (Crim. No. 651) 214 Pac. 462, have this day been filed.

Counsel for the defendant here have submitted his case upon the briefs on file in the former cases. From this we assume that the points made for a reversal here are the same as those upon which reversals in the other cases were urged. At all events, the case here, having been submitted upon the briefs in the other cases, we are not required to examine the record herein for the purpose of determining whether the points made in the other cases, when applied to this, have sufficient legal force to warrant a judgment returning the case for retrial.

One point, however, which was considered in the case of People v. Silbelo may be referred to, and it is this: That the information was amended as indicated in the opinion in the case of People v. Silbelo, and upon the information as so amended the defendant here was tried. In the Silbelo Case it was suggested that the court transcended its authority by allowing the amendment. It was also contended that the information as amended does not conform to the requirements of subdivision 2 of section 950 and subdivisions 2 and 3 of section 952 of the Penal Code. What we have said in the Silbelo Case with regard to the action of the court in allowing the district attorney to amend the information and with regard to the information as amended, of course, has direct application to this case and is decisive of the points so made against the contentions of the defendant.

Upon the authority of the cases of People v. Rodriguez and People v. Silbelo, supra, the judgment and the order herein are affirmed.

FATE v. GROSS et al. (Civ. 4409.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 27, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Judgment affirmed if there is substantial evidence to support findings.

Where the sufficiency of the evidence is the only question presented on appeal, the judgment must be affirmed if there is substantial evidence in the record to support the findings.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑705(4)—Automobile driver held negligent in turning automobile so as to proceed in opposite direction without compliance with statutes.

Automobile driver who collided with motorcycle which had been following his automobile, in attempting, while in a public street, to turn the automobile around so as to proceed in the opposite direction, without compliance with Motor Vehicle Act, § 20, subd. "q," making it unlawful to turn an automobile around so as to proceed in the opposite direction in a business district, except at an intersection on the public highway, and subdivision "h," providing that, before turning, stopping, or changing the course of an automobile, the driver shall ascertain if there is sufficient space for such movement to be made in safety and shall give a signal of his intention to turn, held negligent.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑705(10)—Motorcycle rider traveling behind automobile held not a person in charge of an "overtaking vehicle" within Motor Vehicle Act.

Motorcycle rider who followed an automobile at a lawful rate of speed and maintained a reasonable and lawful distance behind the automobile, but who was injured in a collision with the automobile when automobile driver, after giving a signal indicating his intention of turning to the right to park, suddenly and without warning turned to the left in front of the motorcycle, held not a person "in charge of an overtaking vehicle" within Motor Vehicle Act, § 20, subd. "h," making it the duty of such person to sound audible and suitable signal for passing a vehicle proceeding in the same direction.

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

4. Municipal corporations ⚷706(6)—Failure of motorcycle rider following automobile to signal that it intended to pass automobile held not proximate cause of collision as matter of law.

Where motorcycle rider who was maintaining a reasonable and lawful distance behind an automobile traveling in the same direction, and was traveling at a lawful rate of speed, collided with the automobile when the automobile driver, after giving a signal indicating his intention of turning to the right to park, suddenly and without warning turned to the left directly in front of the motorcycle, any negligence on the part of the motorcycle rider in not sounding a warning that he was about to pass automobile did not, as a matter of law, constitute a proximate cause of the collision.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Action by Lewis A. Fate against H. M. Gross and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John J. Jones, of San Jose, and Barry J. Colding, of San Francisco (Theodore Hale and J. E. Pemberton, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

John W. Sullivan, of San Jose, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The defendant H. M. Gross appeals from a judgment rendered against him in an action brought by the plaintiff, Lewis A. Fate, for damages on account of personal injuries sustained by the latter as a result of a collision between the defendant's automobile and plaintiff's motorcycle. The action against appellant's codefendant H. M. Gross and Todd Protectograph Company, a corporation, was dismissed on a motion for a nonsuit.

[1] The trial was had before the court sitting without a jury, and the court found that the defendant was, and that the plaintiff was not, guilty of negligence. The question of the insufficiency of the evidence is the only one presented on this appeal, and therefore, if there is substantial evidence in the record to support the findings, the judgment must be affirmed.

The collision occurred on North First street, in the city of San Jose, at a point nearly opposite the steps of the courthouse, at the hour of 5:40 on the evening of March 31, 1921. Defendant was traveling in an automobile northerly on the right-hand side of North First street, at a rate of speed of about 10 miles an hour. The plaintiff was riding on a motorcycle, and was traveling behind, but in the same direction with, defendant, at a rate of speed of about 15 miles an hour.

The evidence on the part of plaintiff shows that, when defendant reached a point opposite the St. James Hotel, which was about 75 feet south of the place where the collision occurred, and at which time plaintiff was approximately 30 feet behind defendant's machine, the defendant slackened his speed, changed his course a little to the right, and gave a hand signal indicating his intention to park his machine at the curb. He moved toward the curb until within 3 or 4 feet of it, and then, without giving any other or additional warning or signal, he turned his machine sharply to the left, following the line of a circle, evidently intending to turn around at that point in the street. By doing so he collided with the plaintiff, throwing the latter to the pavement and fracturing both bones of the right leg between the knee and the ankle.

[2] We are satisfied that the evidence above narrated is sufficient in law to sustain the finding of the trial court that the defendant was negligent. The Motor Vehicle Act of California provides that no vehicle except those operated by the police or fire departments shall, in a business district or closely built up territory, be turned so as to proceed in the opposite direction except at an intersection of the public highway. Subdivision "q," § 20, Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1919, p. 215). It is also provided that, before turning, stopping, or changing the course, the person in charge of a vehicle shall first see that there is sufficient space for such movement to be made in safety, and, if the movement or operation of other vehicles may reasonably be affected by such turning, stopping, or changing of course, shall give plain, visible signal of his intention so to turn, stop, or change his course, etc. Subdivision "h," § 20, Motor Vehicle Act. All of these plain provisions of the statute were violated by the defendant.

The main contention of appellant is that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence because it is admitted by plaintiff that he did not at any time give a warning or signal of his approach. In support of this contention appellant cites and relies upon subdivision "h" of section 20 of the Motor Vehicle Act, which reads:

> "It shall be the duty of the person operating or in charge of an overtaking vehicle to sound audible and suitable signal before passing a vehicle proceeding in the same direction."

[3, 4] In view of the circumstances disclosed by the record, we are unable to agree with appellant that plaintiff has been brought within the provisions of the section of the law last above quoted. The evidence is to the effect that plaintiff was following defendant's machine up the street, maintaining a reasonable and lawful distance behind it, and was traveling at a lawful rate of speed, when the defendant, after giving a signal indicating his intention of turning to the right to park, suddenly and without warning, turned to the left directly in front of and collided with the plaintiff. Under such circumstances it cannot fairly be held, we think, that plaintiff was "in charge of an overtaking vehicle," or that he attempted to pass defendant's machine. And, even if it be assumed that it was plaintiff's duty under the circumstances to give warning of his approach, we are not prepared to say as a matter of law, in view of the finding of the trial court to the effect that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, that the failure to give such warning contributed proximately to plaintiff's injuries, or that, if such signal had been given, the collision would have been averted. As above stated, the evidence shows that plaintiff kept 30 feet to the rear of defendant's machine until defendant slackened his speed and gave a hand signal indicating his intention to park; that, when defendant reduced his speed and indicated his intention to park, plaintiff's motorcycle was brought within 15 feet of the rear of defendant's machine; and that while plaintiff was in that position the defendant, contrary to the signal he had given, suddenly turned to the left directly in front of plaintiff. The evidence further shows that, when defendant made the sudden turn to the left, plaintiff did everything possible to avoid a collision by turning his motorcycle sharply to the left within the circle made by defendant's machine. Whether or not plaintiff, while in that situation and under those circumstances, could have saved himself or prevented the collision by sounding a warning or giving a signal was a matter for the trial court to decide from all the evidence before it.

In the case of Carlson v. Leonard (Cal. App.) 200 Pac. 40, it is said:

> "It is well settled by recent decisions of the Supreme Court and of this court that the conclusion of the trial judge as to whether a given state of facts does or does not amount to negligence as a mater of law will not be disturbed upon appeal, in the absence of a clear showing of abuse of discretion. Mayne v. San Diego E. R. Co., 179 Cal. 173, 175 Pac. 690; Diamond v. Weyerhauser, 178 Cal. 540, 174 Pac. 38; Scharves v. S. F. O. T. Rys. [30 Cal. App. Dec. 477], 186 Pac. 154; Genta v. Illingsworth [33 Cal. App. Dec. 33] 192 Pac. 1041; Spring v. Tawa [33 Cal. App. Dec. 37] 192 Pac. 1051."

The trial was held in the courthouse opposite the scene of the collision. By the record it is shown that upon cross-examination plaintiff was requested to go to the window of the courtroom and point out certain locations about which he had testified. The trial court was therefore in a position to view, and was doubtless quite familiar with, all of the physical conditions as they existed at the time of the collision, and from those circumstances concluded that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence. In reaching that conclusion we do not find that there was an abuse of discretion.

Judgment affirmed.

Ex parte ADAMS. (Cr. 957.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 2, 1923.)

1. Statutes 🔑114(6)—Title of act adopting Volstead Act held sufficient.

The Wright Act, adopting the Volstead Act as the law of the state, entitled "An act to enforce the provisions of article eighteen of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States; prohibiting all acts or omissions prohibited by the Volstead Act; imposing duties on courts," etc., held a sufficient compliance with Const. art. 4, § 24, as to expressing the subject in the title.

2. Fines 🔑12—Court may order imprisonment in satisfaction of fine.

Though, under Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 29, which by adoption is a part of the state law, the only penalty that can be imposed for a first offense in unlawfully possessing intoxicating liquor is a fine not exceeding $500, nevertheless the court may, under Pen. Code, § 1446, direct that defendant be imprisoned until the fine be satisfied in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for every dollar of the fine.

3. Criminal law 🔑991(2)—Defendant, improperly sentenced to imprisonment, may be lawfully held and again arraigned for judgment.

Though, after conviction for a first offense against the Prohibition Law, defendant has been improperly sentenced to imprisonment, he is not, because such sentence was illegal, entitled to an absolute discharge from custody, but may be lawfully held as prior to the judgment, subject to be again arraigned when the court is competent to act; nor is the situation changed because the void judgment was entered by a police court rather than a court of record.

Application by Charley Adams for a writ of habeas corpus. Prisoner remanded.

Cooper, Collings & Shreve, of Los Angeles, for applicant.

W. D. McConnell, City Prosecutor, J. Friedlander, Asst. City Prosecutor, J. D. Taggart, Deputy City Prosecutor, and S. W. Odell, Associate Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In the police court of the city of Los Angeles a complaint was filed, whereby petitioner was charged with a violation of the act commonly known as the "Wright Act," being chapter 80 of the Laws of 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 79), in that he did willfully and unlawfully have in his possession in the city of Los Angeles certain alcoholic and intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. by volume of alcohol, contrary to the provisions of the Volstead Act (41 Stat. 305). He pleaded guilty, and the judgment provided that he be imprisoned in the city jail of the city of Los Angeles for a term of 180 days. Being held in custody under that judgment, he applied for and obtained a writ of habeas corpus, returnable before this court. Return having been made, showing the facts above stated, the matter is now submitted for decision.

Petitioner claims that the commitment is void because the offense charged against petitioner was a first offense, and under title 2, § 29, of the Volstead Law the only punishment which can be inflicted for the illegal possession of liquor as a first offense is a fine of not more than $500. Petitioner further contends that the Wright Act violates section 24, article 4, of the Constitution of California, which provides that "every act shall embrace but one subject which subject shall be expressed in its title. * * *"

[1] The Wright Act is entitled:

> "An act to enforce the provisions of article eighteen of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States; prohibiting all acts or omissions prohibited by the Volstead Act; imposing duties on courts, prosecuting attorneys, sheriffs and other officers, and extending their jurisdiction; and providing for the disposition of fines and forfeitures."

We think that the first clause of this title is alone sufficient to cover all of the contents of the statute. Moreover, section 5 of the act defines the phrase "Volstead Act," by referring it definitely to title 2 of the act of Congress enacted October 28, 1919. In the Matter of Frank Burke, 212 Pac. 193, the Supreme Court has held that, where there is no constitutional provision which forbids it, it is proper to declare that any law of the United States, or of another state, shall be the law of this state, and that there is no constitutional provision in this state which forbids such action. In that case the Wright Act was sustained as against the contention that the act is void because it purports to enact into the law of this state all of the penal provisions of the Volstead Act.

[2] Under section 29 of the Volstead Act, which by adoption is now a part of the Wright Act, the only penalty that can be imposed for a first offense, such as that of which the petitioner has been convicted, is a fine of not more than $500. There can be no sentence to imprisonment. Nevertheless, in accordance with section 1446 of the Penal Code, the court, in imposing the fine, may direct that the defendant be imprisoned, until the fine be satisfied, in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for every dollar of the fine.

[3] The judgment in this case is void because it imposed a penalty not authorized by law. Counsel for respondent concede that this is true and they ask that the petitioner be remanded for proper sentence. Petitioner objects to this suggestion and insists upon an absolute discharge from custody. He claims that because the police court is a court of limited jurisdiction, it follows that when the petitioner has been illegally sentenced, the police court is now without power to enter any judgment at all. We do not think that, for the purposes of this question relating to the consequences of the rendering of a void judgment, there is any distinction in law between a police court and a court of record. If the judgment was void for the reason that it attempted to impose a kind of punishment for which the law does not provide, then it is void for all purposes, and the prisoner is lawfully held now as he was held prior to the judgment, and subject to be again arraigned for judgment at any time when the court is competent to act. Matter of Smith, 152 Cal. 566, 568, 93 Pac. 191. In the Smith Case the judgment in question was a purported judgment of the superior court, but we think that the proposition stated would have been equally applicable to a judgment of a justice's court or police court.

Prisoner is remanded to custody to await the further action of the justices' court in the pronouncement of a judgment of sentence according to law.

We concur: JAMES, J.; HOUSER, J.

PEOPLE v. SMITH. (Cr. 940.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 5, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 5, 1923.)

1. Homicide 🔑254—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for murder in second degree.

Evidence of threats by accused against deceased, and a quarrel concerning another woman, of whom accused was jealous, which resulted in the killing, held sufficient to sustain a conviction for murder in the second degree.

2. Witnesses 🔑372(2)—Objection to question whether deceased's paramour, of whom accused was jealous, was living with him at the time of the homicide held properly sustained.

In a prosecution for murder growing out of a quarrel between accused and one living with her concerning another woman, of whom accused was jealous, held, that an objection to cross-examination asking such third person while a witness whether at the time of the difficulty she was living with deceased, for the purpose of showing interest, was properly sustained.

3. Criminal law 🔑404(2)—Bullet and piece of flooring held admissible though discovered more than seven months after homicide.

In a prosecution for murder, where there was evidence that five bullets had been fired, only four of which were accounted for, where there was evidence that more than seven months after the shooting police officers had visited the room and discovered a hole in the flooring, beneath which, lying on the plastering below, they found a bullet, comparing in size to the others found in deceased's body, held, that a piece of the flooring containing the bullet hole, and the bullet itself, were admissible in rebuttal, under Pen. Code, § 1105, notwithstanding the remote date of its discovery.

4. Criminal law 🔑1144(15)—Jury assumed to have comprehended and considered entire charge.

It must always be assumed that the jury comprehended and considered the entire charge of the court in passing upon the sufficiency of a particular instruction.

5. Criminal law 🔑822(8)—Instruction concerning continued shooting by accused after deceased had fallen not error.

In a prosecution for murder, an instruction that, if accused fired a shot into deceased's body after he was lying on the floor, and after all necessity for the use of a deadly weapon in self-defense had ceased, she would not be justified, held to correctly state the law when considered with other qualifying terms in the body of the same instruction.

6. Criminal law 🔑823(6)—Instruction concerning evidence that deceased was violent, quarrelsome, and dangerous, held not error.

An instruction that evidence as to the character of deceased as being a violent, quarrelsome, and dangerous man was to be considered only as a circumstance, illustrating the facts of the homicide, and indicating the aggressor and the nature of the aggression, held not error in view of other instructions, though not particularly lucid.

7. Criminal law 🔑730(7)—Conduct of district attorney in illustrating his argument by facts from another case held not prejudicial error.

Conduct of district attorney in using facts taken from another case within his knowledge as illustrative of an argument sought to be impressed on the jury, though not the better practice, held not prejudicial, in view of a plain and pointed instruction that the jurors should be guided solely by evidence introduced at the trial, and by the instructions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Fay Alma Smith was convicted of murder in the second degree, and she appeals. Affirmed.

E. Burton Ceruti, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of murder in the second degree, and has appealed from the judgment of imprisonment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

On the 14th of February, 1922, defendant shot and killed Arthur Bell, using a .38-caliber revolver, from which she fired five shots at close range, all of which entered the body of the deceased. Both defendant and the deceased were of the negro race, defendant being at the time of the shooting 27 years of age and the deceased 31. Defendant had formerly been married to a man named Smith, from whom she claimed to have been divorced. For a large portion of the 6 years immediately preceding the tragedy she had lived with the deceased, although not married to him. During the time that she sustained the relation indicated toward Bell there had been many quarrels between the two, due (according to defendant's assertion) to attentions which Bell bestowed upon other women. It was because of this alleged propensity of Bell that the quarrel was precipitated, which resulted in Bell's death on the date charged in the information.

On the night in question an inmate of the small rooming house which was being conducted by defendant and Bell in the city of Los Angeles heard the couple, as he said, "fussing"; he heard defendant scream, and immediately thereafter heard shots fired. On going to the room occupied by the two, he called out, asking what the trouble was, and defendant replied, "we were fighting in here." The witness entered the room, and saw Bell lying on the floor, with the defendant standing near by, and close to a dresser, upon which a revolver lay. The witness departed in search of a physician. Another witness, who came to the room immediately after the person last mentioned had departed, found the door closed. At his call the door was unlatched by the defendant, who appeared with a revolver in her hand. Bell was lying on the floor, the witness stated, and called for water. The witness testified that the defendant remarked: "He is dressing to go to see that bitch. Let him go now!" Officers and attendants with an ambulance from the city hospital soon arrived. To an inquiry made in the room as to who had done the shooting, defendant replied, "I did." Before the arrival of ambulance and officers, defendant had replaced the five empty shells in the revolver with loaded cartridges. The injured man was conveyed to the hospital, where he died the same night from the effects of his wounds.

A witness who was at a bootblack stand on the street opposite the building in which the defendant and deceased were heard the shots; he testified that the first three shots came in quick succession; that an interval of time then ensued, which the witness stated was of about a minute's duration, and then the last two shots were heard. The time elapsing, according to the witness, between the third and the fourth shots was sufficient to allow him to walk from the bootblack stand two doors south. Another witness, who was also at the bootblack stand, and heard the shots, testified that the first three shots were fired within a space of five seconds; that there was an interval of 12 or 15 seconds between the third and fourth and of 25 or 30 seconds between the fourth and fifth.

Of the five bullets which caused wounds in the deceased's body but four were found, assuming that the bullet which was discovered in the floor in the September following was one of these. The hospital attendants found two of the leaden pellets in the clothing of the deceased when they removed them, and the physician who performed the autopsy found one bullet imbedded under the skin. The wounds showed that all of the bullets had passed completely through the body of the deceased except the one last mentioned. Three of the bullets had entered the front of the body; two at the left side or hip. One of the bullets, which did great damage, entered the abdomen, slightly at the right of the navel, took a downward course of about 45 degrees, and emerged at the back. One of those entering at the left hip took an upward course of an equal number of degrees, also perforating the abdominal section. This one emerged, and was taken from the skin close to the left breast. It would appear from the testimony of the autopsy physician that either of the two wounds which have been referred to as taking a downward and an upward course of 45 degrees necessarily would have resulted fatally, while the others might not have had such a result.

On the next day defendant was interviewed at the police station, where she made a statement covering details of the occurrence which immediately preceded the shooting. She told also of her relations with the deceased, and of the quarrels that had occurred between them. She stated that on the night of the shooting, after she returned, as will later appear, at about 9:30 or 10 o'clock, Bell was there, and remained about the place until after 12 o'clock, when he started to dress himself. She stated that she asked him where he was going at that time of night, and he told her it was none of her business, and that she was "getting too ——— ——— sly, anyway." She then proceeded with the following narrative:

> "I said, 'Because a woman doesn't let a man make a ——— ——— fool out of you she has to be sly.' To show me that I was too sly he made a pass at me, and I ducked it and he hit at me, and I dodged again, and rushed to the dresser and grabbed the gun, and started shooting. We had been quarreling all along in the week before. He had beaten me because I had gotten after him about this girl. So I said I was not going to let him beat me up any more about some one just because I asked him about her. * * * He had on his pants, a little sweater coat; and when we first started to quarreling he had just got through combing his hair, and I think he still had on his house slippers. He had got through combing his hair, and we were quarreling during that time, and then the argument began to get hotter and hotter, and then he struck me while I was standing near the corner of the foot of the bed; so I dodged this blow, and he made another pass, and hit me a glancing blow while I was going towards the dresser; and then I was near enough to pull the drawer open and get the gun out. Then I started to shooting, and just kept shooting, and did not know if I hit him or not. * * * I don't think he fell until after I went out of the room. I ran out into the hall. The drawer was still open where I got the gun out, so I grabbed some more bullets and ran out into the hall, as I didn't know if he was going to run after me or not, and I was going to keep shooting him, because I was afraid of him, as he had fought me time and again. By an Officer: Q. How long have you been living with him? A. Six years. Q. About how many quarrels have you had during that time? A. Really, I do not know just how many. Once in Oxnard we had a big quarrel when he brought this girl, Baby, down, * * * and I caught them together, and gave her a good beating. We have quarreled about different women at different times, but specified times I do not remember. * * * Q. Then he really only struck you once, did he not, last night? A. That was the only chance he got to hit me. He hit at me once, and I dodged one blow, and then grabbed the gun out of the dresser. * * * Q. Well, now, this quarrel you were having was of the same nature as other quarrels you have had previously, was it not? A. Yes, sir. Q. Has he ever cut you or shot at you or anything? A. No; he has hit me with his hands and chairs and things like that."

In this statement made by defendant on the day following the shooting she did not claim that she had been struck, injured, or bruised in any manner by her last encounter with deceased, and there was no evidence to show any bruises appearing upon her body. At the trial, however, she made a statement that Bell had thrown a bottle at her which struck her on the head; that he grabbed her by the throat and shook her, and started to pick up a chair to strike her, when she got away, secured the revolver, and began to shoot. As referring to Bell's position when the different shots were fired, she did not, even at the trial, claim that he remained confronting and threatening her until the shooting ceased. Her testimony given on that point was in part as follows: "Q. Is it not a fact that when those shots were fired that Bell was either in the act of falling over, or was already on the floor?" to which she replied, "I don't remember; * * * I don't remember how I fired. I just pulled the gun, kept shooting." She was asked also the direct question as to whether she did not fire a shot while Bell was lying on the floor, to which she replied that she did not, adding "Not as I remember." Again the question was asked of her, "Will you say you didn't fire a shot while he was almost on the floor, falling over?" to which she replied, "As far as I remember, I don't remember that I did. I just grabbed it and shot, was all."

The woman whose alleged friendship with Bell was the cause of the fatal quarrel was named Jimmie Seigler. She was produced at the trial, and told of a visit made to her on February 5th—12 days before the shooting—by the defendant. She testified that defendant entered her house, and said that Arthur Bell had sent her to tell the witness "not to be sending him any more messages"; that the witness had responded, "I haven't sent any messages," and that the defendant said, "Well, I just want to let you know, if you have you had better stop, because I am Arthur's lawful married wife; if I ever catch you and Arthur together I am going to kill both of you; I am going to put an end to you;" that defendant then "went on and told about different girls she had beat up about him—two or three other girls she beat up about Arthur"; that, when defendant was ready to go, she repeated, "I mean that; if I catch you together that is going to be the end of you; I am going to kill both of you."

Early in the evening on the night of the tragedy defendant requested a male acquaintance to drive her to a railway depot, where she made inquiry as to the time trains would depart for Arizona points. (It afterwards appeared that she had understood that Jimmie Seigler had requested Bell to meet her [Seigler] at the depot before the departure of a train.) When the party returned to a point near the place where defendant and Bell lived, defendant, for the purpose of ascertaining whether Bell was at home, dispatched one of the party with instruction to make inquiry of Bell as to the whereabouts of a woman, which woman in fact was at the time with defendant in the automobile. The defendant then went to a point near the place of residence of Jimmie Seigler, and, placing herself by or behind some billboards, despatched a young man, whose services she had impressed for the purpose, to the house with instruction to tell Jimmie Seigler that Arthur Bell was waiting around the corner to see her. The message was delivered, but had no effect in the direction of inducing the Seigler woman to leave her home, and, after waiting for a little time by the billboard, defendant departed. She finally returned to the lodging house, where she changed her clothes.

Wagner, the young man who had delivered the message to the Seigler home, stated that, after defendant returned to the automobile and the machine had started, she said to him: "I am going home. I don't want to kill him. I am going home and give him a good beating, because I don't want him making no damn fool out of me. I know he is scared of me. That is the reason I am not going to do anything but give him a good beating." Several friends were at the house when defendant returned, and they left at about 12 o'clock.

[1] The point is first urged that the evidence is not sufficient to justify the verdict. From the summary which has been made of the most important of the evidence, introduced mainly on behalf of the prosecution, it must be apparent that a case was presented which warranted the jury in returning the verdict that it did. Defendant admitted freely that she had frequently quarreled with deceased, which quarrels were prompted by her objection to the attentions which he paid to other women; those quarrels all had similar accompaniments, she upbraiding Bell and he (as she testified) striking her or throwing things at her. As illustrating the animus which was aroused in her by reason of Bell's attentions to other women was her own statement of how she had "beaten up" a girl at Oxnard. The testimony of Jimmie Seigler that defendant threatened to kill both her and Bell if she ever found them together showed that the idea of doing violence toward both of those parties was present in defendant's mind before the tragedy. While the revolver with which the shooting was done was the property of Bell, it was usually kept in the top drawer of the dresser in the room where the shooting occurred, and defendant was well acquainted with that fact. It appears by her own statements that defendant had full reason to know that a return to the ever-bitter subject would precipitate a quarrel, as a result of which one or both of the participants might suffer bodily injuries. Knowing all this, and acting outside of the protection of any right growing from a marriage relation, she renewed the dangerous discussion—in effect, deliberately precipitated the quarrel. In making this statement we are allowing the defendant credit for veracity in her assertion that she had been on prior occasions struck and bruised by Bell. Her failure to claim or exhibit any physical injuries at the time of the shooting or on the day following, when she made her statement to the police officers, is significant as evidence indicating that on the night of February 14th she was not violently attacked by Bell. The testimony given by the witnesses who heard the shooting showed that the shots were not fired in a volley, as under the convulsive hand of an hysterical person, wrought up to a pitch of unreasoning excitement or fright, but in a manner indicating some deliberation.

[2] On the cross-examination of the witness Jimmie Seigler, defendant's counsel, referring to a time before the day of the shooting, asked the witness this question: "Were you living with Arthur Bell at that time?" —to which question the district attorney objected on the ground that it was not proper cross-examination, and was an attempt to degrade the witness. Counsel for appellant insisted that it went to the interest of the witness. The court sustained the objection. We think that the objection was properly sustained. It did not fall within the strict limits of proper cross-examination, and, moreover, if admissible as showing interest, it could not well have illustrated any different interest than that which the jury might infer from the relations shown to exist between the two women and Bell from other evidence.

[3] On September 18, 1922, more than seven months after the shooting of Bell occurred, a deputy district attorney and certain police officers visited the room which had been occupied by defendant and deceased, and from which deceased was taken. They made further examination of the premises to discover marks of bullets. On this visit the deputy district attorney and officers found, at the place where the body of Bell was proved to have laid, a bullet hole in the floor, which extended entirely through the boarding, which was about an inch in thickness. A piece of the flooring containing the hole was sawed out, and a detached bullet was found lying on the plastering beneath. This bullet and piece of flooring were introduced in evidence, and the prosecution used the evidence as a basis for the argument that at least one shot was fired by the defendant after Bell had fallen prone upon the floor. Defendant's counsel strenuously objected to the introduction of the evidence, on the ground that the time of the discovery of the hole and bullet was too remote from the date of the shooting, and that it was not sufficiently established that, by some other instrumentality and persons unconnected with the defendant, the hole had been made and the bullet lodged where it was found. In order to establish a foundation for the introduction of this evidence, the district attorney proved by a police officer that, whenever shooting of any kind was reported to have occurred in the city, a record was made of the occurrence by the police department, and that search had been made through that record covering dates at least a year prior to February 14th, and from that on down to the date when the bullet hole and bullet were discovered in September, and that there was no record of any shooting having occurred at that place during that time. There was testimony, also, of the lessee of the building, who had kept and rented the rooms for a considerable portion of the time subsequent to the date of the shooting. This testimony showed that, so far as that witness knew, there had been no discharge of firearms in or about the premises, although she admitted that a particular room had been occupied by one or two tenants who had the exclusive possession of the apartment. The date of the discovery of this bullet hole and bullet was indeed remote from the time of the shooting of Bell, and it is a matter justifying the comment that it is rather remarkable that the officers engaged in that investigation should not have discovered the important evidence at the time that the original investigation was made of the circumstances of the shooting. However, it did appear that at the time the shooting occurred the floor was covered with a carpet, and the hole which the bullet had made in the fabric might have been difficult to discern. The fact, too, as appeared, that no other bullet holes were found in the walls or woodwork of the room, together with the fact that it was proved beyond question that five shots were fired, furnished circumstances which would aid in identifying the bullet found underneath the floor as being one of those of which theretofore no trace had been discovered. There was testimony that the bullet corresponded in size and character to the other bullets found in and about Bell's body. It was, of course, a matter for the jury to consider and determine as to what the position of Bell's body was at the time that shot was fired. It was not error to admit the evidence in rebuttal. Pen. Code, § 1105.

[4, 5] It is complained that certain instructions given by the trial judge did not sufficiently state the law as the defendant was entitled to have it expressed, and that certain instructions offered by the defendant were improperly rejected by the court. The fault with the contentions made as to the alleged errors so complained of is that they do not take into view the entire charge as given by the court, but point to segregated portions thereof which, standing alone and without the qualification furnished by other portions of the instructions, seem to make an insufficient statement of the law. It must be assumed always that the jury comprehended and considered the entire charge of the court. We find upon examination that on the question of the right of self-defense the court's charge was clear and full in its statement of the rights which the defendant possessed, both to defend herself from an attack which threatened her life, or threatened great bodily injury to her, and to use the judgment of a reasonable person situated in like circumstances, and that, when so acting, if she believed herself to be in grave danger, as defined in the instructions, then she might there stand and kill her assailant and be justified, even though it afterwards appeared that, as a matter of fact the danger which for the moment was apprehended by her was not real; all in accordance with principles so well settled as to be fundamental in the law. Counsel's assertion that the court by its instructions imposed upon the defendant the duty to act as a reasonable person would have acted, without the qualification that the jury should consider the situation from the standpoint of the defendant situated as she was shown to have been at the time, is not borne out by the text of the instructions given. The instruction that, if the defendant fired a shot into the body of Bell after he was lying upon the floor, and after all necessity for the use of a deadly weapon in self-defense had ceased, she would not be justified, correctly expressed the law when considered with the other qualifying terms contained in the body of the same instruction.

[6] The instruction that evidence as to the character of the deceased being that of a violent, quarrelsome, and dangerous man was to be considered "only" as a circumstance illustrating "the facts of the homicide, and indicating the aggressor and the nature of the aggression, it being more probable that a man of violent and dangerous character would make an unprovoked and deadly assault than that a quiet and peaceable man would do so," was perhaps not particularly lucid in its terms, but neither was the one which counsel for defendant offered purporting to cover the same ground, with some addition thereto. By the additional matter it was evidently intended that the jury should be advised that a person would be justified in acting with less deliberation and using more vigorous means in defending against an assault committed by a person of known violent character than where such character was not known to be possessed by such person. The additional matter, if clearly expressed, would have correctly stated the law. But, again, when examining the alleged error for the failure to give the instruction last referred to, we are met with the answer that, in other instructions, given at the request of the defendant, the jury was told that the evidence as to the character of the deceased should be considered as a circumstance in determining whether or not by his acts and conduct he gave the defendant reasonable ground to apprehend such danger as to justify her in shooting him, and that if, "in view of previous acts or conduct or state of mind of the assailant, of which the person assaulted is aware, indicate an imminent danger, the assailed is justified in acting with reference thereto."

[7] Again it is complained that the district attorney was guilty of prejudicial misconduct in arguing to the jury that bullets were known to take unusual courses when deflected in their flight. This argument included a statement of alleged facts claimed to have been shown in another case in the same court, the district attorney stating, however, that he was making the statement for the purpose of illustration. Following his objection to this argument, defendant's counsel offered an instruction particularly advising the jury that they must not consider as evidence "any statement of counsel during the trial of this case or the argument thereof as to the personal knowledge, belief, or opinion of the attorney who makes such statement," which the court refused to give. The court did, however, give the plain and pointed instruction that the jurors in making up their minds as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant should be guided solely by the evidence introduced at the trial, and by the instructions as to the law as given by the court. We are not prepared to agree that the district attorney transgressed the limits of a reasonable argument in illustrating his contentions in the way he did. It is no doubt better practice for counsel to refrain from presenting alleged facts of other cases for the purpose of convincing the jury of the logic of the argument. The instruction of the court, advising the jury as to what it might properly consider as a basis for its finding, we must assume was observed, and that remarks of the district attorney were considered for their argumentative weight only, and as by way of illustration.

The record presented here in no wise presents a case wherein the right of a defendant to a fair and impartial trial has been infringed upon. The evidence discloses a situation where a jealous woman became infuriated at what she believed to be the unfaithfulness of her companion, and, with malice and intent to do the very thing she accomplished, made an attack and shot to death the man who she believed had come to prefer another woman to her, and this without believing in the smallest degree that it was necessary to resort to such extreme means to defend herself against a threatened attack.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

WORK v. WHITTINGTON et al. (Civ. 3789.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 8, 1923.)

1. New trial ⟾163(2)—Grant for insufficiency of evidence to "warrant" verdict held equivalent to insufficiency to "sustain" it.

Where motion for new trial was made on all statutory grounds, and the court's minutes stated it was granted for insufficiency of the evidence to "warrant" the verdict, it was equivalent to specifying the insufficiency of the evidence to "sustain" it, within Code Civ. Proc. § 657.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Sustain; Warrant.]

2. Appeal and error ⟾979(2)—If evidence conflicting, action of trial court in granting new trial not reviewable.

Where there is an appreciable conflict in the evidence, the action of the trial court in granting a new trial is not open to review, the ruling being a matter largely within its discretion, and it is only when that discretion has been abused that the order will be reviewed.

3. Appeal and error ⟾1015(3)—Question of probative force of evidence is for trial court.

The question as to the probative force or evidentiary value of testimony is one the determination of which is with the trial court in a proceeding on motion for new trial, where one of the grounds therefor is the insufficiency of evidence to justify the verdict.

4. Appeal and error ⟾933(4)—Assumed that court, in granting new trial, was satisfied verdict was against evidence.

A motion for new trial for insufficiency of evidence to support the verdict being addressed to the sound discretion of the court, it must be assumed on appeal that, in granting it, the court was satisfied that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by George E. Work against W. Whittington and another. From an order granting a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. P. Thompson, of Fresno, for appellants.
Power & McFadzean, of Visalia, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an appeal from an order granting plaintiff a new trial in an action tried by a jury. Plaintiff, the holder of two promissory notes executed by defendants as the makers and indorsed by the payee, brought the action to recover on the notes. He claimed that they had been indorsed and delivered to him before maturity, in due course, and without notice to him of any infirmity in them, and that he paid full value therefor. Wherefore he claimed that he was entitled to recover, regardless of any fraud which the payee may have practiced upon these defendants.

[1] Plaintiff's motion for a new trial was made upon all of the statutory grounds. The court's minutes state that it was granted on the ground of the "insufficiency of the evidence to warrant the verdict." This, we think, is equivalent to specifying, as the ground of the order, the insufficiency of the evidence to "sustain" the verdict, within the purview of the concluding provision of section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[2, 3] If there is any appreciable conflict in the evidence, the action of the trial court in granting a new trial is not open to review here. The granting or refusing of a new trial is a matter largely within the discretion of the trial court, and it is only when that discretion has been abused that the appellate court will reverse the order. Merralls v. Southern Pacific Co., 182 Cal. 19, 22, 186 Pac. 778. Even in cases where there may not appear to be a conflict in the evidence, and where all the proofs seem to be favorable to one or the other of the parties litigant, the question as to the probative force or the evidentiary value of the testimony is one the determination of which is with the trial court in a proceeding on a motion for new trial, where, as here, one of the grounds is the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. Otten v. Spreckels, 24 Cal. App. 251, 257, 141 Pac. 224.

[4] We can perceive no ground for the contention that the trial court abused its discretion in granting a new trial. The motion was addressed to the sound discretion of that court, and we must assume that in granting it the court was satisfied that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence. Shilling v. Dodge, 22 Cal. App. 517, 135 Pac. 299.

The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PRIBNOW. (Cr. 1071.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 5, 1923.)

1. Rape 🔑54(3)—Conviction held not erroneous as based on prosecutrix' uncorroborated and inherently improbable testimony.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, where defendant made no attempt to disprove prosecutrix' charges, but admitted that her story was essentially true, and there was other testimony that he and she occupied the same room together, his conviction held not erroneous as based on uncorroborated and inherently improbable testimony by prosecutrix.

2. Rape 🔑52(3)—Absence of evidence of resistance or complaint by prosecutrix held not ground for reversal.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, where the evidence showed that defendant's relations with prosecutrix, which he admitted, began when she was a child of tender years and continued until he was arrested, and that he had complete control over her as his adopted child, a conviction held not erroneous because of the absence of evidence of resistance or complaint by prosecutrix.

3. Criminal law 🔑785(16)—Instruction precluding rejection of entire testimony of witness swearing falsely to one matter if he swore to truth in other particulars held not erroneous.

An instruction permitting rejection of all the testimony of a witness willfully swearing falsely to a material point, unless he swore to the truth in other particulars, held not erroneous as weakening and destroying a former portion of the same instruction to which no such proviso was appended.

4. Criminal law 🔑1172(2)—Instruction precluding rejection of entire testimony of witness swearing falsely to material point held not ground for reversal.

In the absence of anything in the record indicating that the testimony of any witness was subject to distrust, an instruction that the jury might reject all the testimony of a witness swearing falsely to a material point, unless convinced that he swore to the truth in other particulars, held not ground for reversal.

5. Criminal law 🔑1172(6)—Instruction defining rape by force or violence not prejudicial to defendant, where prosecutrix testified as to absence of force.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, where prosecutrix testified that there was no force and that she voluntarily submitted, defendant was not prejudiced by an instruction defining rape by force or violence.

6. Criminal law 🔑763, 764(1)—Instruction that whether "child" raped consents or resists is immaterial held not erroneous as instruction that prosecutrix was under age limit.

An instruction on statutory rape, "that whether such child consents or resists is wholly immaterial," held not erroneous as practically instructing the jury that prosecutrix was under the age limit, being general and not referring to prosecutrix or any other witness.

7. Criminal law 🔑759(1)—Instruction as to evidence of like crimes held not erroneous as leading jury to infer commission thereof after filing of information.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, where there was no evidence of other acts of intercourse between the parties after the time charged, an instruction that the jury might consider evidence of other acts before and after such time, to prove defendant's adulterous disposition, held not erroneous as leading the jury to infer other acts occurring after the information was filed.

8. Criminal law 🔑1169(11)—Evidence of like offenses at other places held not prejudicial as too remote.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, where the evidence showed and defendant admitted adulterous relations with prosecutrix for a long time, evidence of intercourse between them at other places than that charged held not prejudicial as too remote.

9. Criminal law 🔑1169(5)—Admission of prosecutrix' written statement as to other acts of intercourse with defendant and birth of child held not prejudicial.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, where the jury were instructed that evidence of other acts of intercourse between the parties before and after that charged was admitted solely to prove defendant's adulterous disposition and as tending to render it more probable that the act charged was committed, admission of prosecutrix' written statement as to other acts of intercourse with defendant and the birth of a child held not prejudicial.

10. Criminal law 🔑815(5)—Instruction that defendant's adoption of prosecutrix was immaterial held not erroneous.

In a statutory rape prosecution, an instruction that the fact that defendant had adopted prosecutrix had no bearing on the case held not erroneous as precluding consideration of a relationship negativing the probability of prosecutrix' story.

11. Rape 🔑41—Confirmation certificate stating date of prosecutrix' birth held admissible.

In a prosecution for statutory rape on defendant's adopted daughter, a confirmation certificate, certifying to the date of prosecutrix' birth on information given by defendant, who was present when she was confirmed, held admissible as tending to show that he knew her age when the offense was committed.

12. Criminal law 🔑1169(1)—Admission of photograph indicating prosecutrix' age when taken held not prejudicial.

In a statutory rape prosecution, admission of a photograph, which prosecutrix testified was taken in a certain year and shown to her by defendant on a certain occasion, when they discussed her age as indicated by a writing on the back, to which he called her attention, held not prejudicial, being merely a circumstance which might aid the jury in determining her age.

13. Criminal law 🔑421(3)—Prosecutrix' testimony as to age admissible.

Prosecutrix' testimony as to her age is admissible, though her knowledge thereof is derived from her parents' statements or family repute.

14. Rape 🔑41—Jury may consider prosecutrix' appearance as indicating age.

The jury may consider prosecutrix' appearance as indicating her age.

15. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—No reversal except for miscarriage of justice.

A conviction may be reversed only where there was a miscarriage of justice.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Harold Louderback, Judge.

William Pribnow was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Ernest B. D. Spagnoli, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. The appellant was convicted of the crime of statutory rape. This is an appeal from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The facts as revealed by the record show that the prosecutrix, Irene Pribnow, a female person, was adopted by the defendant and his wife in the state of Missouri when she was about 5 years of age. About 4 years thereafter defendant persuaded her to have sexual relations with him, and this course of conduct continued between the parties at different times and places up to the 29th day of March, 1922, the time of the commission of the act here complained of, and when the prosecutrix had reached the age of 16 years. At the time she caused the arrest of the defendant a written statement was made by her of her relations with him. This statement contained the facts as above narrated, and also the further fact that the conduct of the parties resulted in the birth of a child, which was adopted by a family in Oregon.

Defendant did not take the stand in his own behalf, nor did he call any witnesses to disprove the testimony of the prosecutrix, which was to the same effect as her previous written statement. On the contrary, there is evidence in the record to show that when this statement was read to the defendant shortly after his arrest he admitted that its contents were in all essentials correct, except that he was of the opinion that the prosecutrix was not quite as young as 9 years when their illicit relations commenced. Defendant here seeks a reversal of the judgment, and assigns numerous grounds therefor.

[1] It is first claimed that the story of the Pribnow girl is uncorroborated and inherently improbable. A complete answer to this contention is that the defendant made no attempt in any manner to disprove the charges, but, on the contrary, admitted that the story was in all essential particulars true. There is also testimony in the record to the effect that the defendant and the prosecutrix occupied the same room together. The conviction was not had, therefore, upon the sole uncorroborated testimony of the prosecutrix.

[2] Complaint is also made of the absence of evidence of resistance on the part of the prosecutrix or complaint by her. There is no merit in this contention. A reading of the record shows that the relations of the parties began when the prosecutrix was a child of tender years, and continued up to the very time of the defendant's arrest, and that he had complete control and dominion over the child. The absence of reasonable complaint on the part of one in the situation of the prosecutrix might ordinarily be highly significant; but this question was one for the jury to consider under all the facts of the case, including the evidence and defendant's admission of his acts.

[3, 4] Exception is also taken to certain portions of the charge to the jury. In the first instruction complained of, the court advised that body that, where a witness is false in one part of his testimony he is to be distrusted in others, and that it might reject the whole testimony of a witness who had willfully sworn falsely to a material point, and that, if it found that such testimony was given with the willful design to deceive, it should be viewed with distrust and suspicion, and that the jury might "reject all unless they shall be convinced, notwithstanding the base character of the witness, that he or she has, in other particulars, sworn to the truth." It is claimed that the giving of the latter part of the instruction indicated by the quotation marks constituted error, for the reason that it weakened and destroyed the former portion of the instruction.

We see no error in the instruction, and we are of the opinion that it fairly states the law. The jury was in effect told that it had the power to entirely disregard the testimony of any witness found to be false in any material respect, but that it was not bound to do so. Aside from this there is nothing in the record to indicate that the testimony of any witness was subject to distrust.

[5] The next alleged error in the instructions is based upon the fact that the court in its charge defined the crime of rape when accompanied with force or violence; and it is claimed that the giving of this instruction under the circumstances of the case was error, as the jury might have inferred that force or violence was used. We fail to see how defendant was in any way prejudiced by this instruction. There was no evidence of any force having been used; on the contrary, the witness testified that there was none, and that she voluntarily submitted to the act complained of. There is no merit therefore in this contention.

[6] In instructing the jury upon the crime of statutory rape, the court concluded as follows: "Therefore, whether such child consents or resists is wholly immaterial." It is contended that this instruction is erroneous, for the reason, first, that the prosecutrix was not proven to be under the age of 18 beyond a reasonable doubt, and that, in referring to her as a "child," the court practically instructed the jury that she was under the age limit; second, as there was no evidence of resistance, the prosecution not being based upon rape by force and violence, the instructions might be construed as assuming resistance.

We have already considered the latter objection. As to the first, it is sufficient to say that the court was merely referring to the rule of law generally concerning females under the age limit. The instruction was general and did not refer to the prosecutrix or any other witness in the case. This objection is therefore also without merit.

[7] The court further instructed the jury that it might consider evidence of other acts of sexual intercourse between the parties both before and after the time charged to prove the adulterous disposition of the defendant. It is conceded that evidence of such acts as were committed at the place where the crime was charged prior to the filing of the indictment was properly received; but it is contended that, as there was no evidence of acts committed subsequent to that time, the jury might infer that there were other acts that occurred after the filing of the information. What we have already said with reference to some of the other instructions applies with equal force to this one. The instruction is general and could in no manner have deceived the jury, as there was no evidence of the commission of subsequent crimes.

[8] In this connection it is further contended that evidence of sexual intercourse between the parties at other places should have been excluded as being too remote. We fail to see how defendant was prejudiced thereby. The evidence showed the course of conduct and adulterous relations between the parties for a long period of time, a matter which the defendant admitted.

[9] Complaint is also made of the admission in evidence of a statement in writing made by the prosecutrix and above referred to, for the reason that it contained evidence of other and independent crimes and acts of sexual intercourse, and also prejudicial evidence to defendant's case consisting of references to the birth of the child, and other evidence not in any way connected with the crime here charged. The court fully instructed the jury that other acts of sexual intercourse between the defendant and the prosecutrix, both before and after the time charged in the information, were admitted for the sole purpose of proving the adulterous disposition of the defendant and as having a tendency to render it more probable that the act charged was committed, and for no other purpose. The birth of a child, growing out of the relations of the parties, could only have happened as the result of such former acts. Under these circumstances we cannot say that the admission of the statement affected the substantial rights of the defendant.

[10] At the conclusion of the charge to the jury, one of its members asked the court if it might take into consideration the fact that defendant had adopted the prosecutrix. The jury was informed that this fact did not add to or detract from the offense charged and had no bearing upon the case. Appellant assigns the remarks of the court as error, claiming that the jury had a right to consider the circumstances, as the relationship between the parties would negative the probability of the story told by the prosecutrix. It is manifest that the juror had in mind his right to determine whether or not the defendant had committed the crime of incest. The jury was only instructed that the relationship between the parties was not an issue in the case. The probability or improbability of the defendant having committed the crime charged was in no manner affected by the colloquy between the court and the juror. There is, therefore, no merit in this contention.

[11-14] And finally it is claimed that it was not shown beyond a reasonable doubt that the prosecutrix was under the age of 18 years at the time of the commission of the offense charged. The confirmation certificate showing the date of the birth of the prosecutrix was admitted in evidence; and appellant assigns such admission as error. This certificate was issued by a pastor of the Lutheran church at Portland, Or. It is not written in the English language, but it is perfectly apparent therefrom that it certifies to the fact that Irene Pribnow was born September 16, 1905, and confirmed April 13, 1919. The prosecutrix testified that, at the time she was confirmed, defendant was present, and gave the pastor the information concerning the date of her birth. This evidence therefore simply tended to show that defendant knew her age at the time of the commission of the offense charged. In this connection the appellant also objects to the admission in evidence of a certain photograph claimed by the prosecutrix to have been taken in the year 1910. She testified in reference thereto that the defendant had shown the photograph to her on a certain occasion, at which time they had discussed her age. She further testified that he had called her attention to certain writing on the back thereof indicating her age, and told her that such writing had been made by her mother. We fail to see how this evidence prejudiced defendant's rights. It was but a circumstance from which the jury might derive some assistance in determining the age of the prosecutrix. Again, upon this subject, we are of the opinion that her age was fully established by her direct testimony. The testimony of a prosecutrix as to this fact is admissible, although her knowledge of it is derived from the statements of her parents or by family repute. People v. Ratz, 115 Cal. 132, 46 Pac. 915. Moreover, the jury was entitled to consider the appearance of the prosecuting witness as indicating her age. People v. Koosistra (Cal. App.) 208 Pac. 316.

[15] We do not deem further discussion of the case necessary, but will only add that, from a full examination of the record, including the evidence, we are satisfied that, although the court's rulings and instructions may not be entirely free of technical error, the trial did not result in a miscarriage of justice, in which event only may this court reverse the judgment.

MILLER et al. v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. (Civ. 4088.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 14, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑110—Order denying new trial not appealable.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 963, an order denying a motion for a new trial is no longer appealable.

2. Appeal and error 🔑870(6)—Point raised on motion for new trial may be considered on appeal, although order denying new trial not appealable.

While an order denying a new trial is not appealable, a point raised on the motion for new trial is not lost to appellant and may be considered on appeal from the judgment.

3. New trial 🔑108(4)—Error in measurements held insufficient to show that result would have been changed on another trial.

In an action for death of plaintiff's decedent through being struck by defendant's electric train, where it was made to appear on motion for new trial that the exact distance between the nearest rail and the curb was slightly less than six feet shorter than the distance which had been agreed upon as correct at the time of trial, such fact was not sufficient to show that, if the error had not occurred, a verdict might have been rendered for plaintiff.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1056(1)—Exclusion of evidence as to signals not prejudicial error.

In action for death of plaintiff's decedent killed by defendant's electric train while riding in an automobile as a guest, exclusion of evidence as to which was louder a bell or a whistle, and whether it was just as easy to sound the whistle as to sound the bell, held not prejudicial error.

5. Trial 🔑296(4, 5)—Instructions held not erroneous as to proximate cause where such subject completely covered in other instructions given.

In an action for death of plaintiff's decedent through being struck by defendant's electric train while riding as a guest in an automobile, instructions as to contributory negligence were not erroneous as omitting the requirement that the negligence must have proximately contributed to the accident, where other instructions completely covered the subject of proximate cause.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Nina Bell Miller and another against the Pacific Electric Railway Company to recover damages for death. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Edwin S. Earhart and Robt. J. Adcock, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, and W. R. Millar, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. In this action plaintiffs charge that on July 29, 1921, Wiliam Lee Miler was killed by a Pacific Electric train at the intersection of Eighth street and American avenue in the city of Long Beach while he was riding in an automobile as a guest of his father-in-law. At the commencement of the trial a map of the locality where the accident occurred was offered and received in evidence as Defendant's Exhibit 1, and all parties to the action stipulated that the map was a correct representation of the intersection of Eighth street and American avenue and immediate vicinity, and that the measurements thereon were correct. The map shows that American avenue from east to west curb lines is approximately 96 feet, and that the double-track railroad of the defendant occupies approximately 20 feet in the center of the avenue, leaving two roadways, one on either side of the tracks, approximately 38 feet wide from curb to rail. The evidence showed that a five-car train of the defendant was proceeding southerly along American avenue, and that the automobile in which deceased was riding was proceeding westerly on Eighth street, which is 50 feet wide from curb to curb. The last stop made by the train prior to the accident was at Tenth street, and under the skip-stop arrangement in force at that time the next regular stop of the train was at Seventh street.

The jury returned a verdict in favor of defendant, and from a judgment in its favor the plaintiffs appeal. On the motion for a new trial it was shown by affidavits and admitted by counsel for defendant in open court that the true distance from the curb line to the first track was only 32.39 feet, a discrepancy of not quite 6 feet.

During the closing argument of the case the learned trial judge interrupted counsel, and, after some discussion, the court gave to the jury an instruction which closes as follows:

> "So that so far as Mr. Bell [the driver] himself is concerned, without reference to the deceased, he was guilty of such negligence that if he was suing he could not recover."

Whereupon Mr. Earhart, one of the attorneys for plaintiffs, said:

> "That is exactly in the line of my remarks, that absolutely irrespective of the degree of negligence, gross or slight, of Mr. Bell, it does not affect the deceased. He was an invited party."

Later the court instructed the jury as follows:

> "But, under the circumstances of this case, I instruct you that the driver of the machine was guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to the injury."

[1, 2] Following a verdict in favor of defendant, plaintiffs made a motion for new trial, which motion was by the court denied. Within her notice of appeal appellant has included the denial of her motion for a new trial, but, following the provisions of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure and a long line of decisions thereunder, the appeal from the order denying the motion for new trial must be dismissed, as such an order is no longer appealable. The point, however, raised on the motion for new trial is not lost to appellant, as it may be considered on the appeal from the judgment. The point relied upon arose out of the discovery, after the trial, of the fact that, instead of the distance from the east curb of American avenue to the most easterly rail of the car tracks being 38 feet, as shown on the map which was stipulated on the trial to be correct, the actual distance was 32.39 feet, or a difference of a little more than 5½ feet. It is contended that this difference became vital and important in view of an instruction given by the court, which closes as follows:

> "And if you further find that such negligence of deceased (going on the track without using ordinary care) contributed in any manner or in the slightest degree to the happening of the accident, plaintiffs cannot recover."

Appellant argues that every inch of space traversed and every second of time used in doing so would be added to the time and opportunity which the deceased would have had of observing the approaching train. Assuming that the automobile was being driven at from 8 to 10 miles an hour, as testified by the driver thereof, at the rate of even 8 miles per hour it would require less than one-half second for it to traverse the distance of 5½ feet; and it is contended that in that space of time the deceased might have said or done something which would have caused the jury to have rendered its verdict in favor of plaintiffs. But it must be remembered that before plaintiffs would be entitled to a verdict in their favor the jury must not only have found no contributory negligence on the part of deceased, but that the jury must also have found the defendant guilty of negligence. The jury very well may have concluded on the evidence that the defendant was free from negligence; hence it would be immaterial whether deceased was or was not guilty of negligence. In a matter of this nature it is necessary that the aggrieved party show, among other things, that the situation in which he finds himself arose through no fault or negligence of his own which with ordinary prudence he could have guarded against; furthermore, that had the error not occurred, the verdict would, more probably, have been in his favor. The record is absolutely silent as to either of these conditions, save that in appellant's brief counsel expresses the belief, in effect, that had the deceased actually had the additional less than one-half second of time, which a calculation shows he might have had in the event the distance between the curb line and the first car track had been 38 feet instead of 32 feet, the verdict, in all likelihood, would have been in favor of plaintiffs. Nowhere does it appear that counsel for plaintiffs ever made any effort to ascertain the exact distance either before the date of the trial or during the time the case was in progress.

[3] For all that appears, the testimony showing the actual distance was just as available before the date of the trial as it has ever been since that time. The showing, lacking at least in the foregoing particulars, was insufficient.

Plaintiffs assign error because of the fact that on the trial of the case plaintiffs attempted to show that the electric train was equipped with a gong and an air whistle, and that the sounding of the air whistle was a more effective method of attracting the attention of persons in peril who were about to cross the tracks, and that the court prevented them from so doing. The following excerpt from the reporter's transcript will show what took place at that time:

> "Q. From your experience, Mr. Hotzell, as a motorman, which is the louder, a bell or a whistle?
> "The Court: Doesn't the law allow either?
> "Mr. Earhart: Yes, sir.
> "The Court: Then I don't think it makes any difference.

"Mr. Earhart: The point I am making is lateron to develop that he had means at his command to have protected this dead man and didn't use it. * * *

"Mr. Earhart: Q. Mr. Hotzell, it is just as easy to sound the whistle as it would be to sound the bell?

"Mr. Millar: That is objected to as immaterial.

"The Court: Objection sustained."

[4] It appears in evidence that the car was equipped with both a gong and a whistle, but that, if not by ordinance of the city of Long Beach, at least by rule of the defendant company, motormen were forbidden to use the whistle at the place where the accident occurred. Beginning at a point two blocks from the scene of the accident and continuing thereto, defendant's motorman rang the gong practically all the time that the street car was running that distance. That fact concerns plaintiffs to the extent of it being established: First, whether deceased was in the exercise of ordinary care in not hearing the ringing of the gong; and, secondly, whether the defendant was using ordinary care in ringing the gong instead of blowing the whistle. Ordinary human observation would indicate that, if the deceased could not, at the distance the evidence showed he was from the electric train, hear the gong, he could not hear, or would not have heard, a whistle. Neither the question of whether a whistle would make more noise than a bell, nor the question of whether it was "just as easy to sound the whistle as it would be to sound the bell," was the ultimate fact for the jury to determine. The jury was only called upon to decide whether in the circumstances the defendant used ordinary care. The evidence showed that the defendant might have used either the bell or the whistle, or possibly both the gong and the whistle, and the entire matter was one for the jury to determine under instructions given to the jury which amply covered the defendant's duty in the premises. The failure of the court to admit the evidence was not such an error as prejudicially affected the plaintiffs' substantial rights or caused a miscarriage of justice.

Appellant also complains of two instructions given by the court to the jury. In the first one, after defining the duty of deceased to use ordinary care on going on defendant's tracks, and after stating that with the use of ordinary care the deceased should have known of the approach of the train, the instruction concludes:

> "And if you further find that such negligence [of deceased] contributed in any manner or in the slightest degree to the happening of the accident, plaintiffs cannot recover."

The second instruction was as follows:

> "The speed limit under the ordinance of Long Beach was 20 miles per hour, and a violation of the speed ordinance would be negligence of itself, and if that speed law was violated, and that was a contributing cause of the accident, and if the deceased was not guilty of any negligence, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover."

It is pointed out that in each of these instructions there is an omission of the qualification that, in order that any negligence on the part of deceased should preclude recovery by plaintiffs, such negligence must have proximately contributed to the happening of the accident; in other words, the instruction covers any sort of negligence on the part of deceased, whether or not it contributed directly to the event. It is, of course, a well-known rule that the several instructions, while possibly given separately, cannot be so considered, but that they must be considered as a whole; and if in this case the point made by plaintiffs was covered by other instructions given by the court, then, because the alleged erroneous instructions did not contain the proper qualification with reference to "proximate cause," plaintiffs were not injured by such failure. Looking, then, to the entire body of instructions herein, it will be found that in no less than ten different places is the jury, in substance, informed that, unless negligence on the part of the deceased was the proximate cause of the injury, it was of no consequence. Quoting from the instructions, we find such expressions as the following:

> "The defendant has alleged contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The burden is upon the defendant to prove such contributory negligence by a preponderance of the testimony, and also whether that negligence proximately contributed to the injury."
> "On the other hand, the burden is on the defendant to prove contributory negligence of the plaintiff and that that negligence, if any, proximately contributed to the injury. Now, if they have not met that burden, or if the evidence is equally balanced on that point, then you could not find that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence."

[5] It is therefore conclusively evident that any omission from the specified instructions of the qualification relating to "proximate cause" was not only fully covered, but was emphasized in other instructions given by the court.

The judgment is affirmed.

BLOOM v. ALLEN et al. (Civ. 4460.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 19, 1923.)

1. Highways 🔑184(3)—Whether striking of plaintiff eight feet from road by an auto stage traveling at high speed negligence held for jury.

Evidence that defendant's stage, traveling at a high rate of speed, crossed a bridge which was both wet and slippery, and on reaching the end of the bridge skidded violently, and struck plaintiff, who was about eight feet from the road, held to make defendant's negligence a question for the jury.

2. Trial 🔑165—Motion admits truth of evidence and inferences therefrom.

A motion for a nonsuit admits the truth of plaintiff's evidence, and every inference which can be legitimately drawn therefrom, and on such a motion the evidence will be interpreted most strongly against defendant.

3. Highways 🔑173(2)—Liable for negligent injuries inflicted on pedestrians.

Carriers are liable for injuries inflicted on pedestrians as a result of the negligent operation of their vehicles.

4. Trial 🔑139(4)—Nonsuit not granted where evidence sufficient to go to jury on any alleged cause of action.

Where there is sufficient evidence to go to the jury on any cause of action set forth in the complaint, a nonsuit will not be granted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by Edwin Bloom, by Charels Matson, his guardian an litem, against William Allen and another, copartners. From a judgment of nonsuit and an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Keith C. Eversole, of Ukiah, for appellant.
M. H. Iversen, of Ukiah, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Appeal from a judgment on nonsuit and from an order denying a motion for a new trial in an action for negligence caused by the alleged unskillful operation of an automobile driven by an employee of defendants, who are copartners doing business under the firm name of Allen & Doxsee, and also under the firm name and style of the Coast Line Freight & Stage Company. The occupation of the firm is that of carrying and transporting passengers for hire between the cities of Ft. Bragg and Point Arena in the county of Mendocino, and between intermediate points to Cazadero in the county of Sonoma.

[1] The evidence shows that on November 23, 1918, one of the stages, as was its custom, tied up at a place called Greenwood for the night. The stage so tied up was sometimes, and as a part of respondent's business, utilized for short runs or special trips to neighboring points. Upon the evening of the day mentioned, and upon which the accident complained of occurred, the stage regularly arrived at Greenwood. Arrangements had been made several nights previously for the transportation of several young men, one of whom was the plaintiff, to Point Arena. A charge of $16 for the trip had been agreed upon between the driver and the group, which was neither demanded nor paid. Pursuant to this arrangement the stage, operated by the regular driver of the company, proceeded on its journey, and when some distance out of Greenwood and at the end of a long bridge a slide was encountered in the road, which completely blocked the traffic, and made passage impossible until such time as it was removed. Being confronted with this situation the driver turned the stage around, concluding to return to Greenwood. It was then suggested to him by some of the party that they would procure shovels and remove the slide. The driver agreed to resume the journey if this result was attained. The obstruction having been removed by the passengers, two of them walked back to Greenwood, and informed the driver of the stage that the road was clear and open. The driver stated that it was too late to make the journey, but he agreed to return to the point where the road had been obstructed, and bring the other passengers back to Greenwood, and accordingly set out in the stage upon this mission, accompanied by the two young men who had walked in. On approaching the point where the slide had occurred it was necessary to cross a bridge of considerable length. The road was muddy, and the bridge was wet and slippery. There is also evidence to show that the stage came down a hill approaching the bridge at a rapid rate of speed, and that it crossed the same in a like manner. As the stage drew near the young men awaiting its arrival had walked out to meet it, and were seated or standing by the bridge railing as it approached them, plaintiff being one of their number. The rate of speed at which the stage was traveling was sufficient to convince the persons waiting that their position on the bridge was dangerous, and they turned back and ran toward the end of the bridge. Plaintiff reached that point and proceeded down an old road some eight feet from the edge of the traveled one. Concluding that he had reached a place of safety, but still running, he turned his head to ascertain the position of the stage. At about this moment the car reached the end of the bridge, at which point the road crossed sharply to the right. It skidded violently, the rear end thereof striking plaintiff on the head, seriously injuring him.

At the conclusion of this evidence defendants moved for a nonsuit upon the grounds, first, that the evidence showed no negligence upon the part of the defendants which contributed in any manner to the accident; second, that the relation of passenger and carrier did not exist in the case; and upon the further ground that contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff caused the injury complained of. Judgment of nonsuit was granted upon the ground that the relation of passenger and carrier did not exist, and that there was no negligence shown. Plaintiff appeals from such judgment.

[2] We are of the opinion that the trial court committed error in granting the motion. The court's power and limitations with reference to the granting of a nonsuit are clear and well-defined. The motion admits the truth of plaintiff's evidence and every inference which can be legitimately drawn therefrom, and upon such motion the evidence should be interpreted most strongly against the defendant. Stieglitz v. Settle, 175 Cal. 131, 165 Pac. 436; Goldstone v. Merchants' Cold Storage Co., 123 Cal. 625, 56 Pac. 776; Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 Pac. 252. Here there is evidence to show that at the time of the accident the car which caused the accident was driven at a high rate of speed down a declivity approaching the bridge, which was both wet and slippery. In addition to direct testimony that it was traveling too fast for safety, and as a circumstance indicating its speed, the car when it attempted to negotiate the turn to the right skidded violently, and a sufficient distance at least to strike the plaintiff, who was some eight feet away from the road. These facts were clearly sufficient to have been submitted to the jury for its determination whether they constituted negligence, and plaintiff as a matter of law was entitled to have the jury pass upon the question.

It is urged by the respondents that the mere fact that the car skidded is not of itself evidence of negligence. Assuming this to be true, as above pointed out, there is other evidence tending to show that the skidding was caused through the negligent operation of the vehicle.

[3] Under what circumstances the relation of passenger and carrier may still exist in the performance of the contract of carriage temporarily suspended due to a washout is a question which has received the attention of the courts. See 4 Corp. Jur. 629; 4 R. C. L. 1043; Killmeyer v. Wheeling Traction Co., 72 W. Va. 148, 77 S. E. 908, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 683. Here, however, whether plaintiff be viewed as a passenger or a pedestrian the result must be the same, for, assuming the evidence above stated to be true, defendants failed not only to use that high degree of care required of them as carriers, but they likewise failed to exercise even that degree of care incumbent upon them toward the public generally. Carriers are liable for injuries inflicted upon pedestrians as the result of the negligent operation of their vehicles. We are not called upon, therefore, to discuss or decide the question whether or not plaintiff was a passenger at the moment of his injury, as this question is only important as fixing the degree of care required of defendants.

[4] As above indicated, a nonsuit is improperly granted if there is sufficient evidence to go to the jury upon any cause of action set forth in the complaint. The complaint in this case shows a cause of action in favor of plaintiff at least as a pedestrian, and the evidence fully supports the same. This being so, it follows that the judgment should be, and it is hereby, reversed.

We concur; RICHARDS, J.; ST. SURE, J.

Sales ⚷3—Contract for transfer of right to purchase sugar held sale of sugar, and not assignment.

ners doing business as Kockos Bros., entered into a contract to purchase 300 tons of Java 24 table sugar for $20 per 100 pounds net c. i. f. San Francisco, Cal., in bond from A. B. Moulder & Co., Limited, of Hongkong, China. The seller's confirmation of the sale, which is set forth in the complaint in hæc verba, requires:

> "Irrevocable letter of credit at 60 day sight, without interest, to be cabled immediately to Hongkong, China. This credit to be established today, May 17, 1920."

The complaint then alleges:

That on the same day plaintiff's assignors, having said confirmed right to purchase said sugar, entered into the following agreement with defendant "to transfer to said defendant their confirmed right to purchase said sugar":

> "San Francisco, U. S. A., May 17, 1920.

> "It is understood and agreed that Barrios & Co. will immediately to-day open letter of credit at 60 days sight covering above merchandise in favor of Moulder & Co. and we will notify Moulder & Co. through Bernhardt Fest & Co. that we have transferred above merchandise to Barrios & Co. and credit will be established by Barrios & Co.
> "Furthermore, in consideration of the transfer of this purchase to you, you will pay us $6,000 United States money on arrival of goods from the Orient with understanding that if we want you to give us bank guaranty you will furnish same without delay.
> "Furthermore, it is understood that if seller will fail to deliver above merchandise Kockos Bros. will not be responsible for any loss you may suffer in this transaction under any consideration.
> "It is furthermore understood that brokerage, if any, will be paid by Barrios & Co.
> "If the above is in order, kindly sign the inclosed copy.
> "Yours respectfully, Kockos Bros.
> "Andrew Kockos.
> "Approved and accepted. Barrios & Co.
> "O. Barrios.
> "Witness: Gilbert A. Ellis."

That Kockos Bros. notified A. B. Moulder & Co. of the transfer to defendant Barrios & Co., and that the latter would immediately establish the letter of credit. That plaintiff's assignors had performed each and every condition on their part to be performed. That defendant "did fail and refuse to open said letter of credit * * * at 60 days sight in favor of A. B. Moulder & Co.," and failed and refused to carry out the terms of his contract. "That by reason thereof there became due and immediately payable to said Harry Kockos and Andrew Kockos, copartners doing business as Kockos Bros., the sum of $6,000." Then follows an allegation of demand for the payment of the sum of $6,000 and defendant's refusal to pay the same, with a prayer for the recovery of this amount. The demurrer is both general and special.

Appellant concedes that the complaint fails to state a cause of action if the contract above set forth between his assignors and respondent was one for the sale of sugar, and not, as claimed by him, merely a transfer by Kockos Bros. of their rights under their agreement with Moulder & Co. That it does not state a cause of action for the recovery of damages for breach of a contract of sale is quite apparent. The damages for breach of a buyer's agreement to accept and pay for personal property, the title to which is not vested in him, are fixed by section 3311 of the Civil Code to be:

> "1. If the property has been resold, * * * the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer, under the contract, over the net proceeds of the resale; or, 2. If the property has not been resold * * * the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer, under the contract, over the value to the seller, together with the excess, if any, of the expenses properly incurred in carrying the property to market, over those which would have been incurred for the carriage thereof, if the buyer had accepted it."

There is no allegation by which damages under this section of the Code could be shown, and, in fact, no allegation whatever that plaintiff was damaged.

On the question of the construction of the contract, appellant argues that the opening recital, "We beg to confirm sale to you of 300 tons—2,000# each Java 24 sugar at $20.00 per hundred pounds," is controlled by the recital, "in consideration of the transfer of this purchase to you, you will pay us $6,000"; also that, if the agreement was intended to be a sale, there would be one recital of a consideration instead of $20 per 100 pounds to A. B. Moulder & Co. and $6,000 to Kockos Bros.; the letter of credit to be opened by respondent would have been payable to Kockos Bros.; no mention would have been made of A. B. Moulder & Co., and they would not have been referred to as the seller; there would have been a direct obligation upon the part of Kockos Bros. to tender delivery of the sugar instead of the covenant releasing them from responsibility in the event of the seller's failure to deliver.

The opening recital must be read in connection with the other provisions of the contract. Standing alone, it quite clearly provides for a sale of sugar at $20 per 100 pounds. But it is apparent from the entire contract that the parties did not understand or intend that Kockos Bros. were contracting to sell the sugar to respondent at that price. The full payment required under respondent's contract was equivalent to 300 tons of sugar at the rate of $21 per 100 pounds; $20 was the price Kockos Bros. were to pay for it. It is obvious that the agreement between Kockos Bros. and respondent was made with reference to the former's agreement with Moulder & Co. covering the identical merchandise; also that it is the Moulder & Co. sale which is embodied in the first paragraph of defendant's agreement. It sets forth a description of these goods, with the price, time of shipment, manner of packing, etc., as contained in their confirmation of sale. The following paragraph states that "this sale" has been confirmed to Kockos Bros. by Moulder & Co. The words "We confirm sale to you" have a well-defined and unambiguous meaning, the same as understood both in their ordinary and popular sense and according to their strict legal sense—a sale is contemplated. They are not the words ordinarily or technically used to express an assignment of a right under an executory contract. So that, unless these words are disregarded as being entirely meaningless here, the only intent which can logically be deduced from them is to confirm a sale to defendant of the goods embraced in the Moulder & Co. contract—a resale. Under the heading "Terms" provision is made for payment of the full amount called for by the contract. First, it provides for the immediate establishment of a letter of credit "covering above merchandise" in favor of Moulder & Co.; second, for the payment of $6,000 to Kockos Bros. on arrival of the goods from the Orient. The amount of the letter of credit required of respondent, as determined from the paragraph describing the merchandise, is based upon the sale price to Kockos Bros. and is similar in all respects to the letter of credit required of Kockos Bros. by their agreement with Moulder & Co. No significance inconsistent with a sale attaches to this fact or to the fact that defendant's letter of credit was made payable to Moulder & Co. instead of Kockos Bros. The seller may have the purchase price, or a portion thereof, made payable to a third person. Pointing towards a sale is the statement: "We will notify Moulder & Co. * * * that we have transferred above merchandise to Barrios & Co." A transfer of merchandise is quite distinct from an assignment or transfer of a right under an executory contract to purchase. The next provision appellant contends is controlling and determines the nature of the contract to be, not a sale, but a transfer of a right. It is: "Furthermore, in consideration of the transfer of this purchase to you, you will pay us $6,000 * * * on arrival of goods from the Orient." Respondent insists this is simply a $6,000 balance of the purchase price. Alone, this provision more nearly indicates an assignment than a sale. It is not in the usual form for either, and is perhaps not sufficient to outweigh the effect of other provisions indicating that a sale was intended. In addition to those mentioned is the provision relieving Kockos Bros. from responsibility for any loss suffered by respondent for failure to deliver. This was entirely superfluous if the instrument was regarded merely as an assignment. As assignor he would not have been liable for the seller's breach in any event. But in the absence of such a provision Kockos Bros. would have been liable for failure to deliver under a contract of sale. The Moulder & Co. agreement excused them from responsibility for delays in delivery beyond their control, and Kockos Bros. were undoubtedly providing against this contingency.

Looking at the instrument as a whole, we think it must be construed as a contract of sale, and that the demurrer was properly sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PRYOR. (Cr. 675.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 27, 1923.)

1. Intoxicating liquors ⟹236(19) — Evidence held to sustain conviction for manufacturing liquor.

Evidence held to sustain conviction for manufacturing intoxicating liquor in violation of an ordinance of the city of Tuolumne.

2. Intoxicating liquors ⟹236(11) — Evidence held to sustain conviction for selling liquor.

Evidence held to sustain conviction for selling intoxicating liquor in violation of an ordinance of the town of Tuolumne.

3. Intoxicating liquors ⟹236(6½)—Evidence held to sustain conviction for having possession of liquor.

Evidence held to sustain conviction for having possession of intoxicating liquor in violation of an ordinance of the town of Tuolumne.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

James Pryor was convicted of manufacturing, selling and having in his possession intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. P. Carey, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Defendant was charged in three separate counts of an information with manufacturing, selling, and having in his possession "certain intoxicating liquor, to wit, brandy, then and there containing one-half of 1 per cent. or more of alcohol by volume," in violation of a certain ordinance of the county of Tuolumne. He was convicted on all the counts, and appeals from the judgment.

[1-3] The only point made is that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict, but there is no merit whatever in the contention.

As to the first count appellant states his position as follows:

> "The first charge, the manufacture of liquor, was placed before the jury on a presumption. There was no evidence that alcoholic liquor had been manufactured. The only evidence adduced to sustain said charge was the finding of a steamer and some spoiled or decayed grain in a bathroom of appellant's house, and a tube that was found by a third party in a spring adjacent to the house."

Herein appellant is in error. William Sweeney, the sheriff of the county, testified that on May 21, 1922, he went to the place occupied by defendant, and in response to the question, "While you were there on this particular occasion did you find any alcoholic liquors or a still or any other evidence of the manufacture of alcoholic liquor?" He replied, "Yes, Mr. Pryor delivered a bottle of liquor to me from his bedroom, and there was a part of a bottle in another part of the house, and a small still in the bathtub, and some material there fermenting in a tub—made from a sawed-off barrel." He further testified that the material in the tub was barley; that it was "fermenting like you find it in all places where liquor is made"; that "from my past experience finding in a number of places liquor fermenting, * * *. I had seen it in a number of places, seen it working, going through the same process" he "took it to be for the manufacture of alcoholic liquor." He further testified that the defendant did not deny the ownership of the "still."

Austin Morales also testified that for a time he stopped at the "Pryor place"; that while there he saw a "still" upon the property; "there was mash in the barrel in the bathroom; there was corn and yeast;" that he saw "a copper boiler and a coil and cooler;" that he took the "still and elbow" at the direction of Mr. Pryor, the defendant, to a certain garage and left it there for two days to get it fixed. "Mr. Pryor sent me back to the gentlemen that owned the garage, and they didn't have it fixed, and he wrapped it up and in a short time he took it to Stockton." The record discloses other circumstances in line with the foregoing, but we have quoted sufficiently to justify the conclusion that defendant was engaged in the manufacture of intoxicating liquor.

There is abundant evidence also to support the other two counts. We shall not segregate it, as the same testimony relates to both.

One Dolly Harris testified that she was acquainted with the defendant; that she was at his place on May 21, 1922; that she "asked Mr. Pryor for a drink; at first he said he wouldn't give me none, and then he told my sister, Edna Keaton (who was working for Mr. Pryor) to bring me a drink"; that she had several drinks, and paid therefor the sum of $3; that the liquor was strong and made her drunk.

Morales, who accompanied her to the place, testified that he saw Dolly Harris go into Mr. Pryor's house; that she was sober when she went in and was under the influence of liquor when she came out; that she had $4.50 when she went in and $1.50 when she came out; that he saw Mr. Pryor "standing in the yard, and I called her to come out, and she didn't come out, and so I went in and asked him to call her, and he called, and she came out; that is, she came stumbling out."

It may be added that two bottles of liquor were delivered by the defendant to the sheriff on said date; that their contents were analyzed by a chemist and found to contain over 50 per cent. of alcohol.

The case is so simple and clear as to demand no further consideration.

We may conclude with the statement that the presiding judge seems to have manifested the utmost concern to protect all the rights of the defendant, and we find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MORIARITY. (Cr. 1076.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 28, 1923.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1149—Permitting withdrawal of plea of guilty discretionary with trial court.

An application to withdraw a plea of guilty and substitute a plea of not guilty is a matter within the trial court's discretion, and its ruling thereon will not be disturbed in the absence of a clear abuse.

2. Criminal law 🔑274—Refusal of withdrawal of plea of guilty held not an abuse of discretion.

Where a defendant had entered two pleas, the second one of them being of guilt, and his application to withdraw it and enter a third did not come until after his hearing on a motion for probation, which it was apparent the court was about to deny, and the evidence pointed conclusively to guilt, there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to permit the plea of guilty to be withdrawn.

3. Criminal law ⚷981(2), 1147—Mere suggestion of insanity does not compel submission of question to jury, and court's action will not be disturbed in absence of abuse of discretion.

The mere suggestion of an accused's insanity, unsupported by affidavit or other evidence raising a doubt as to his sanity, does not compel the court to order a submission of the question to the jury under the provisions of the Penal Code relating to such inquiry after conviction, and the action of the court will not be reversed unless abuse of discretion is shown.

James Moriarity was convicted of lewd and lascivious acts, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Ernest B. D. Spagnoli, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ST. SURE, J. The district attorney filed an information against the defendant charging him with violation of section 288 of the Penal Code. The victim of defendant's lasciviousness was a child nine years of age.

The record contains recitals in substance as follows:

On June 27, 1922, the cause came on to be heard for arraignment; defendant being represented by the public defender. Defendant was arraigned, and the cause continued until June 30th to plead. On June 30th defendant pleaded not guilty, and the cause was continued to July 7th for trial. On July 7th the cause was ready for trial, the defendant with his counsel was present, and on defendant's own motion he was permitted to withdraw his former plea of not guilty, and thereupon pleaded guilty to the charge. He waived time for judgment and was arraigned for judgment. Defendant asked for probation, and the court continued the cause to July 12th, and thereafter to July 14th. On July 14th the cause came on to be heard upon defendant's motion for probation. Witnesses were sworn and examined as to the facts in the case.

At this stage of the proceedings defendant's present counsel, Ernest B. D. Spagnoli, made his initial appearance as counsel for defendant, and in his behalf moved the court that defendant be permitted to withdraw his former plea of guilty. The court denied the motion and also denied probation. Defendant's counsel then suggested to the court that the defendant was insane, and asked that he be tried as to his sanity. The court denied this motion and pronounced its judgment, sentencing defendant to state's prison.

Defendant appeals from the judgment of conviction, from the order denying the motion to withdraw plea of guilty and enter a plea of not guilty to the information, and from the order denying motion for trial as to insanity.

[1] Defendant's first assignment is that "the court erred and abused its discretion in denying defendant's motion to withdraw his plea of guilty and be allowed to enter a plea of not guilty." With this contention we cannot agree. An application to withdraw a plea of guilty and substitute a plea of not guilty is a matter entirely within the discretion of the trial court, and its ruling thereon will not be disturbed in the absence of a clear abuse of discretion. People v. Cosgrove (Cal. App.) 192 Pac. 165.

[2] From the facts in the case before us it appears that there was no abuse of discretion. The record shows that defendant had already entered two pleas, and that his application to withdraw the second and enter a third did not come until after the hearing upon his motion for probation, and when, from the evidence adduced, it was apparent that the court was about to deny the same. There was no showing offered or made as to defendant's innocence; on the contrary, the testimony of witnesses for the people, given in the presence of defendant and his counsel, point conclusively to guilt. People v. Breshi, 44 Cal. App. 307, 186 Pac. 361.

[3] The suggestion to the trial court that defendant was insane, upon which was based a motion for a trial upon this question, which motion was denied by the court, was insufficient to invoke the aid of those provisions of the Penal Code relating to an inquiry into the insanity of the defendant after conviction. The mere suggestion of a person's insanity, unsupported by affidavit or other evidence raising a doubt in the mind of the court as to defendant's sanity, does not compel the court to order the question submitted to a jury. The action of the trial court in the matter will not be reversed unless an abuse of discretion is apparent. People v. Geiger, 116 Cal. 440, 48 Pac. 389; People v. Loomis, 170 Cal. 347, 149 Pac. 581. Here no showing whatever was made to the court. There was no evidence, oral or documentary, introduced on the subject. Evidently there was no doubt in the mind of the court as to the sanity of the defendant; otherwise sentence would not have been imposed. People v. Fountain, 170 Cal. 460, 150 Pac. 341. There was no abuse of discretion.

Defendant, in a supplement to his opening brief, urges two additional points for reversal as follows:

"(1) The defendant did not plead guilty and the judgment is invalid.

"(2) Appellant was not arraigned for judgment pursuant to section 1200 of the Penal Code."

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

The record, which is conclusive upon us, shows that defendant was properly arraigned, and that he pleaded guilty.

The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

In re GURNSEY'S ESTATE.

GURNSEY v. WILTSEY et al.

(Civ. 2566.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 27, 1923.)

1. Wills 🔑384—Judgment dismissing contest unappealed from not assailed on appeal from order refusing to strike cost bill.

Where no appeal was taken from a judgment dismissing a will contest at contestant's costs, on appeal from an order refusing to strike out a cost bill, appellant cannot attack on the judgment dismissing the contest.

2. Wills 🔑402—Superior court authorized to dismiss will contest at contestant's cost.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1312, 1313, relating to will contests, which provides for filing written grounds of opposition to probate and for demurrer and answer to the petition, and that on trial contestant is plaintiff and petitioner is defendant, and for impaneling the jury and conducting trial as trials are conducted under the Code, in a will contest the trial court becomes vested with general authority of courts of record in matters of procedure, and hence, on contestant's motion for dismissal, the court was authorized to enter judgment of dismissal at contestant's cost.

3. Appeal and error 🔑154(4)—One not aggrieved by consent judgment or decree requested.

A party is not aggrieved by a consent judgment or one which he has requested the court to decree.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; J. F. Ellison, Judge.

In the matter of the Estate of Harriet A. Gurnsey, deceased. Proceeding by Mary A. Wiltsey and others to probate deceased's will, wherein John A. Gurnsey entered a contest. Contest dismissed. From an order denying his motion to retax costs and to strike cost bill, contestant appeals. Affirmed.

James T. Matlock, of Red Bluff, for appellant.

W. P. Johnson and McCoy & Gans, all of Red Bluff, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. By filing in the office of the county clerk of Tehama county written grounds of opposition to the probate thereof, John H. Gurnsey on February 27, 1922, initiated a contest of the will of Harriet A. Gurnsey, deceased. On March 8th following respondents filed an answer to said written opposition. On April 3d the contest was set for trial on May 31, 1922, contestant then demanding a jury. The cause came on regularly for trial on said May 31st, and respondents announced themselves ready to proceed. Contestant, however, asked permission to file an amended contest; but this was denied by the court. Whereupon contestant moved for a dismissal of the action, and judgment of dismissal and for costs was rendered as follows:

"John H. Gurnsey having on the 27th day of February, 1922, filed in writing his contest of the will of Harriet A. Gurnsey, deceased, and Phoebe E. Mills, Juliette Sykes, and Mary J. Wiltsey, named in said will as legatees and devisees, having filed their answer to said contest, and the said contest having been set for trial for May 31, 1922, at 10 o'clock a. m. of said day, and said matter coming on for trial at said time, McCoy & Gans and W. P. Johnson, attorneys for Phoebe E. Mills, Juliette Sykes, and Mary J. Wiltsey, announced that they were ready for the trial, and James T. Matlock, attorney for the contestant, asked the court for leave to file an amended contest to said will, which request the court denied, whereupon contestant by his said attorney asked the court to dismiss the contest at contestant's costs. Wherefore, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said contest by John H. Gurnsey of the probate of the will of Harriet A. Gurnsey, deceased, be, and the same is, dismissed, and it is ordered, adjudged, and decree that Phoebe E. Mills, Juliette Sykes, and Mary J. Wiltsey recover from said John H. Gurnsey their costs in the matter of the contest of the said will."

On June 2d following, said respondents filed "memorandum of costs on contest" of said will, the amount being $43.20. On June 6th contestant filed "notice of motion to retax costs," and also for an order "to strike out and eliminate the entire cost bill * * * upon the further ground and for the further reason that said cost bill was not prepared or served or delivered or filed within the time required or allowed by law, or in accordance with law, or within any further time allowed by the court or adjudged thereof, or that said cost bill was prepared or served or delivered or filed before the entry of any judgment in said cause." It was recited in said notice that "said motion will be based upon the law in such cases made and provided, and upon the minutes and records of the court, and upon the papers in said cause, and upon testimony to be produced on said hearing." Said motion was denied on June 26th, and on July 19th contestant gave written notice of an appeal "from an order denying contestant's motion to retax and to strike out the cost bill in said matter, which said order was made and entered in the above-entitled matter on the 26th day of June, 1922, and from each and every part of said order."

No evidence is brought up to show that any item in the cost bill is improper. There is nothing to indicate that the bill was not served and filed in the time required by law. Indeed, the record, if sufficiently authenticated to be considered for the purpose, shows that the proceedings culminating in the order denying said motion were entirely regular.

[1, 2] The attack, though, of appellant is really directed against the judgment of dismissal, which we have hereinbefore set out. His contention is that a contest to revoke the probate of a will is a special proceeding (Estate of Joseph, 118 Cal. 660, 50 Pac. 768); that the dismissal of such contest cannot be had under section 581, Code of Civil Procedure, since that section relates exclusively to "actions," the remedies under our Code being divided into two classes, "1, Actions; 2, Special Proceedings" (section 21, Code Civ. Proc.); that there can be no judgment for costs except as a part of and an incident to the judgment upon the issue in the action, and, "if the court loses power to render a judgment between the parties upon the issues before it, it is equally powerless to render a judgment for the costs incurred therein" (Begbie v. Begbie, 128 Cal. 154, 60 Pac. 667, 49 L. R. A. 141). He summarizes his position as follows:

> "We claim that the judgment so entered was had and done without any authority of law, for the reason that when there was a withdrawal of the contest, or a dismissal thereof, or a failure to proceed further on the part of contestant, the matter was ended, and the court lost power to render any judgment between the parties, and since costs are but an incident to a judgment it is therefore powerless to render a judgment for the costs incurred therein."

There are several answers to this contention. The most obvious is that he has not appealed from said judgment, and he is in no position to complain of it. This judgment cannot be successfully assailed upon an appeal from an order refusing to strike out a cost bill. That would be to permit a collateral attack upon a judgment which is not void upon its face.

But, if we concede that said section 581 does not apply to the case, it does not follow that the trial court was without authority to render the judgment in question. Section 1312, relating to contests of wills, provides for filing written grounds of opposition to the probate thereof, and for a demurrer and answer to said opposition, and prescribes that "on the trial, the contestant is plaintiff and the petitioner is defendant."

Section 1313 provides:

> "When a jury is demanded, the superior court must impanel a jury to try the case, in the manner provided for impaneling trial juries in courts of record, and the trial must be conducted in accordance with the provisions of part two, title eight, chapter four, of this Code. A trial by the court must be conducted as provided in part 2, tit. 8, c. 5, of this Code."

By virtue of these provisions we think it cannot be questioned that the trial court became vested with the general authority that belongs to courts of record in matters of procedure. That it had inherent power to dismiss the action we entertain no doubt.

In Dupuy v. Shear, 29 Cal. 238, it was declared that—

> "The court, having got possession of the case by the commencement of a suit, must have some power to dispose of it, when the plaintiff declines or neglects to proceed."

In Hassey v. South S. F. Homestead, etc., Ass'n, 102 Cal. 611, 36 Pac. 945, it was said:

> "The power of the court to dismiss an action under section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or independently of that section, has been too often exercised and upheld by this court to leave the question an open one."

In People v. Jefferds, 126 Cal. 296, 58 Pac. 704, we find this:

> "Conceding that appellant's reading of section 581 is correct, it does not follow that the power to dismiss an action for lack of prosecution does not reside in the court except upon a showing in conformity with the provisions of that section. It was pointed out in People v. Latham, 53 Cal. 386, that the power to dismiss an action was first exercised by equity courts. For a long period, however, courts of law have exercised the authority as part of their inherent powers; and the same rules now apply to a dismissal at law or equity under code procedure. 6 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Pl. and Pr. 910, and cases cited."

It is also pointed out in Richards v. Bradley, 129 Cal. 670, 62 Pac. 316, that the provisions of section 581 are not "exclusive or mandatory."

In Romero v. Snyder, 167 Cal. 216, 138 Pac. 1002, it is declared:

> "It is settled by numerous decisions in this state that the superior court, without the aid of statutory authority, has power to dismiss an action because of the failure of the plaintiff to prosecute it with reasonable diligence. The doctrine is based upon the theory that courts of general jurisdiction possess this power."

Assuredly, if the court possesses the power when the plaintiff fails to prosecute with reasonable diligence, there is greater reason for its existence and exercise when the plaintiff expressly abandons his cause and requests the court to dismiss the action.

[3] As to the judgment for costs, manifestly, the contestant is in no position to complain, since it was rendered at his instance. A party is not aggrieved by a consent judgment, or one which he has requested the court to decree.

We can conceive of nothing more to justify the court in entering judgment therein for proponents' costs, and the order is affirmed.

WYCKOFF v. FORCE, Superintendent of Schools, et al. (Civ. 4388.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 5, 1923.)

1. Schools and school districts 🔑90—Money to meet debt need not be on hand at time debt incurred under Constitution.

Const. art. 11, § 18, prohibiting a district from incurring an indebtedness exceeding in any year the income and revenue for such year, does not require that the money be on hand at the time the indebtedness is incurred, or that the income should be provided at that time; it being sufficient if the income has been or will be provided within the year.

2. Schools and school districts 🔑90—Evidence held to show district had not exceeded authority in incurring indebtedness.

Evidence that a district at the time of trial had over $20,000 remaining in the school fund, and that the estimated balance at the close of the fiscal year after paying all claims, including $5,000 in warrants, would be $13,000, held sufficient to sustain a finding that the district did not, in contracting an indebtedness of $20,000, exceed its authority under Const. art. 11, § 18, forbidding the incurring of indebtedness exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year.

3. Schools and school districts 🔑90—Contract for architectural services held not within constitutional limitation as to indebtedness.

A contract for architectural services providing that payment is to be made from time to time as the work progresses held not within the inhibition of Const. art. 11, § 18, limiting the amount of indebtedness which the district might incur in a single year, in the absence of any showing that any installment coming due in any year during the life of the contract was in excess of the income and revenue of that year.

4. Mandamus 🔑168(2)—County treasurer alleging warrant payable only from particular fund has burden of proof.

In an action by an architect to compel the county superintendent of schools to approve and the county treasurer to pay an order drawn by the trustees for services rendered, where the county treasurer has separately defended on the ground that the trustees had agreed to make payment only out of a certain bond raised, which fund was already exhausted, he has the burden of proving such allegation.

5. Schools and school districts 🔑82(1)—Trustees may employ architect to be paid out of general fund.

In the absence of a statutory requirement, the trustees of a school district may employ an architect and make his compensation payable out of the general fund.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Suit by Ralph Wyckoff against J. G. Force, as Superintendent of Schools of Monterey County, and others, and James Taylor, as Treasurer of Monterey County. Judgment for plaintiff, and last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. B. Rosendale, of Salinas, for appellant.

C. F. Lacey, of Salinas, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued in mandamus to compel the defendant Force, as county superintendent of schools, to approve, and the defendant Taylor, as county treasurer, to pay, an order for $7,000 drawn by the trustees of the Salinas union high school district in part payment for the services of plaintiff as architect in the construction of a new high school building. The complaint alleged that on May 11, 1920, the board of trustees entered into an agreement by the terms of which the plaintiff furnished to the school district plans and specifications for a school building and agreed to supervise and superintend the construction thereof until completion, and in consideration thereof the school district promised to pay plaintiff the sum of $20,000, "payable in indefinite installments from time to time as said work progressed, until said work was fully completed." It was also alleged that plaintiff entered upon the performance of the work pursuant to the agreement, and that the building has not been completed or accepted by the school district. Allegations followed covering the issuance and presentation of the order, the demand for approval and payment, and the refusal on the part of the defendants.

The essential allegations of the complaint were admitted in the joint answer filed by the two defendants, and a special defense was set up in which it was alleged that prior to September 10, 1919, the school district duly issued bonds in the sum of $250,000 for the construction of said high school building; that said bonds were duly sold and the proceeds thereof were deposited in the county treasury to the credit of the "Salinas union high school district building fund, bond No. 1"; that thereafter additional bonds for the same purpose in the sum of $150,000 were authorized, issued and sold, and the proceeds were deposited in the county treasury and credited to the "Salinas union high school district building fund, bond No. 2"; that, while there remained in the building fund proceeds of the sale of the first issue of over $249,000, the trustees entered into a written contract with plaintiff whereby plaintiff was employed to furnish architectural plans and specifications for said school building and to supervise and superintend the construction thereof, and in consideration thereof the school district promised to pay plaintiff 6 per cent. of the contract price of said building, payment therefor to be made at specified times in proportion to the amount of services rendered, and all payments to be made from the moneys derived from the sale of said bonds; that thereafter, on the 11th day of May, 1920, and after the second issue of bonds had been authorized, a verbal agreement was made modifying said contract by the plaintiff agreeing to accept $20,000 in full payment for his architectural services; that on the 1st day of July, 1921, when plaintiff's order was drawn, there was but $54.15 in the building fund of the high school district; that this sum was expended; and that there were no moneys in said fund derived from the sale of said bonds.

The trial court found that the essential allegations of the complaint were true, and that the allegations of the special defense were true except those relating to the terms of the contract of May 11, 1920. Upon this issue the court found that the plaintiff agreed to accept $20,000 for his services as an architect and for other work not specified in the written contract, but that it was not true that the parties understood or agreed that said sum should be paid from the bond moneys referred to in the answer.

Upon these findings the trial court gave judgment against the two defendants as prayed. The defendant Force complied with the order of the court, but the defendant Taylor appealed. The appeal is presented upon a bill of exceptions, which contains four specifications of error, as follows:

> "(1) The evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that, at the time said order was presented for payment, the amount of said order did not exceed the income and revenue provided for the year in which the indebtedness represented by said order was incurred; (2) that the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that at the time of the submission of this case there was and there is yet in the fund upon which said order was drawn ample money applicable to the payment thereof with which to pay the same; (3) that the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that the averments of paragraph 8 of the separate answer and defense are not true in that it was not agreed or understood by the parties that the said $20,000 was to be paid from the bond moneys referred to in the separate answer and defense in said paragraph 8; (4) that the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that on the 11th day of May, 1920, there were then outstanding contracts for construction and contracts for construction which were to be executed at the next meeting of the board of trustees of said district, which would require a payment of all the sum of $214,968.34, then remaining on said 11th day of May, 1920, in the Salinas union high school district building fund."

[1, 2] 1. Section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution merely prohibits the incurring of an indebtedness exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year. It does not require that the money be on hand at the time the indebtedness is incurred or, in fact, that the income should have been provided at that time. It is sufficient if the indebtedness is within the income which has been provided or which will, in the ordinary course, be provided within the year. The evidence was that there was over $20,000 remaining in the high school fund at the time of the trial (March 20, 1922), and that the estimated balance at the close of the fiscal year, after paying all claims, including $5,000 in warrants already drawn, would be about $13,000. There was sufficient evidence, therefore, to sustain the finding that the order did not exceed the income provided for the fiscal year following July 1, 1921, the day upon which it was drawn.

[3] But the date of the order is of little importance. The trial court found, and the evidence supports the finding, that respondent's contract called for his services until the building was completed, payments to be made from time to time as the work progressed. It does not appear that any installment coming due in any year during the life of the contract was in excess of the income and revenue of that year. The contract is not, therefore, within the inhibitions of section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution. Doland v. Clark, 143 Cal. 176, 182, 76 Pac. 958; McBean v. Fresno, 112 Cal. 159, 167, 44 Pac. 358, 31 L. R. A. 794, 53 Am. St. Rep. 191; Higgins v. San Diego, 131 Cal. 294, 299, 63 Pac. 470; Smilie v. Fresno County, 112 Cal. 311, 313, 44 Pac. 556.

2. The order was drawn upon the "high school fund," which, we assume, means the general fund of the high school district. If not drawn upon the proper fund, no issue was made of that fact, and the case was tried upon the theory that the warrant was in proper form. The answer did not raise the issue that the full sum of $20,000 was agreed to be paid out of the bond moneys, and it was at no time suggested that the order was not a proper claim against the general fund, or that there were not sufficient moneys in that fund to meet payment. The evidence plainly showed that over $21,000 remained in the fund at the time of the trial, and this was sufficient to support the finding.

[4] 3. Though there is no express allegation on the subject, appellant insists that he raised, as a separate defense, the issue that the trustees agreed to pay the $20,000 out of the bond moneys raised for building purposes. As to this the burden of proof was on the appellant. He offered no evidence to support the allegation, and the only evidence received showed that no arrangement was made regarding the fund from which the payment was to be made. Thus the trial court was justified in finding against the appellant.

4. The fourth specification relates to a matter which was not a material issue in the case. It is purely argumentative and was offered to show that, if there was money in the building fund on the date of the oral contract which was not needed to cover outstanding contracts, the parties might have intended to make respondent's compensation payable out of that fund. The evidence was that on May 11, 1920, the trustees had actually contracted for an expenditure of over $296,000, but that other contracts amounting to over $117,000 were in contemplation and were actually executed at the next meeting of the board. This supports the finding of the trial court.

[5] On this appeal the appellant argues that the main question involved is whether moneys raised by a special tax levy for maintenance of the high school can be used in the payment of respondent's claim. But, if this is so, the issue has not been properly raised. It is not covered by any pleading, while the evidence is merely that such a tax was levied, but not that the proceeds were deposited in the fund against which respondent's claim was presented or that sufficient moneys from other sources were not placed in that fund. Our attention has not been directed to any statute which prohibits a high school district from raising by taxation moneys for building purposes when the proceeds of bonds issued for such purposes have been expended, and we have not found any statute which provides that the payment of an architect's fees for building supervision must be made a charge against the building account. In the absence of a statutory requirement, there is nothing to prevent the trustees from employing an architect and making his compensation payable from the general fund. We find no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

WESTERN WELL WORKS, Inc., v. CALIFORNIA FARMS CO. et al. (Civ. 4464.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. February 13, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court. April 12, 1923.)

1. Mechanics' liens ⚷40—Test bore held a "well" within mechanics' lien statute; "ream out."

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, providing for mechanics' liens for labor in constructing wells, drilling a test bore, the sinking of which contributed one-fourth the cost of a completed well, and which the contractor was later to "ream out," which means to enlarge or dress out, was work of such character as to be included within the term "well," as used in the statute, and to constitute the basis of a mechanics' lien.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Well.]

2. Mechanics' liens ⚷78—Land of corporation, whose officers were informed of constructing well, held subject to mechanics' lien.

Where the officers of a corporation were informed that a well was being constructed on the corporation's land for an association in possession thereof, the corporation was bound to all that a prudent and proper inquiry would have revealed, and on its failure to give notice to avoid responsibility as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1192, its land became subject to a mechanics' lien for constructing the well.

3. Mechanics' liens ⚷5, 182—Lien authorized for constructing irrigating well applies to land improved and benefited.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1185, providing that the extent of a mechanic's lien shall be not only land occupied by the structures but a convenient space about it, or so much as may be required for the convenient use and occupation thereof, the limitation of a lien for work in constructing an irrigating well, having, when completed, a capacity of 2,000 gallons per minute, to a circle of ground 100 feet in diameter around the well, was too narrow, since, in limiting the lien, consideration should be given to the amount of land to be improved or benefited, and the statute liberally construed as required by section 1183 as amended by St. 1911, p. 1313.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; M. F. McCormick, Judge.

Action by the Western Well Works, Incorporated, against the California Farms Company and others, to foreclose a mechanic's lien on lands of the California Land Company. Plaintiff was granted personal judgment against certain defendants, but adjudged to have no lien on the lands described, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Ralph C. McComish, of San Jose, and G. L. Aynesworth, of Fresno, for appellant.

Everts, Ewing & Wild and J. R. Fitch, all of Fresno, for respondent California Land Co.

RICHARDS, J. [1] This action was instituted by the plaintiff for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien upon two certain sections of land in Fresno county, owned by the California Land Company, one of the defendants herein. At the time the work was done, from which, as claimed by plaintiff, the lien arose, the lands sought to be affected thereby were in the possession of the California Farms Company, another defendant herein, which was an unincorporated association of persons of whom the defendant Sherwood Green was a member and officer, having authority to act for such association; and which association was, at the time of doing of said work, in the possession of a larger tract of land of which said sections were a part under an option to purchase the same from the California Land Company. The work to be done by the plaintiff was set forth in a contract in writing bearing date of February 10, 1920, between it and the California Farms Company and consisted in the sinking of a test bore in search of water-bearing strata upon said sections of land to the depth of 1,000 feet. The contract proceeded to state that:

> "If, within a depth of 1,000 feet from the surface of the ground, sufficient apparent water-bearing strata are encountered which by mutual agreement would justify finishing the well, then we are to ream out the test bore and sink a well at this point, and case the same with 24" diameter double 12 gauge hard red sheet steel casing for approximately the first 120 feet, then a taper connection from 24" to 12" and 12" diameter double 12 gauge casing for the balance of the distance. * * * After the casing has been installed, we fill in the annular space between the wall of the hole dug to receive the casing and the casing itself with selected washed gravel—making and completing what is known as the Western Well Works, Inc., patented gravel envelope well, constructed under patent No. 1289320."

The contract further embraced the specifications for the well in case the test bore justified its completion, and provided for the installation of a pump thereon having a capacity of from 1,000 to 2,500 gallons of water per minute. The work proceeded under this contract to the depth indicated therein, the plaintiff furnishing all of the derricks, materials, supplies, and labor for the doing of said work in accordance with the provisions of said contract. The California Farms Company did not, however, comply with the terms of its said agreement as to payments nor as to completion of the well, in consequence of which the plaintiff ceased operations and in due time filed and recorded its lien for the labor and materials furnished and used in the prosecution of the work of making said test bore; and thereafter commenced this action for the foreclosure of its said lien, joining the California Land Company, the California Farms Company, and Sherwood Green, and certain other persons alleged to compose said latter association as defendants in said action. In its complaint, the plaintiff, after alleging the facts as to performance by it of said work under said contract with the California Farms Company and of the nonpayment by the latter therefor, proceeded to allege that the California Land Company had notice and knowledge of the doing of said work and the furnishing of said labor, materials, and supplies, on and at all times after February 10, 1920, but that said California Land Company never gave notice by either posting or recordation that it would not be responsible for said work, labor, materials, or supplies. The defendants appeared separately and demurred to the sufficiency of the plaintiff's complaint; the California Farms Company and the defendant Green demurring both generally and specifically, and the California Land Company presenting a general demurrer. These demurrers were overruled. The defendant California Farms Company defaulted by failing to answer after notice. The defendant Sherwood Green answered, denying the making and entering into the contract by the California Farms Company or himself for the doing of said work. The California Land Company answered denying practically all of the averments of the complaint save and except the averment that said defendant claimed the right, title, and interest in said premises sought to be affected by said lien adverse to the claim of the plaintiff, and in that respect alleged itself to be the owner of said premises free and clear of the lien asserted by said plaintiff. It also specifically denied having any notice or knowledge of the doing of said work or of the furnishing of the said labor, materials, or supplies at any time prior to the institution of said action. The cause came on for trial upon the issues thus joined, and upon its submission the court made its findings of fact herein and found that the plaintiff had performed the work of drilling the test bore upon the premises in question under the contract with the California Farms Company and as required by the terms of said contract and had furnished the labor, materials, and supplies necessary for said work as provided therein, and that no part of the sum to be paid therefor by the said California Farms Company had been paid, save and except the sum of $500 on account thereof, and that in due course the plaintiff had filed its claim of lien upon said two sections of land for the balance remaining unpaid upon said contract. The court further found that no part of said premises sought to be impressed with said lien was necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the improvements placed thereon by said plaintiff, save and except a circle of ground 100 feet in diameter around the spot where the derrick had been erected, above the point where said test bore had been drilled. The court further found that the said test bore to be constructed and actually constructed under the terms of said contract between the plaintiff and the California Farms Company was not a well and did not come within the definition of any of the matters for which a lien is granted under the statutes of the state of California. The court also found that the defendant California Land Company had no notice or knowledge of the doing of said work and furnishing of said labor, materials, or supplies at any time prior to the service upon it of the summons and complaint in this action, and that the said defendant California Land Company never gave any notice, either by posting or recordation, that it would not be responsible for said work, labor, materials, or supplies. As conclusions of law from the foregoing findings of fact, the court found that the plaintiff was entitled to a personal judgment against the defendants California Farms Company and Sherwood Green, for the sum of $3,494.86, but that, as to the defendant California Land Company, it was entitled to judgment that the plaintiff had no lien upon the premises described in its complaint. Judgment was entered accordingly. The plaintiff's motion for a new trial was denied, whereupon it took and prosecutes this appeal.

The primary question presented for our consideration upon this appeal is as to whether or not the test bore for a water well, drilled by the plaintiff under the terms of its contract with the California Farms Company, constituted such a structure under the provisions of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure as would entitle the plaintiff to a lien for the work, labor, material, and supplies furnished by it in the drilling of said test bore. We are satisfied that the trial court was in error in its finding and conclusion that the doing of said work, furnishing of said labor, materials, and supplies did not come within the terms and provisions of said section of the Code of Civil Procedure so as to entitle the plaintiff to claim a lien therefor upon some portion of the real estate upon or in relation to which said work was prosecuted and said labor, materials, and supplies were furnished. Section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure in force at the time of the doing of said work provided that:

> "Mechanics, materialmen, contractors, subcontractors, artisans, architects, machinists, builders, miners, teamsters and draymen, and all persons and laborers of every class performing labor upon, or bestowing skill or other necessary services, or furnishing materials to be used or consumed in or furnishing appliances, teams and power contributing to the construction, alteration, addition to or repair, either in whole or in part, of any building, wharf, bridge, ditch, flume aqueduct, well, tunnel, fence, machinery, railroad wagon road or other structure shall have a lien upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished materials, for the value of such labor done and materials furnished and for the value of the use of such appliances, teams or power, whether at the instance of the owner, or of any other person acting by his authority or under him, as contractor or otherwise."

By the terms and specifications of the contract between the plaintiff and the California Farms Company, it was provided that the test bore to be sunk by said plaintiff was to be drilled in search of water-bearing strata and formation and that "if, within the depth of 1,000 feet, sufficient apparent water-bearing strata was encountered which by mutual agreement would justify finishing the well, then we are to ream out the test bore and sink a well at this point." The phrase "ream out" the test bore is to be interpreted to mean "to enlarge or dress out, as a hole." Webster's Dictionary, "ream." It was thus the clear intent of the foregoing provision of the said contract that the well to be thereafter sunk, if the developments of the test bore should justify it, was to occupy the precise spot and to follow the precise line of the test bore, or in other words to constitute an enlargement of the hole made thereby. The undisputed testimony of Mr. Vaughan, president of the Western Well Works, showed that the developments of the test bore were such as to justify the conclusion that a well, if completed according to the specifications of said contract, and operated at said point, would have produced in excess of 2,000 gallons of water a minute, and that by the sinking of said test bore about 25 per cent. of the cost of the completed well would have been contributed. Reading the foregoing provisions of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure in the light of this contract and of the evidence above referred to, the conclusion would seem to be irresistible that the test bore was work of such a character as would reasonably be embraced within the meaning of the word "well" as used in said section. It was, to say the least of it, work which contributed to the construction of such well. That a well is a structure in the sense of said provision of the Code would seem to be clear from the authorities. In the case of Helm v. Chapman, 66 Cal. 291, 5 Pac. 352, it was held that a pit sunk within a mining claim was a "structure." This decision was approved in the case of Silvester v. Coe Q. M. Co., 80 Cal. 510, 22 Pac. 217, and was again cited with approval in the case of Williams v. Mountaineer G. M. Co., 102 Cal. 134, 34 Pac. 702, 36 Pac. 388, in which latter case the Supreme Court, in interpreting the meaning of the word "structure" as used in section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure said:

> "The use of the phrase 'other structure' in the above extract shows that the word 'structure' comprehends all the properties specifically enumerated, and is broad enough to include any similar thing constructed, should the enumeration prove incomplete."

The term "well" as modernly used has also been given a broader signification than that embraced in the definitions of earlier dictionaries; as, for example, in its use in relation to boring for oil. In the cases of Haskell v. Gallagher, 20 Ind. App. 224, 50 N. E. 485, 67 Am. St. Rep. 250, and Kanawha v. Wenner, 71 W. Va. 477, 76 S. E. 893, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 559, it was held that an oil well was a structure within the meaning of that term as used in mechanic's lien laws. We conclude that the trial court was in error in its finding and conclusion that the work done and labor, materials, and supplies furnished by the plaintiff were not lienable under the provisions of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[2] The next finding of the trial court which the appellant assails is its finding that the California Land Company had no such notice or knowledge of the doing of said work and the furnishing of said labor, materials, and supplies as would have required it, as the owner of the premises affected by said lien, to give the notice provided for in section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in order to avoid responsibility for said work and liability for said lien. The evidence upon this subject is undisputed and is supplied by the defendant Sherwood Green, who was at the time the secretary of the California Farms Company. He testified that on or about the 1st of May, 1920, at which time considerable progress had been made with said work, he had a conversation with an officer of the California Land Company at Boise City, Idaho, the principal place of business of said corporation. A number of other persons were present, all of whom were connected with the California Land Company. He had gone there for the purpose of making a payment upon the contract of his association with the California Land Company and obtaining an extension upon said contract, and he then there made said payment and procured such extension. In the course of doing so, he discussed with the persons then present the fact that:

> "If they didn't give us an extension, we naturally would take those two sections in which the wells were being drilled, which were sections 22 and 27 under our option, so I know at that time it was made clear to them that we were doing work and drilling wells and we talked about taking those two sections if we didn't get an extension. Section 27 is the section on which the work was being done by the Western Well Works. I discussed with the California Land Company the proposition that we were doing well work on that section."

From this uncontradicted evidence but one conclusion can reasonably be drawn. It is that the California Land Company, through its officers, with whom the defendant Green, as the authorized representative of the California Farms Company, went to Boise City, Idaho, to deal in the matter of obtaining an extension of the contract of his association with said corporation, which extension he then and there obtained, was informed in immediate connection with the obtaining of said extension that work in the nature of drilling a well or wells was then proceeding upon its said land. That such information would be sufficient to put prudent men upon inquiry as to the nature and extent of the work being done upon the property of their corporation we entertain no doubt, in the light of the authorities; and that the defendant California Land Company was bound by the information thus imparted to all that a proper and prudent inquiry would have revealed, the cases fully support. Evans v. Judson, 120 Cal. 282, 52 Pac. 585; J. R. Gentle & Co. v. Britton, 158 Cal. 328, 111 Pac. 9; Perazzi v. Doe Estate Co., 40 Cal. App. 617, 181 Pac. 398. This being so, it was incumbent upon said corporation as the owner of the premises upon which said work was being done by plaintiff to have given notice under the provisions of section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in order to avoid responsibility for the same. The trial court found that no such notice of nonresponsibility was given by said corporation. It follows that some portion of its said property was subject to the plaintiff's lien.

[3] The foregoing views of this court require a reversal of this judgment, with the probable result of a retrial of this cause. In view of this fact, but one further comment is necessary upon the findings of the trial court. It relates to the court's finding:

> "That none of said premises is necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the improvements placed thereon by the plaintiff save and except a circle of ground 100 feet in diameter, including the land upon which the derrick hereafter mentioned was erected, in such manner that said derrick is in the center of said piece of ground."

It seems to us that this is altogether too narrow an interpretation to place upon the provisions of the statute permitting a lien to be claimed upon the land upon which the building improvement, well, or structure is to be constructed. Section 1185 of the Code of Civil Procedure in providing for the extent of such lien allows, not only the immediate land occupied by the structure itself, but also "a convenient space about the same, or so much as may be required for the convenient use and occupation thereof." The structure upon which the plaintiff performed the work for which he claims his lien was a well, having, when completed, a capacity of at least 2,000 gallons of water a minute. It was to be an irrigating well, and, according to the uncontradicted evidence of Mr. Vaughan, would have sufficed for the irrigation of at least one, if not both, of the sections of land upon which it was to be located. In determining what would be a convenient space for the use and occupation of an irrigating well, consideration must be given to the reasonable and beneficial use of the waters of the well, since the well is useless without the use and application of its waters upon sufficient land to render an adequate return for the cost of its creation and use. The question is not so much as to the amount of land required for the area to be occupied by the well and its appliances, but rather as to the amount of land to be improved or benefited by the creation and use of the well. This is quite clearly set forth in the case of Berentz v. Belmont Oil Mining

Co., 148 Cal. 577, 84 Pac. 47, 113 Am. St. Rep. 308, and also in the case of Hamilton v. Delhi Mining Co., 118 Cal. 148, 50 Pac. 378, wherein the Supreme Court says:

> "The general theory upon which liens to laborers, mechanics, and materialmen are given is, that by the labor, or use of the material, the property has been enhanced in value."

A good illustration of the application of the rule is to be found in Mendoza v. Central Forest Co., 37 Cal. App. 289, 174 Pac. 359, in which a lien was sought to be imposed for work in preparing a tract of land for an irrigation system consisting of ditches, drains, embankments, and the like. The entire tract of land was sought to be affected by the lien. The court says:

> "The farm development here contemplated was a finished piece of work composed of integral parts, some of which the statute expressly designates as structures, and when completed consisted of ditches, drains, embankments, roads, so correlated as to form one harmonious entity designed to accomplish a particular object and constituting a permanent and valuable improvement to the land and necessary to its highest and most profitable uses."

The Supreme Court of the United States has given a like application of the principle in the case of Springer Land Ass'n v. Ford, 168 U. S. 513, 18 Sup. Ct. 170, 42 L. Ed. 562, involving much the same state of facts, and wherein the court said:

> "The truth is that what area of land is subject to lien in a given case largely depends on the character of the improvement. The extent of ground proper and necessary to the enjoyment of the building, a wall, or a fence, would not be the same as that required for or appertaining to an irrigation system, but the principle of determination is the same. This ditch was to expend its waters on this tract and could not be used or operated without it. Each was dependent on the other, and both were bound together in the accomplishment of a common purpose. The lien must apply to the entire tract or be confined to the right of way through which it took its course, and to narrow it down to the latter would be to disregard the very terms of the statute."

In determining the amount of land to be subjected to the lien of the plaintiff in the instant case, the trial court should take into account the fact that the mechanic's lien law is to be liberally construed, with a view to effecting its purpose. The Legislature expressly so declared in the statute amending section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure into its present form (Stats. 1911, pp. 1313–1320), and the courts of both this and other jurisdictions have consistently followed the rule of construction thus laid down. Mendoza v. Central Forest Co., supra; Lindsay v. Gunning, 59 Conn. 296, 22 Atl. 310, 11 L. R. A. 553; Montandon v. Deas, 14 Ala. 33, 48 Am. Dec. 84; Filston Farm Co. v. Henderson, 106 Md. 335, 67 Atl. 228; Hess Flume Co. v. La Junta, etc., Land Co., 63 Colo. 236, 166 Pac. 246. The foregoing views are for the direction of the trial court upon a retrial of this cause.

Judgment reversed.

CATANIA et al. v. GUCCCIONE. (Civ. 4451.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 8, 1923.)

Appeal and error ⚷356—Appeal dismissed for failure to file bill of exceptions or transcript within required time, in absence of excuse.

Where appellant has not caused to be prepared, settled, or filed a bill of exceptions, and there has been no dismissal by the trial court of any proceedings for a settlement of a bill of exceptions, and the appellant has not filed a transcript on appeal nor obtained an extension of time in which to file the transcript within six months after the filing of the notice of appeal and has shown no excuse for the laches, the respondents' motion for dismissal of the appeal will be granted.

Action by Santo Catania and another against Saverio Gucccione. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Motion granted, and appeal dismissed.

S. Santillo, for appellant.

Geo. G. Graham, of Fresno, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal. The plaintiffs commenced an action to recover a judgment for goods sold. The trial court awarded them a judgment in the sum of $1,034.81. Thereafter the defendant made a motion for a new trial, and the motion was denied, and thereupon the defendant filed in the trial court, on June 22, 1922, a notice of appeal, but the appellant has not caused to be prepared, settled, or filed a bill of exceptions, and there has been no dismissal by the trial court of any proceedings for a settlement of a bill of exceptions. The appellant has not filed in this court a transcript on appeal, nor has he obtained any stipulations or orders extending the time to file the same.

On the 3d day of January, 1923, the respondents served a notice that on the 29th day of January, 1923, at the hour of 2 p. m., they would move that the appeal be dismissed "on the grounds that the same has not been prosecuted to effect, and no transcript or bill of exceptions has been settled, signed, and filed as provided by law and the rules of the court." Thereafter, on the 25th day of January, 1923, the respondents and appellant entered into a stipulation that the motion to dismiss might, at the time noticed for the making of the motion, be submitted for decision on the papers then on file, and waived oral argument or notice. Thereafter in due course the motion to dismiss was duly submitted.

The moving papers seem to be regular in every respect. The laches of appellant are patent. No excuse therefor is shown. The motion is therefore granted, and the appeal is dismissed.

In a will contest on the ground of undue influence, the evidence must be weighed in the light of the fact that the circumstances surrounding the immediate execution of the will were within the exclusive knowledge of those interested in upholding it, while the opportunity of acquiring such knowledge was withheld from contestants, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 2061.

The fact that a will is unjust or unnatural has weight in determining whether a testator was mentally competent when executing his will or was acting under undue influence.

10. Wills 🔑163(2)—Burden of proof in contest on beneficiary participating in execution.

The mere existence of a confidential relation between a testator and one who unduly profits by the will is not sufficient to overturn it; but, when such beneficiary has actually participated in procuring the execution of the will, the burden is on him to show that the will was not induced by coercion or fraud.

11. Wills 🔑53(1)—Admissibility of evidence to show undue influence.

The fact that a will attempted to dispose of a piano to an adopted child to whom it already belonged was entitled to consideration, however slight, as tending to show that the will was a product of a mind other than that of the testator.

12. Wills 🔑166(12)—Conduct of beneficiaries attending execution by testator dangerously ill subject to close scrutiny.

The circumstances attending the execution of a will by a testator who is dangerously ill, and expecting to die, at a time when he is surrounded exclusively by those who benefit by it, are subject to close scrutiny, and successful efforts of beneficiaries to keep contestants out of testator's presence at times vital to beneficiaries' purpose, as alleged in the petition, are entitled to weight.

13. Wills 🔑166(12)—Circumstantial evidence sufficient in will contest.

In building up a case on circumstantial evidence in a will contest, it is not necessary that any single fact proved, standing alone, shall establish the issue of undue influence, but it is sufficient if all the facts and circumstances given in evidence, considered together, lead to a rational inference that the ultimate fact is as alleged.

14. Wills 🔑324(3)—Undue influence held for jury.

In a will contest, held, that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury on the issue of undue influence.

15. Wills 🔑164(1)—Nationality and relative ages of testator and beneficiaries held material in will contest.

In contest of will on ground of undue influence, the nationality of beneficiaries and testator and their relative ages were material.

16. Wills 🔑164(4)—Assistance in accumulation of property by contestant admissible.

Contestants of will had the right to show that the property of decedent had been accumulated in part by the efforts of a contestant because tending to prove that the will was the more unnatural.

17. Wills 🔑164(3)—That contestant children had little property admissible to show unnaturalness of will.

That contestant children owned little or no property was admissible in will contest, because it would be more unnatural for a parent to disinherit children having limited means of support.

In will contest on ground of undue influence, contestant children had the right to show that any of the beneficiaries had attempted to prejudice the testator's mind against either contestant.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Annie Gallo, deceased. Proceeding by Esta F. Galbraith and another against Dario Panini and others, for revocation of probate of will. From a judgment of nonsuit, contestants appeal. Reversed.

A. H. Ashley, of Stockton, for appellants.

Arthur L. Levinsky and R. J. Jeffry, both of Stockton, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The will of the decedent was duly admitted to probate, and thereafter appellants filed their petition for revocation of the probate thereof. At the close of contestants' case the court granted a nonsuit, and entered judgment of dismissal. The contestants have appealed from the judgment.

The contestants alleged mental incompetency, undue influence, fraud, menace, conspiracy, and want of due execution. Appellants' brief is not arranged in accordance with Supreme Court rule VIII (176 Pac. ix), requiring the presentation of "each point separately, under an appropriate subheading, showing the nature of the question to be presented," but it sufficiently appears that appellants contend the evidence warrants the submission to the jury of the issues of mental incompetency and undue influence, at least. It is charged that such undue influence was exercised by Dario Panini, Rose Bacigalupi and Lena Ciari, beneficiaries under the will.
